"Hi, I'd like to speak with Ingvild . . . "

"Hi, it's me!"

"Hi. How's it going?"

"Well, I think. Yes, it's going pretty well. I'm sitting alone in my room reading."

"Sounds nice."

"Yes, and what about you?"

"It's going well. I was wondering whether you felt like going to a party on Saturday? Tomorrow, that is. My brother's having a party at his place."

"Sounds like fun."

"I'm having a few people over first. Then we're taking a taxi. He lives in Solheimsviken. Would seven-ish be OK?"

"Yes."

"Jon Olav's coming anyway, so there's someone you know."

"Is he everywhere, that cousin of yours?"

"Yes, you could say that . . . "

She chuckled, and then there was a silence.

"Does that work then?" I said. "Seven tomorrow at my place?"

"Yes. I'll bring along my usual cheery good humor and positive approach to life!"

"Great," I said. "See you then. Bye."

"Bye."

The next morning I cleaned my room, changed the bedding, washed my clothes, and hung them on the stand in the basement, I wanted everything to be perfect in case she came home with me after the party. Something had to happen anyway, that much was obvious. My passivity and awkwardness the first time were understandable but not crucial; our second meeting had been different, it took place in the middle of the day and was a chance for us to get to know each other better, but now, the third time we were meeting in Bergen I would have to make my intentions known, make a move, otherwise she would slip through my fingers. I couldn't talk my way into a relationship with her, some action was required, a kiss, a hug, and then, perhaps later that night when we were walking in the streets outside Yngve's place, a question, would you like to come home with me?

It was an intimidating thought, but I had to, there was no way out, otherwise nothing would happen. And it wasn't that I had to follow this plan slavishly, I would have to improvise as I went along, read the situations, try to see what she wanted, where she was, but I couldn't not act, I had to act and then she could reject me if she wasn't willing or felt it was too soon.

But if she wanted to come home with me I would have to tell her about my physical problem. I couldn't go through the humiliation of trying to hide the fact that I came so quickly, as I had done so many times, I just had to tell her, treat it as a minor matter, no big deal, a manageable problem. The only time I had really made love to a girl, in a tent at Roskilde Festival that summer, it had got better and better the more times we did it, so at least I knew I could. I hadn't liked her much though, not as a person, she didn't mean anything to me beyond the sex, but Ingvild did, everything was at stake with her, I only wanted to be together with her, and I couldn't allow myself to fail because of that.

I also knew it helped to drink, but I shouldn't get too drunk, then she might think I was after only one thing with her. And I wasn't! Nothing could be farther from the truth.

Jon Olav and his two friends, Idar and Terje, were the first to arrive. I'd had three beers beforehand and was feeling confident in everything I said and did. I put out a dish of potato chips and a bowl of peanuts, and told them about the Writing Academy. They had read books by Ragnar Hovland, knew about Jan Kjærstad and Kjartan Fløgstad, of course, and I suspected they were impressed when I told them they were going to come and teach us.

"I imagine they'll tell us a bit about their writing," I said. "But the main thing is they're going to read our texts and talk about them. Do you like Kjærstad?"

At that moment the bell rang and I went to answer the door. It was Anne. She was dressed in black, had a little hat on her head and a long lock of hair hanging down over her face. I leaned forward to give her a hug, she placed a hand on my back, held it there for a moment after I had straightened up.

"Great to see you," she said with a little laugh.

"Great to see you too," I said. "Come in!"

She put down a small backpack on the floor inside the door and said hello to the others as she took off her coat. Her bubbly personality had once struck me as incompatible with the black Gothic element of her interests and approach to life. It was the Cult and the Cure, the Jesus and Mary Chain and the Belgian Crammed Discs bands, This Mortal Coil and the Cocteau Twins with Anne, fog and darkness and death romance, but with a smile on her lips and excited little jumps wherever she went. She was older than me, but when we had worked together, she behind the knobs and switches in the control room on the other side of the window, me behind the microphone, I once had the sense she might be interested in me, without being able to say for certain, such matters were impossible to know with certainty, anyway nothing happened, we were friends, both music fans, me slightly more interested in pop than her. Now she was a student, alone in Bergen like me, but she already had a host of friends as far as I could glean from what she said, reclined over the armrests of the chair, chatting with the others. No surprises there, she was outgoing and soon became the focal point of the little student gathering in my room that evening.

I drank steadily to reach a level where I no longer considered what I said or did, I just was, free and easy, so when the bell rang at a little before eight and I went out to open the door, I wasn't in the slightest bit nervous or tense, just happy to see her, Ingvild, standing on the steps in the rain with a bag over her shoulder and a smile on her face.

I gave her a hug, she followed me in, said hello to the others, a touch shy, possibly also nervous, and took a bottle of wine from her bag. I hurried into the kitchen to fetch a corkscrew and a glass. She sat down between Jon Olav and Idar on the sofa, inserted the corkscrew, placed the bottle between her knees, and pulled out the cork with a pop.

"So this is where you live," she said, filling her glass with white wine.

"Yes," I said. "I've been cleaning all day to get ready for you all."

"I can imagine," she said.

Her eyes narrowed and seemed to fill with laughter.

"Skål," she said.

"Skål," said the others, and we clinked bottles and glasses.

"What are you writing actually?" Idar said.

"A novel," I said. "A contemporary novel. I'm trying to make it entertaining but profound, too. It's not so easy. I'm fascinated by paradoxes. By whatever is both ugly and beautiful, both high and low. A bit like Fløgstad actually."

I glanced at Ingvild, who looked at me. I couldn't show the others how ridiculously in love I was, that all I really wanted to do was sit and stare at her, and I couldn't show her, either, so I tried to pay her as little attention as possible.

"But now I want to be published," I said. "I don't want what I write to be read by only a few people. There's no point in that. I might just as well do something else. Do you know what I mean?"

"Yes," Idar said.

"Did you read your poem then?" Jon Olav laughed.

"No," I said, glaring at him. I didn't like him laughing. It was as though he was trying to tell the others something.

"What kind of poem?" Anne said.

"It was just something I wrote for the Academy. A practice activity," I said, and got up, went over to the record player, and put on The Joshua Tree.

"It wouldn't be hard to recite from memory," Jon Olav said, and laughed again.

I spun around.

"If you want to be a jerk, that's fine by me," I said.

He stopped laughing, as I thought he would, and at first looked surprised.

"What's the matter?" he said.

"I'm serious about what I do," I said, and sat down.

"Skål!" Jon Olav said.

We skål-ed, the brief flash of ill will was gone, the conversation flowed again. Ingvild didn't say much, interjected with the odd ironic comment, livened up when the conversation turned to sport, and I liked that so much, while at the same time it struck me that I didn't know her at all, so how could I have fallen so much in love with her, I wondered, sitting on the stool across the table from her, a bottle of cold Hansa beer held to my mouth and a lit cigarette in my hand, but I knew the answer with the whole of my being, there was no arguing with feelings, and nor should you, they always knew best. I saw her, she was here, and what she radiated, which was her, lived its life irrespective of what she said or didn't say.

Now and then I was struck by the illuminating thought that here I was, in my place, surrounded by my friends, and only a meter away was the girl I loved more than all else.

Life can't get better than that.

"Anyone want another beer?" I asked, rising to my feet. Idar and Terje and Anne nodded, I fetched four beers from the fridge, handed them around, saw there was a space between Jon Olav and Ingvild on the sofa if they squeezed together, and sat down there. When I opened the beer it foamed over, I held it away from me, the froth landed on the table, oh shit, I said, put down the bottle, went for a cloth from the kitchen and wiped it up. On the wall between the windows, just behind the sofa, there was a nail, and for some reason I hung the cloth there.

"A wet cloth has come between us," I said to Ingvild, and plopped down on the sofa. She looked at me in bemusement, and I guffawed from the pit of my stomach, haw, haw, haw.

I rang for two taxis from the telephone booth opposite. The others stood on the steps drinking and chatting. I watched them, thinking once again, they've come to my place for drinks. The rain had eased, but the sky was still overcast. A pale darkness hovered in the streets, through which we passed shortly afterward, it suddenly became lighter as we emerged by Puddefjorden and the high open sky there, then it became darker again as we climbed the hills in Solheimsviken, between the rows of workers' houses.

It was already half past nine. We were more than a little late. Yngve had said eight or half past when I asked him when we should turn up, however this was worse for us, not for them, not for all Yngve's friends and acquaintances, our presence didn't mean anything to them.

I paid one taxi driver, Jon Olav paid the other, and then I walked up the short drive, with the others close on my heels, and rang the bell.

Yngve opened the door. He was wearing a white shirt with gray stripes and black trousers, his hair was combed back except for a strand hanging over one side of his forehead.

"We're a bit late," I said. "Hope you don't mind."

"Not at all," he said. "The party's a flop anyway. No one's turned up."

I looked at him. What did he mean?

He said hi to the others, didn't make any fuss about Ingvild, fortunately, I didn't want her to realize how much I had talked about her to Yngve. We took off our shoes and coats in the entrance hall and went into the sitting room. It was empty apart from Ola, who was watching TV.

I couldn't believe my eyes.

"Are you watching TV?" I said.

"Yes? No point starting a party if there are no people."

"Where are they then?"

Yngve shrugged and forced a weak smile.

"I didn't give much advance warning. But there are lots of you!"

"Yes," I said, sitting down on the sofa under the Once Upon a Time in America poster. I was shaken, this was a bolt out of the blue, I had imagined the rooms would be packed with people, sophisticated young men and women, a buzz of conversation, laughter, the air dense with smoke, and then this! Yngve and Ola watching the Saturday film on NRK? And it would have to be when I brought Ingvild! I wanted her to see Yngve and his friends, students who had been here several years and knew the town, knew the university, knew the world, so that I could share the limelight with them, he was my brother, I was invited to his parties. But what did she see? Two guys watching TV, no guests, they hadn't come, they had other, better, things to do on a Saturday evening than go to a party at Yngve's.

Was he a loser? Was Yngve a sad loser?

He switched off the TV, moved the two chairs to the table with Ola, fetched some beers, and sat down, started talking to the others, a bit of polite small talk to make them feel at home, Anne and Ingvild and Idar and Terje, what they studied, where they lived, and the atmosphere, which at first had been somewhat hesitant, despite the fact that we had been drinking together for more than two hours, soon began to lift. The conversation went from involving the whole table to breaking up into smaller groups, I chatted with Anne, she was unstoppable, suddenly there was so much she had to tell me, I felt claustrophobic and said I had to go to the toilet. From there I went into the kitchen, where Terje was chatting to Ingvild, smiled at them, went over to Ola and Yngve, there was a ring at the door, Asbjørn walked in, followed closely by Arvid, and now the apartment was full, there were people everywhere, or so it felt, faces and voices and bodies in motion everywhere, and I mingled among them, back and forth, drank and chatted, chatted and drank, getting drunker and drunker. The sense of time vanished, everything was open, I was no longer inhibited by my own shortcomings, I walked around happy and free without a thought for anything except the moment and Ingvild, whom I loved. I kept my distance, if there was one thing I knew about girls it was that they didn't want someone who was easy to get, someone who followed them around, slack-jawed, so instead I chatted with the others, who, in intoxication's shining light, were drawn from the darkness as if by a torch. Everyone was interesting, everyone had something to say that I could listen to and be moved by until I left and they were reclaimed by the darkness.

I sat between Ola and Asbjørn on the sofa. On the other side of the table sat Anne, she asked if she could bum a cigarette off me, I nodded, the next moment her head was down and she was concentrating on rolling it.

"I th-thought of something," Ola said. "George V. Higgins, have you r-read anything by him?"

"No," I said.

"You sh-should. It's good. Really good. Almost only dialogue. Very Am-m-merican. Hard-boiled. The Friends of Eddie Coyle."

"Then there's Bret Easton Ellis," Asbjørn said. "Less Than Zero. Have you read that one?"

I shook my head.

"An American in his twenties. It's about a gang of kids in Los Angeles. They've got rich parents and do what they like. It's all boozing and dope and parties. But everything's utterly cold and stripped back. It's a very good novel. Kind of hyperrealistic."

"That sounds good," I said. "What was his name again?"

"Bret Easton Ellis. Remember you heard it here first!"

He laughed and looked away. I glanced at Yngve, who was talking to Jon Olav and Ingvild, he had that excited flush he sometimes had when he was trying to make a point.

"And the latest John Irving is also very good," Asbjørn said.

"Are you kidding?" I said. "John Irving's a mainstream author."

"He can still be good," Asbjørn said.

"The hell he can," I said.

"But you haven't read it!"

"No, but I know it's crap."

"Ha ha ha! You can't say that."

"I write myself, for Christ's sake. And I've read John Irving. His latest novel is poor, I know it is."

"For Christ's sake, Karl Ove," Asbjørn said.

"Imagine us sitting here, Anne!" I said. "So far from shitty Kristiansand!"

"Yes," she said. "But I don't know what I'm doing here. You know what you're doing. You're going to be a writer. But there's nothing I want to be."

"I am a writer," I said.

"You know what?" she said.

"No?" I said.

"The only thing I want to be is a legend. A real legend. I've always thought that. And I've never doubted that that's how it will be."

Asbjørn and Ola exchanged glances and laughed.

"Do you understand? I've always been sure of it."

"What kind of legend?" Asbjørn said.

"Any kind," Anne said.

"What can you do then? Sing? Write?"

"No," she said. Tears began to run down her cheeks. I looked at her at a loss to understand. Was she crying?

"I'm never going to be a legend!" she wailed.

Everyone was staring at her now.

"It's too late!" she exclaimed, and put her face in her hands. Her shoulders shook. Ola and Asbjørn burst into laughter, Yngve and Jon Olav and Ingvild sent us questioning looks.

"I'm never going to be a legend," she repeated. "I'm never going to be anything!"

"You're only twenty," I said. "It's not too late."

"Yes, it is!" Anne said.

"So?" Jon Olav said. "What do you want to be a legend for? What's the point?"

She got up and went toward the front door.

"Where are you going?" Yngve said. "You're not going, are you?"

"Yes," she said.

"Come on, stay a bit longer," he said. "You definitely won't be a legend if you leave at midnight. Come on. I've got a whole gallon of wine. Would you like a glass? It's a legendary vintage."

She smiled.

"Perhaps one glass then," she said.

Yngve got her one and the party continued. Ingvild stood by the wall with a glass in her hand, a tingle ran through me, she was so beautiful. I must go and talk to her, I thought, and went over.

"A real student party, huh!" I said.

"Yes," she said.

"Have you read anything by Ragnar Hovland by the way? He writes a lot about this sort of thing, I believe."

She shook her head.

"He's one of the teachers at the Academy. From Vestland, like you. In fact, I've got a bit of Vestland in me, too. I mean, my mom comes from Sørbøvåg after all. So I'm half a Vestlander anyway!"

She looked at me and smiled. I clinked glasses with her.

"Skål," I said.

"Skål," she said.

From the sofa I met Anne's eyes. I raised my glass to her too, and she raised hers. Jon Olav stood in the middle of the floor swaying back and forth, searching with his hand for something to lean on, found nothing and staggered a few steps to the side.

"He can't take his drink!" I laughed.

He regained his balance and, with a rigid, expressionless face, walked through the room and into the adjacent bedroom.

Where were Idar and Terje?

I went for a walk to find out. They were sitting in the kitchen chatting, their heads bowed over the table and their hands wrapped around a bottle of beer. When I returned, Ingvild was sitting beside Anne on the sofa. Anne's eyes were glazed and somehow completely disconnected with her smile.

She turned to Ingvild and said something. Ingvild took a deep breath and sat up straight, from which I concluded that what Anne had said shocked her. She replied, Anne just laughed and shook her head. I went over to them.

"I know your sort," Anne said, getting up.

"I won't stand for that," Ingvild said. "You don't know me."

"Yes, I do," Anne said.

Ingvild laughed scornfully. Anne walked past me, I sat down where she had been sitting.

"What did she say?" I asked.

"She said I was the sort who took other women's men."

"Did she say that?"

"Did you two ever go out together?" she asked.

"Us? No. Are you crazy?"

"I won't stand for that," Ingvild repeated, and got up.

"Of course not," I said. "But please don't go because of Anne. It's not very late! And it is a good party, isn't it?"

She smiled.

"I'm not going," she said. "Only to the bathroom."

I went into the bedroom. Jon Olav was lying on the bed, on his stomach with his head burrowed into the blanket and one hand hanging limply over the side. He was snoring. Arvid stood in the hall doorway.

"Hi, Knausgaard junior," he said.

"Are you going?" I said, suddenly afraid, I wanted everyone to stay and the party never to end.

"No, no," he said. "I'm going for a little walk to clear my head."

"Good!" I said, and went back into the sitting room. Ingvild wasn't there. Had she gone after all? Or was she still in the toilet?

"Won't be long now before Yngve puts on Queen," Asbjørn said to me, getting up from the stereo. "This moment always comes. When he's so drunk that the evening is as good as over. At least for him."

"I like Queen too," I said.

"What is it with you two?" he said with a laugh. "Is it genetic or was there something in the air on Tromøya? Queen! Why not Genesis? Pink Floyd? Or Rush!"

"Rush is pretty good," Yngve said from behind us. "In fact, I've got a record of theirs."

"What about Bob Dylan then? He's got such good lyrics! Ha ha ha! Yes, how he didn't get the Nobel Prize is a scandal."

"The only thing Rush and Dylan have in common is that you don't like them," Yngve said. "Rush is good in lots of ways. The guitar playing, for example. But you can't hear that."

"Now you disappoint me, Yngve," Asbjørn said. "Falling so low that you defend Rush. I'd come to terms with you liking Queen, but Rush . . . What about ELO? Jeff Lynne? Nice arrangements, eh?"

"Ha ha," Yngve said.

I went into the kitchen. Ingvild was sitting with Idar and Terje. Darkness hung over the valley below. The rain was illuminated in the light from the street lamps. She looked up at me and smiled, a touch quizzically, what now?

I smiled back, but had nothing to say, and she turned to the other two. In the sitting room the music was taken off and the murmur of voices rose for some seconds until the scratch of the stylus on a new record came through the speakers. It was the first notes of A-ha's Scoundrel Days. I liked the record, it was full of memories, and I went into the sitting room.

At that moment Asbjørn came out of the adjacent room. He strode with a determined step across the floor toward the stereo, leaned over, lifted the stylus, and took the record. Clearly, his movements were for show, almost didactic.

He held up the record and started to bend it.

The room went quiet.

Slowly he bent the record farther and farther until at last it cracked.

Arvid laughed out loud.

Yngve had been watching Asbjørn. Now Yngve turned to Arvid, poured the wine into his hair and walked out.

"What the f . . . ?" Arvid said, getting up. "I didn't do anything, did I?"

"Aren't you g-going to b-burn some b-books too?" Ola said to Asbjørn. "Make a l-little b-bonfire?"

"Why did you do that?" I said.

"Jesus," Asbjørn said. "You guys don't have to make such a fuss. I was just doing him a favor. Yngve knows me. He knows I'll buy him a new record. Perhaps not by A-ha, but a new record anyway. He's playing to the crowd."

"It might not be the material value of the record on his mind," Anne said. "You might have hurt his feelings."

"Feelings? Feelings?" Asbjørn laughed. "He's playing to the crowd!"

He sat down on the sofa and lit up. He acted as if nothing had happened, or was so drunk he didn't care, yet at the same time something came over him, either a facial expression or his body language, which suggested a guilty conscience, and then it took over, then it was obvious to everyone that he was sorry for what he had done. The music came back on, the party continued, after half an hour Yngve returned, Asbjørn said he would replace the record and soon everything was fine between them again.

After the beer ran out I had started downing wine. It was like fruit juice, and the source was inexhaustible. Now it wasn't only time that was dislocated, it was also space, I no longer knew where I was, it was as though darkness had descended between the various faces I spoke to. And how they shone. I was very close to my emotions, in that I talked completely without inhibitions, said things I never usually said and didn't know I had even thought, such as when I joined Yngve and Asbjørn and said I was so happy they were such good friends or when I went over to Ola and tried to explain how I had felt about his stammer the first times I had heard it, all while the wave which was connected with the thought of Ingvild rose within me more and more often. It was like a feeling of triumph, and while I was in the bathroom, looking at myself in the mirror, washing my hands and moistening my hair to make it stand up, smiling all the time, my thoughts coming in short jerky phrases, fucking great, oh fucking bliss on earth, oh so good, so fucking good!, I decided to make a move on her, kiss her, seduce her. I wasn't planning to invite her back to my place any more, no, there was a room upstairs on the second floor I had discovered, an old maidservant's room, no one was staying there now, it was probably used as a guest room, it was perfect.

I went into the sitting room, she was talking to Ola, the music was loud, on the verge of distortion, around them some people were dancing, I watched them until she looked at me. Then I smiled, and she smiled back.

"Can I talk to you?" I said.

"Yes," she said.

"The music's so loud here," I said. "Shall we go into the hall or something?"

She nodded. We went into the hall.

"You're so beautiful," I said.

"Was that what you wanted to say?" she laughed.

"There's a room upstairs, on the second floor. Shall we go up there? It's an old servant's room, I think."

I set off up the stairs and a moment later I heard her following me. I waited on the second floor, took her hand and led her up to the room, which was exactly as I remembered it.

I put my arms around her and kissed her. She stepped back and sat down on the edge of the bed.

"There's something I have to tell you," I said. "I'm . . . well, a kind of monster, when it comes to sex. It's a bit difficult to explain, but . . . oh, to hell with it, it doesn't matter."

I sat down beside her, put my arm around her and kissed her and laid her down and kissed her again, she was bashful and reserved, I kissed her neck, caressed her hair, slowly pulled up her sweater, kissed one breast, and she sat up and pulled down her sweater and looked at me.

"This doesn't feel right, Karl Ove," she said. "You're moving too fast."

"Yes," I said, and sat up as well. "You're right. I apologize."

"Don't apologize," she said. "Never apologize. There's nothing I hate more."

She got up.

"Are we still friends?" she said. "You know I like you very much."

"And I like you," I said. "Shall we join the others downstairs?"

We joined the others, and perhaps because her rejection had sobered me up, I suddenly saw everything very clearly.

There were very few people there. Eight, apart from us – that was the extent of the party. What for several hours had appeared to be a grand decadent human spectacle, the great student party, with quarrels and friendship, love and confidences, dancing and drinking, all borne aloft on a wave of happiness collapsed in an instant and revealed itself for what it was: Idar, Terje, Jon Olav, Anne, Asbjørn, Ola, Arvid, and Yngve. All with small glazed eyes and ungainly movements.

I wanted the party back, I wanted to be in the center again so I poured some wine and drank two glasses quickly, one after the other, and then one more, and that helped, slowly the thought of the meager turnout relaxed its grip and I sat down beside Asbjørn on the sofa.

Jon Olav came in from the bedroom. He stopped in the doorway. People clapped.

"Wahey!" Ola shouted. "Back from the dead!"

Jon Olav smiled and sat down on the chair beside me. I continued talking with Asbjørn, trying to explain to him that I also wrote about young people who drank and took dope, in as cold and stripped-back a style as that American writer Asbjørn had mentioned earlier. Jon Olav looked at us and grabbed one of the half-full bottles of beer on the table.

"Skål to Karl Ove and the Writing Academy!" he shouted. Then he laughed and took a swig of the beer. I was so angry that I stood up and leaned toward him.

"What the FUCK do you mean?" I yelled. "What the FUCK do you know about anything? I'm SERIOUS about what I do, do you understand?

Do you know what that is? Don't you dare come here and be ironic with me! You think you're so damned smart! But you study Law! Remember that! Law!"

He looked up at me, surprised and maybe a bit frightened, too.

"Don't you dare come here!" I yelled, and left the room, put on my shoes, opened the door, and went outside. My heart was beating fast, my legs were shaking. I lit a cigarette and sat down on the wet brick step. The rain was percolating down through the darkness above and landing in the small front garden with a quiet pitter-patter.

If only Ingvild would come now.

I inhaled deeply in order to do something at a slow deliberate pace. I let the smoke settle deep into my lungs before gently exhaling it again. I felt an urge to smash something. To take one of the curbstones and hurl it through the window in the door. That would give them something to think about. Twats. Fucking shitheads.

Why didn't she come?

Come on, Ingvild, come on!

Getting steadily wetter in the rain, I finally decided to stand up, threw the cigarette butt into the garden, and went to join the others. Ingvild was in the doorway talking to Yngve, they didn't see me and I stopped and tried to catch what they were saying, perhaps she was asking him questions about me, but no, they were talking about the best way home. Yngve said he would call a taxi for her if she wanted, she did, and when he turned down the music and lifted the receiver, I went into the bedroom to keep out of her way, mostly so as not to remind her of what had happened. She started to put on her coat and hat, I went into the living room and sat down on the sofa, and waved to her when she poked her head around to say good-bye. And that was fine, I was one of them, and not the person who had tried to sleep with her in the loft.

Shortly afterward Yngve ordered two more taxis, and then there were only Ola, Asbjørn, Yngve, and me left. We played records and chatted about them, stared for long spells into the air until someone made a move and put on another good song. In the end, Ola got up, he was going to take a taxi, Asbjørn went with him, and I asked Yngve if it was OK if I slept on his sofa, and it was, of course.

On waking, my first thought was the scene in the servant's room on the second floor.

Was it real? Had I dragged her up there, pushed her down on the bed, and pulled her jumper up over her breasts?

Ingvild? Who was so fragile and apprehensive and shy? Whom I loved with all my heart?

How could I have done that? What was I thinking?

What a stupid idiot I was.

I had ruined everything.

Everything.

I sat up, pulled the blanket to the side, ran my hand through my hair.

Jesus Christ.

For once none of the details of the night's events had disappeared, I remembered everything, and not only that, the images of Ingvild, the way she looked at me, which I hadn't taken in at the time, but which I grasped the full significance of now, were ever present, they quivered in my consciousness, especially when I pulled up her jumper, the look she gave me, because she didn't want it, yet she let me do it anyway, it was only when I closed my lips around her nipples that she sat up and said no.

What must she have thought? I don't want this, but he wants it so much, should I let him?

I got up and went to the window. Yngve must have been asleep, at any rate it was silent in the apartment. My head was heavy, but it wasn't bad considering how much I had drunk. What was it again? Beer on wine, not so fine. Wine on beer, never fear? I had drunk beer first, then wine, that was why.

Oh hell!

Hell, hell, hell.

What a stupid fool I was.

She was so lovely and so alive.

I went into the kitchen and drank a glass of water. The clouds over the town were dense and grayish white, the light between the houses was like milk.

From the bedroom came the sound of footsteps. I turned, Yngve appeared in just his underpants, he went into the bathroom without looking at me. He looked pale and groggy. I brewed up coffee, found some ham and cheese and salad, sliced the loaf of bread, and listened to him showering.

"So," he said as he emerged, wearing a light-blue shirt and jeans. "Was it a good party?"

"It was," I said. "But I made a terrible blunder with Ingvild, that was the only down side."

"Really?" he said. "I didn't notice. What happened?"

He poured coffee into a cup, added a drop of milk, and sat down. I blushed and looked out the window.

"I took her up to the room on the second floor and made a move."

"And?"

"She didn't want it."

"That can happen," he said, stretched for another slice of bread and buttered it. "It doesn't necessarily mean anything. Except that she didn't want it then. You were probably a lot drunker than she was, that could be the reason. It could have been too early. You don't know each other that well, do you?"

"No."

"If she's serious, I mean really serious, she might not want it to happen like that, at a party."

"I don't know," I said. "All I know is that I made a big, big blunder. Now I've scared her off. I'm sure of that."

Yngve placed a piece of ham on the bread, sliced a bit of cucumber, and raised the sandwich to his mouth. I poured coffee into a cup and took some sips.

"What are you going to do about it then?"

I shrugged.

"There's nothing I can do."

"What's done is dung and cannot be undung," he said. "Yes, a poor one, I'll admit that. Sorry. But I had a good one this summer, we ordered some shrimp, they came in a bowl and went in a flash."

"Ha ha," I said.

"You have to meet her again, as soon as possible, and then you have to apologize to her, it's as simple as that. You're sorry and it wasn't like you."

"Yes."

"Can't you invite her down here? Ola and Kjersti are coming at two. I'm going to make waffles. That would be the perfect setting."

"Do you think she'd come here again after last night? I don't think so."

"We can drive over and pick her up. You knock on the door and invite her, say I'm waiting in the car outside. If she says no, well, it's not the end of the world."

"Are you up for it?"

"Absolutely."

An hour later we got into the car and drove downhill to Danmarksplass, turned right at the crossing and headed for Fantoft. It was a Sunday, the traffic was minimal, there were already little patches of yellow in the green mountains on both sides of the valley. Autumn was here, I thought, tapping my fingers on my thigh to the music.

"I've written some lyrics for you, by the way," I said.

"Oh, fantastic!"

"Yes, but I don't think the lyrics are that fantastic. That's why I haven't shown them to you. I wrote them more than a week ago."

"What's the title?"

"'You Sway So Sweetly.'"

He laughed.

"Sounds like good pop lyrics, if you ask me."

"Mm, maybe," I said. "And now that I've told you they're done, you'll have to see them too."

"If they're no good you'll just have to write some more."

"Easier said than done."

"Are you a writer or aren't you? I only need a few verses and a chorus, then I can finish the songs. Easy enough for someone like you."

"I'll do it then."

He signaled left, we entered a large square in front of some high-rise buildings.

"Is it here?" I said.

"Haven't you been here before?"

"No."

"Dad lived here for a year, did you know that?"

"Yes, I did. Leave the car here and I'll pop up to her place."

I knew the address by heart, so after a bit of confusion I found the right block, took the lift up to her floor, went down the corridor until I saw the right number on the door, concentrated for a few seconds, then rang the bell.

I heard her footsteps inside. She opened the door, and when she saw me she almost jumped backward with the shock.

"You?" she said.

"I'd like to apologize for last night," I said. "I don't usually behave like that. I'm really sorry."

"Don't apologize," she said, and suddenly I remembered that was exactly what she had said the previous night.

"Would you like to come with me to Yngve's? He's going to make waffles. Ola and Kjersti, he was at the party last night, do you remember him, they'll be there too."

"I don't know . . . ," she said.

"Come on. It'll be nice. Yngve's outside now. He'll drive you back afterward as well."

She looked at me.

"OK then," she said. "Let me just change. Hang on a minute."

Yngve was waiting outside, leaning against his car smoking.

"Nice to see you again," he said with a smile.

"You too," she said.

"I'll sit in back," I said. "You go in front."

She did, pulled the safety belt across her chest, clicked the buckle into place, I looked at her hands, they were so attractive.

Not much was said on the way to town. Yngve asked Ingvild about her classes, and about Kaupanger, she answered, asked him about his and about Arendal, I slumped back against the seat, glad to have avoided responsibility for the conversation.

Every Tuesday evening, right through our childhood, Yngve or I made waffles. It was something we were good at, it was in our blood, so for me the following afternoon, eating waffles in the living room and drinking coffee, was not as strange and un-studenty as it was for the others, quite the contrary, the waffle iron was one of the few objects I had brought with me from home when I moved a year ago.

As in the car, I let the conversation flow without me. Sitting at the table with Yngve, Ola, Kjersti, and Ingvild, after what had happened the night before, I had everything to lose. The other three were more experienced; if I said anything it might be stupid and my inexperience would appear in flashing lights before Ingvild's eyes. No, I said as little as possible, mumbled I agree once or twice, nodded now and then, and smiled. I interspersed the conversation with the odd question to Ingvild, mostly just to show I was thinking about her and it was important to me that she was there.

"Put on a record, will you?" Yngve said. "And I'll make some more waffles."

I nodded, and while he went into the kitchen I knelt down by his record collection. I saw it as a test, it was decisive which music I chose, and in the end I opted for R.E.M.'s Document LP. By mistake I put on the second side and realized what a terrible mistake I had made just as I sat down, next to Ingvild.

This one goes out to the one I love.

I blushed.

She would think I had chosen this song to tell her. Face-to-face. This is for the girl I love.

She must think I'm an absolute jerk, I thought, looking out the window so that she couldn't see how red faced I was.

This one goes out to the one I've left behind.

No, no, no. Oh, how embarrassing!

I glanced at her, to see whether she had noticed.

She hadn't, but if she had and thought I was sending her a secret message, would she show it in any obvious way?

No.

I took a sip of coffee, wiped up the small dark seeds of the raspberry jam with the last bite of waffle on the plate, put it in my mouth, chewed, and swallowed.

"Excellent waffles," I said to Yngve, who had come into the room at that very moment.

"Yes, I used lots of eggs this time."

"The way you t-talk!" Ola said. "Anyone would think you were a c-couple of old b-biddies."

This one goes out to the one I love.

I got up and went to the bathroom, rinsed my face with cold water, avoided looking at myself, dried my hands and face on the towel hanging there, which smelled faintly of Yngve.

When I went back in, the song had finished. We sat for another half an hour, and when Ola and Kjersti were about to go, I said that maybe it wouldn't be a bad idea if we went too, in fact I had a lot going on tomorrow, and Ingvild said, yes, she did too, and five minutes later we were in Yngve's car again, heading at full speed for Fantoft.

Ingvild got out, waved to us, Yngve turned the car and started to drive back to town.

"That went well, didn't it?" he said.

"Do you think so?" I said. "Did she enjoy herself?"

"Ye-es. I'm sure she did."

"The waffles were good anyway."

"They were."

Not a lot more was said before he dropped me outside my building. I jumped out, thanked him for the lift, closed the door, and ran up the three steps to the door as he turned the corner.

I had imagined it would be good to get home, but the smell of the freshly cleaned floor and bed linen, which still hung in the air, reminded me of the plans I'd had before the evening started, imagining I would wake up here with Ingvild this morning, and a new wave of despair and anger at myself washed in over me, as well as all my feelings about the Academy, which launched themselves at me from all sides. The typewriter, the books, the plastic bag with my notebook, the pens, yes, even the sight of the clothes I had worn there depressed me and filled me with a sense of hopelessness.

Bonfire of books, Ola had said, and I understood the need for it very well, just toss everything you didn't like and didn't want, all life's detritus, into the flames and start afresh.

What a fantastic thought. Lug all my clothes, all my books, and all my records into the park, pile them up on the grass, plus my bed and desk, typewriter, diaries, and all the damned letters I had received, in fact everything that carried the tiniest hint of a memory: into the fire with it. Oh, the flames licking up at the dark night sky, all the neighbors flocking to their windows, what's going on, well, it's just our young neighbor purging his life, he wants to make a new start, and he's right, I'd like to do that too.

And then all of a sudden bonfire after bonfire, the whole of Bergen aflame at night, helicopters with TV cameras hovering above, reporters in dramatic mode, saying Bergen is ablaze tonight, what is happening, they appear to be lighting to the fires themselves.

I sat down on the chair by my desk, the sofa and the bed were too soft and giving, I wanted something harder. I rolled a cigarette and lit it, but it was too crooked and saggy, I stubbed it out after a few puffs, there was a packet of cigarettes in my jacket pocket, wasn't there, yes, much better, and then, staring down at the table I tried to do a reality check, look at the situation as rationally and objectively as I could. The Writing Academy, it had been a defeat, but first of all, was it such a problem that I couldn't write poems? No. Secondly, was this always going to be the case? Couldn't I teach myself, couldn't I develop over the year? Yes, of course. And if I was going to develop I would have to be open and, importantly, unafraid to make mistakes. Ingvild, with her I had made a fool of myself, once by being boring and reticent, once by coming on to her much too quickly and with force. In other words, I had been insensitive. I hadn't taken her wishes into account sufficiently. That was the point. I hadn't considered her feelings, only my own. But, of course, I had been drunk, that did happen now and then, it happened to everyone. And, on top of that, if she had any feelings for me, surely that wouldn't ruin everything? If she had any feelings for me surely she would be able to put herself in my shoes too and understand how things turned out the way they did? Fortunately, we had two previous meetings to build on, one in Førde, when everything had gone like a dream, and the other in the canteen, when at least we had chatted normally. And there were the letters. They were funny, I knew that, or at least they weren't boring. Moreover, I was attending the Writing Academy, so I wasn't like all the other students, I was going to be a writer, people found that interesting and exciting, perhaps Ingvild did too, although she hadn't said as much. And then there was the waffle session at Yngve's that we'd just had, that did a little to remedy the impression I had made the previous night, now at least she could see how nice Yngve was, and as we were brothers, the notion that I was nice as well might not be too distant.

At around seven I went down and rang the bell at Jon Olav's.

"Good to see you!" he said with a smile. "Come in. We've got a little debriefing to do."

"Good to see you too," I said, and followed him in. He brewed some tea and we sat down.

"I'm sorry I shouted at you," I said. "But I don't want to apologize."

He laughed.

"Why not? Are you too proud?"

"I was angry when you said what you said. I can't apologize for that."

"No," he said. "I went too far there. But you were too much. You were almost manic."

"I was just drunk."

"I was also drunk."

"No hard feelings?" I said.

"No hard feelings. But did you mean what you said? That Law is nothing?"

"Of course not. I had to say something."

"I don't have much time for the legal milieu myself," he said. "I see Law primarily as a tool."

He looked at me.

"Now you have to say that you see writing as a tool!"

"Are you at it again?" I said.

He laughed.

When I returned I lay down on the bed and stared at the ceiling. I could still be friends with Jon Olav. That was no problem. But not with Ingvild, that was quite a different matter and much more complicated. The question was basically what to do. What had happened had happened and couldn't be undone. For the future, though, what could I do? What would be best?

I had taken the initiative twice now, invited her out today and yesterday. If she was interested she would contact me, drop by, she knew where I lived, or write a letter. It was up to her. I couldn't invite her out again, that would be too pushy and now I had no idea if she was really interested in me and needed a sign.

The sign would be her coming over.

That was how it would have to be.

I didn't expect any moves on the Monday after Yngve's party, it was too early, Ingvild wouldn't contact me that evening, I knew that, yet still I sat waiting and hoping; whenever I heard footsteps in the street I leaned forward and peeped out the window. If someone stopped on the steps, I froze. But of course it wasn't her, I went to bed, another day dawned, more rain and mist, another evening spent waiting and hoping. Tuesday was a more realistic bet, she would have had time to think, distanced herself from what had happened and her real feelings would have had time to develop. Someone walking in the street: over to the window. Someone on the steps: I froze. But no, it was too early, tomorrow maybe?

No.

Thursday then?

No.

Friday, would she come with a bottle of wine we could share?

No.

On Saturday I wrote her a letter, even though I knew I wouldn't mail it, she was the one who had to take the initiative, she was the one who had to make an approach.

In the evening I heard music coming from Morten's room in the basement, we hadn't spoken since the last time at Høyden when he was so desperate, I thought I could join him for a little while, I hadn't spoken to a living soul all day and was hungry for company. I went downstairs and knocked on his door, no one answered, but I knew he was there, so I opened it.

Morten was kneeling on the floor, his hands folded and outstretched. On a chair in front of him sat a girl. She was leaning back with her legs crossed. Morten turned to me, his eyes crazed, I closed the door and hurried back to my room.

He came up next morning, said he had made a last-ditch attempt, but it had led nowhere, it had failed, she didn't want him. Nevertheless he was in good spirits, it shone through his stiff body language and formality of expression, what radiated from him was not despair but warmth.

To me he was like a character from one of the many Stompa books I had read when I was smaller, a young Norwegian boy at a boarding school in the 1950s.

I told him about Ingvild, he advised me to go and see her, sit down with her and tell her everything.

"Tell it as it is!" he said. "What have you got to lose? If she loves you she'll obviously be happy to hear it."

"But I have already," I said.

"When you were drunk, yes! Do it now that you're sober. It requires courage. And that'll impress her."

"The blind leading the blind," I said. "I saw you in action downstairs, didn't I?"

He laughed.

"But I'm not you. What works for one person doesn't necessarily work for another. I think the two of us should pay a visit to Christian one evening. We can take Rune along. All of us. What do you say?"

"I don't have a phone," I said. "So if Ingvild wants to get hold of me she would have to walk up here. And I'd have to be at home."

Morten got up.

"Naturally. But I don't think staying on the premises is the be-all and end-all."

"I don't, either. But I'd like to be here anyway."

"OK, we'll wait then. Goodnight, my friend."

"Goodnight."

I went out and called Yngve, he wasn't home, I remembered it was Sunday and he was probably working at the hotel. I rang Mom. We first went through events in my life, that is, at the Academy, then through events in hers. She was looking for somewhere new to live, and she was working hard on plans to introduce an engineering course at her school.

"We must try to meet soon," she said. "Perhaps you and Yngve could come to Sørbøvåg one weekend? It's a long time since you've been there. We could all meet up."

"Good idea," I said.

"I'm busy next weekend. What about the weekend after?"

"I'll see what I can do. Yngve has to be free too."

"Let's start there then. And we'll see what happens."

It really was a good idea. Grandma and Grandpa's farm was a completely different world because it was rife with childhood memories, untouched somehow, as I was there so seldom and because of its location, on a little hill with a view of the fjord and the mountain behind, so close to the sea, far away from everything. It would be wonderful to spend a few days there, where no one cared about what I was or what I wasn't, I had always been enough for them.

This week we were going through short prose at the Academy. The pointillist novel was all the rage, a form whose Norwegian history began with Paal-Helge Haugen's Anne, from what we were told, this and other pointillist novels were situated somewhere between prose, the line, that is, and poetry, the point. I read it, and it was fantastic, permeated with darkness much like Paul Celan's "Death Fugue," but I couldn't write like that, there was no chance, I didn't know what created this permeation of darkness. Even though I went through sentence by sentence, it was impossible to say, it wasn't in any defined place, wasn't conjured up by any particular words, it was immanent everywhere in the same way that a mood is immanent in a mind. Mood isn't in a particular thought or a particular part of the brain, nor in a particular part of the body, such as a foot or an ear, it is everywhere, but nothing in itself, more like a color in which thoughts are thought, a color through which the world is seen. There was no such color in what I wrote, no such hypnotic or evocative mood, in fact there was no mood at all, and that was the heart of the problem, I assumed, the very reason I wrote so badly and immaturely. The question was whether you could acquire such a color or mood. Whether I could fight my way there or whether it was something you either had or you didn't have. At home, writing, I thought what I did was good, and then came the round of critique at the Academy, where the same was said every time, a bit of polite praise for appearance's sake, such as, there's a lively narrative style, before they weighed in with clichéd, stereotyped, perhaps even tedious. But what hurt me most was that my writing was immature. When the prose course began we were given a simple task, we had to write about one day or the start of a day, and I wrote about a young man waking up in his rented room to the sound of the mail, he slept on the other side of the wall to the mailbox, and it made a racket. After breakfast he went out, on the way he saw a girl, whom I described, and whom he decided to follow. When I read this out the atmosphere became rather uncomfortable. They came up with the usual vague praise, said it was good, said it was easy to visualize, suggested I delete this and that. . . It was only when it came to Trude's turn that what I had sensed in the air was articulated. It's so immature! she protested. Listen:. . . he looked at her well-formed 501 bottom. I mean, honestly, a well-formed 501 bottom?! She's just an object, and, not only that, he stalks her as well! Had this been an exploration of immaturity and the objectification of women I wouldn't have said anything, but there's nothing in the text that suggests it is. In short, it's a bit creepy to read, she concluded. I tried to defend myself, conceded she had made some good points, but insisted my text dealt with exactly what she had said and there was a distance in the writing. I could of course have added a meta-level in the text, I said, as Kundera does, but I didn't want to, I tried to stay on the same level as the character.

"That isn't apparent from what I read anyway," Trude said.

"No," I said. "Maybe it isn't visible enough."

"I thought it was fun!" said Petra, who for some reason often defended me during these critique sessions. Presumably because she also wrote prose. Whenever we discussed our texts feelings became heated and more and more often the group tended to divide into two camps: on one side were those of us who wrote mainly prose and, on the other, those who wrote poetry, with Nina, who wrote equally brilliantly in both genres, in the middle. Not that she said that much, she was perhaps the one student who found it hardest to formulate her views orally, it was almost impossible to grasp what her opinion was, if she had an opinion at all, that is. Judging by what she said, it didn't seem so, it was all vague, completely directionless, she might just as well have been presenting arguments about coats as about literature, but what she wrote was crystal clear, not in the sense that her opinions became coherent there, no, it was the language, her sentences, they were as clear and exquisite as glass. She was the best, Trude was the next best, then Knut. Petra, whose sentences resembled beetles at the bottom of a bucket, wasn't in the competition, I figured, she wasn't the finished article in the way that the other three were, but one day she would utterly outshine them, her talent was so obvious and it lay in her unpredictability: anything could happen in her texts, it was impossible to predict from the person she was or what she wrote, with the others you often could, but not with Petra, something unusual or unexpected was always in the cards. I was at the bottom, with Kjetil. The last two students, Else Karin and Bjørg, were above us, they'd both had novels published, in a way they were full-fledged writers, and what they handed in was also always accomplished and reliable. But sparks never flew in their writing in the way that they did in Nina's and Petra's, they were more like two horses hauling logs through the forest in the winter, it was heavy work, they made slow progress, their eyes were firmly set on the path ahead.

If I was at the bottom I had to rise. If I accepted that I belonged down there, in the terrible abyss of immaturity and ineptitude, I had failed. I couldn't fail. After a stint at the Academy, I weakened and told myself it was right, I wasn't a writer, I had no business being there, but never for long, maximum one evening, then my mind rose up in opposition, it wasn't right, I might not be a writer now, but this was a temporary state that had to be, and would be, overcome, and when I woke in the morning, showered, and packed my things to go to the Academy, it was with a newfound self-confidence.

Rounding off the week at either Wesselstuen or Henrik had started to become a habit. I hadn't gone along the first two Fridays, but this afternoon I decided I couldn't sit at home waiting every single weekend, and if Ingvild were to stop by this evening of all evenings, she would probably leave a note.

During the month we had been at the Academy, we had got to know the teachers better and better, they weren't stiff and uncomfortable anymore even though I had a suspicion the awkwardness would never quite go, it was in their characters and nature, especially in Fosse, who had less of the outgoing spirit that Hovland revealed with his repartee and the constant, though slightly evasive, glint in his eye. No such repartee with Fosse, no such glint. But he still came close to us, expressed his opinions about what we were discussing, at first in a serious tone, but that often dissipated into laughter, in his rather sniffling, semi-giggling way, and sometimes he told us anecdotes about experiences he'd had, which, taken as a whole, gave us a picture of who he was. Not a complete one though because he was a very private person, like Hovland, who hardly ever spoke about anything to do with his private life, but with what they revealed of themselves in class there was enough for me to have a sense of who they were. Fosse was shy, but also self-assured, to a very high degree, he knew who he was and what he was good at, the shyness was more like a cloak he had wrapped around himself. With Hovland it was the opposite, I established, with him the shyness was protected by his quick tongue and ironic sense of humor. It was obvious that Hovland and Fosse both liked and respected each other, although what they wrote was like night and day. Twice they had sung a children's song – Blåmann, blåmann bukken min – at the end of the evening.

We walked up the gentle slope from Nøstet, put down our umbrellas, shook and closed them, went up to the first floor at Henrik, found a table, ordered beers, and chatted. It was several days since the immaturity comment had been made, and I had come up with a new idea for a novel, inspired somewhat by the handful of novels I had read by Borges and Cortázar that week, also any thoughts about Ingvild had been entirely lost in all the prevailing tensions at the Academy, so I was in a relatively good mood. After maybe an hour most of us had drunk enough for the limits on what could be said and what could not, which everyone felt to varying degrees, started to loosen. Jon Fosse was describing his childhood and he said that at a certain point he could have ended up on the streets. Petra laughed in derision. You could not, she declared. You're just mythologizing your own past. On the streets, right! Ha ha ha. No, no, Fosse insisted in his quiet way, looking down at the table, that was precisely how it had been. He could have been on the streets. Who's ever heard of a street urchin in a village? Petra countered. No, this was Bergen, Fosse replied. Everyone listening to this exchange was ill at ease. Fortunately Petra dropped the topic. The evening continued, more beer was drunk, the atmosphere was good, until Jon Fosse got up to go to the bar. The street urchin wants some beer, Petra said. Jon Fosse didn't respond, got his beer, came back, sat down. Petra taunted him with another gibe a little later, in the same way, calling him a street urchin. Eventually, he rose to his feet.

"Well, I can't be bothered with this," he said, put on his jacket and went down the stairs.

Petra laughed as she looked down at the table.

"Why did you do that? You made him leave," Trude said.

"Ach, he's so pompous and self-important. On the streets . . . "

"But you didn't have to bully him. What good could that do?" I said. "We wanted him here. We thought it was fun drinking with him."

"Since when have you been our rep?"

"Come on. You behaved very badly," Knut said.

"Jon's a nice friendly man. There's no reason to treat him like that," Else Karin said.

"Now all of you just give it up," Petra said. "You're a bunch of hypocrites. Everyone thought what he said about ending up on the streets was ridiculous."

"I didn't," I said.

"No, because you're another one who'd like to be a street urchin. Street urchin! Have you ever heard anything so stupid!"

"Now let's drop this," Knut said. "You apologize on Monday if you dare."

"I certainly won't," Petra said. "But we can drop it. I agree. It's a trivial matter."

Everything was different after Fosse had gone, people packed up and left one by one soon after, apart from Petra and me – we went to Café Opera. She asked if she could crash at my place, I said, of course, and we found ourselves a table and carried on drinking. I told her about my new idea for a novel. So, it would consist of a variety of dialogues, people talking in various contexts, in cafés, on buses, in parks, and all the conversations would be about central themes in these people's lives, so they spoke about something important, one said he had just been told he had cancer, for example, or a son had been sent to prison, perhaps for a murder, but then, I told Petra – who was listening, though not looking at me, apart from an occasional fleeting glance, followed by one of her equally fleeting smiles – but then, the context for these conversations is slowly revealed. There was a man recording them on tape. Why did he do that? I said to Petra, well, come on, tell me, she answered, I smiled, she smiled, well, that's what I'm working on, I said. Well, he belongs to, or is employed by, an organization. In all towns of a certain size there are people who work for this organization, they all go around recording conversations, which are written down and filed away somewhere, and this isn't something that started this year, it's been going on since time immemorial. I think there are conversations in existence from the Middle Ages, and from antiquity, thousands upon thousands of them, all in some way important for the respective individuals.

"And?" Petra said.

"And? Nothing else. That's it. Do you believe it?"

"I think it's a fun idea. But why?"

"Why what?"

"Why do they collect conversations? What do they do with them?"

"I'm not quite sure. I suppose they just document them."

"Now I remember what this reminds me of. Wim Wenders's Wings of Desire. Have you seen it? There are some angels going around and listening to people's thoughts."

"But these are conversations. And they're not angels."

"Yes, yes, but have you seen it?"

"A long time ago. But that wasn't what I was thinking of. Not at all, in fact."

And it was true, I hadn't had that film in my mind for one second, although I understood what she meant, there was a similarity.

"Do you want another beer?" I said, getting up.

"Please," she said.

In the queue I scanned the room to see if Ingvild might have come, which I had been doing ever since I set foot in Café Opera, but she was nowhere to be seen. I raised two fingers in the air and saw the almost imperceptible twitch in the barman's eye that told me he had registered the order, not without a mild sense of pride, I was an old hand at this game now.

What if they were angels?

That would solve everything! They were collecting material for a bible in reverse, one about humans they couldn't understand. For them humanity was incomprehensible! So they analyzed these conversations!

I placed the two large beers on the table and sat down.

"I've heard you shouldn't talk about what you're planning to write," I said.

"Why not?" Petra said, not that interested, she was staring into the distance and her lips slid over her teeth the way they did when she was thinking about something else or when I imagined she was thinking about something else.

"You should keep your powder dry, in a way," I said. "Save it."

"Ach, that's just what people say. You do as you like. If you want to talk about it, you just talk away to your heart's content."

"Maybe you're right," I said.

I always felt so pure and innocent when I was with her, like a squeaky-clean middle-class son, the teacher's pet, good at school but zero at life. She told me that in recent weeks she had gone out nearly every night, on her own in the bar at Wesselstuen, and men always came up and bought her a drink, she didn't spend a single krone all night, she said, and did nothing in return, except listen to them, not even that sometimes. It amused her, these men were entertaining, she said, and she would never have met them otherwise. I didn't understand what pleasure she could derive from that, but I respected her, admired her even, for it, I had read Bukowski and Kerouac of course and all the other books about people hanging out in bars drinking, and I had been drawn to life in the glittering shadows ever since gymnas, but I didn't know it, didn't go there myself, to sit alone in a bar chatting with strangers would have been inconceivable for me, it was closer to my nature to make waffles alone in my room, I reflected, that at least was the feeling Petra evoked in me, I was that type, a shallow happy-go-lucky kid who was always calling Mom and was a bit afraid of Dad. She got off her high horse when she sat with me, and I didn't understand why, but I was happy she did and so I just had to put up with her laughing at me and making derogatory comments. She did that to everyone anyway.

I looked behind me at all the small knolls, the heads.

Ingvild?

No.

Anyone else I knew?

No.

I looked at my watch. Half past eleven.

Angels studying the bible in reverse!

Could I pull that one off?

"I'm writing a short story about a hairdresser's," Petra said. "There are two dogs lying in a basket. This is my idea!"

"I'm sure it'll be really good," I said.

"Talking about it isn't a problem anyway," she said, and smiled as her eyes narrowed into a sudden sneer.

"Hello," said a familiar voice behind me.

It was Yngve.

"Hello!" I said. "I was hoping you would be out tonight."

"I'm just nosing around. I've come from work, thought I'd see if there was anyone here I knew."

"Get yourself a beer and sit down! This is Petra, by the way, from the Academy. This is my brother, Yngve."

"Guessed as much," Petra said.

When he sat down a few minutes later I was a bit concerned that Petra would give him a hard time, in her eyes he would seem pretty straitlaced, but that didn't happen at all, on the contrary, they chatted while I leaned back and drank beer and relaxed and listened with half an ear. Petra asked Yngve what he was studying, and that alone was unexpected. Perhaps it was the Fosse incident that had forced her to pull herself together. Yngve started telling Petra about a book by Baudrillard on America, she was interested and I was happy. She got up to go to the bathroom, Yngve said he liked her, she was nice, I said yes, but she's got a terrible tongue on her when the mood takes her.

We stood in the taxi queue outside Wesselstuen, we waited twenty minutes, then we were in the backseat of an elegant low-slung Mercedes gliding through the rain-gleaming streets up to my place. I paid, checked there wasn't a message by the front door or the door to my room, unlocked it, not caring what Petra might think about what she saw, which I would have with almost anyone else, made some tea, put on some Velvet Underground, who for some reason I associated with her, perhaps it was her cynicism and urbanity that did it. She said Yngve was nice and asked how we got along, I answered that we had a good relationship, but I might be too dependent on him in Bergen, at least that thought had gone through my head, I didn't have any of my own friends, except for those at the Academy, so I had to rely on Yngve. Once a little brother, always a little brother, she commented. We smoked our cigarettes, I said I didn't have a spare duvet, but she could have mine, she snorted and said the bedspread was enough, she would sleep in her clothes, that wasn't a problem, she often did that. OK, I replied, but what about a sheet? She snorted again, as you wish, I said, and stood up.

Should I get undressed in front of her? Or sleep with my clothes on too?

No, to hell with it, I lived here, I thought, and started getting undressed. She turned away and fidgeted with something or other until I was in bed, supporting myself on one elbow. She looked at me.

"What's that there? Ugh, how revolting!" she said. "Have you got three nipples?"

What on earth was she talking about?

I looked down at my nipples.

She was right. An extra nipple had grown next to one of the original two, just as big.

Horrified, I held it between thumb and forefinger.

Could it be cancer?

"Yuck!" she said. "If I'd known you were a freak I wouldn't have stayed here."

"Relax," I said. "It's just a pimple. It's grown in a pore or whatever you call them. Look now!"

I squeezed the new nipple and a yellow blob squirted onto my chest.

"Ugh! Ugh! What are you doing!" she said.

I got up, took a towel from the cupboard and wiped the pus, looked down at my chest, which was back to normal now, and got into bed.

"Will you turn off the light?" I said.

She nodded, went over to the switch and pressed it, sat down on the sofa, swung her legs up, and pulled the white bedspread over her.

"Goodnight," I said.

"Goodnight," she said.

I woke to her walking through the room and sat up.

"Are you going?" I said.

"I guess so," she said. "It's nine. Sorry to wake you up."

"No problem," I said. "Don't you want any breakfast?"

She shook her head.

"What a racket you made last night. Do you remember?"

"No."

"You stood up, threw the duvet on the floor, and stamped on it, really hard again and again. 'What are you doing?' I said. 'There's a mink in the duvet!' you shouted. I almost died laughing. What a sight that was."

"Is that true? I don't remember anything."

"It's true. Thanks for the use of the sofa. See you!"

I heard her walk through the hall, heard the front door open and shut, her footsteps round the corner and fade as she went down the hill. A vague image of an animal appeared, it was between the duvet cover and the duvet, I remembered it and remembered throwing down my duvet in fear and disgust. I had no memory of stamping on it at all. How spooky. For all I knew, there might have been scenes like that here every night.

Two evenings later there was a ring at the door, I jumped up, absolutely convinced it was Ingvild, who else could it be?

Jon Olav.

He wondered what had happened to me, was I writing twenty-four hours a day or what?

Yes, it was a bit like that.

He asked me if I felt like going out for a beer, Sunday was a good day for it, everything was so still and peaceful.

I said probably not, I had a lot to do.

"OK," he said, getting up and putting on his jacket. "Thanks for the chat."

"Thank you. Are you going out anyway?"

"I'll see. By the way, I met Ingvild yesterday."

"Oh? Where?"

"There was a party in Møhlenpris. Loads of people."

"What did she say?"

"Nothing special. Actually I didn't talk to her that much."

"Anyone else I knew there?"

"Yes, lots. Several of those at Yngve's party. Asbjørn and Ola, was that his name? Very nice guy anyway."

"Yes, he is," I said. "Whose party was it?"

"I don't know. I went with some friends of friends. It was big. Half of Høyden was there."

"I was home," I said.

"So you said. You could catch up now."

"I feel like a drink, but no."

"OK. I respect a man who has self-discipline!"

He left, and I sat down to write. I had three complete conversations now and was going to try to finish a fourth before I went to bed. This one takes place in a café, the two participants are criminals and they become edgy and evasive when they catch sight of the microphone the collator positions on the table, they soon leave.

I went to bed early and fell asleep at once as usual. At seven I was woken by a dream, which was a very rare occurrence.

I had been dreaming about a party with Yngve and Ingvild. I went into the hall, stopped by the living-room door, they were standing at the far end, by a window. Ingvild looked at me, then she tilted her head and Yngve kissed her.

I lay back in bed.

Ingvild was going out with Yngve.

That was why she hadn't come.

I brooded over it all morning. I believed in dreams, I believed they told you something about life and at a deeper level were always true. If so, the image had been unmistakable. They were standing together, Ingvild saw me and then she kissed Yngve.

Surely that couldn't be true?

Dear God, tell me it isn't so!

But I knew it was, and the truth burned inside me all day. The whole of my body ached, my stomach churned, at times I could barely breathe, my heart was beating so fast.

Oh God, tell me it isn't true.

Suddenly it all changed. A dream? Was I a complete moron? Who believed in dreams?

It was only a dream.

I found my running shoes and the old tracksuit I had once been given by Yngve, which I regarded as a good omen, he had never wished me any ill, and then I went into the street and began to run. I hadn't run since I lived in Northern Norway, I was gasping for breath after only a few hundred meters. But I had to smash this ridiculous idea, crush it, and my method was to wear myself out, run and run until there was nothing left to run with, and then take a hot shower and sit reading a neutral novel of some kind, which dealt with anything other than love, and then, as tired as a child after a long day, go to bed, hopefully to wake up refreshed the next morning, free of jealousy and unfounded suspicions.

It didn't quite go according to plan, the image stayed with me all week, but it didn't torture me in the same way, there was a lot to think about in connection with classes, and when I called Yngve to arrange the details for the trip to Sørbøvåg I noticed nothing unusual about him.

It had just been a dream.

We had Friday free, and I planned to catch the boat north on Thursday afternoon, although Yngve couldn't come until the day after. Mom was taking the Friday off and would pick me up from the quay at Rysjedalsvika.

The rain was teeming down as I jumped off the bus by Fisketorget and walked over to Strandkai Terminal, where the boat was moored with the engines running, waiting for passengers. The water level in Vågen was high, the bluish-gray sea bobbed up and down, a very different density from the angry raindrops lashing the surface. I bought a round-trip ticket from the office window, crossed the quay, went up the gangway on board, found myself a seat at the very front so that I could see the countryside through the large sloping front windows while it was still light.

Hydrofoil had been one of the magic words in my childhood, along with catamaran and hovercraft. I didn't know for sure, but I assumed this boat with its split hull was a hydrofoil. I still liked the word.

Through the side windows I saw passengers arriving with suitcases and bags, heads tucked into their coats beneath the rain, moments later they sat down around me, all performing the same series of movements. Waterproofs had to be removed, umbrellas closed and placed on the racks above the seats, bags placed on the floor under the back of the chair, tray tables raised and vacant seats pulled down before they could slump into their own seat with a sigh. The snack bar at the back of the boat, where you could get newspapers and coffee, hot dogs and chocolate, was open. Most of the passengers appeared to be from the rural areas of Sogn og Fjordane, there was something about the way they dressed that you rarely saw in Bergen, but also about the way they behaved, as though the thought that someone could see them had never occurred to them, and maybe also about their physiognomy, that is, their facial features and body types. In the weeks I had lived here I had started to recognize certain Bergen faces, there were similarities, whether they were boys, elderly women, or middle-aged men they had some common features I hadn't seen elsewhere.

Among these faces there were hundreds, indeed probably thousands, which were not similar. They disappeared, dissolved the moment they had passed, while the Bergen faces returned, oh, there was that type! Bergen had been a town ever since the early Middle Ages, and I liked the idea that Håkon's Hall and Saint Mary's Church weren't the only remnants of those times, as well as the countryside of course, and that the crooked trading houses in Bryggen weren't the only remnants of the fifteenth century, but also the various facial features, appearing and reappearing in new generations, still visible around town. I saw elements of the same faces in the people around me on the boat, except that I associated them with the farms and villages of the fjord landscapes to the north. Mom told me that in her grandparents' time they used to attribute specific characteristics to people from the various farms. This family was like this, that family was like that, and the idea was inherited down through the generations. That mode of thinking belonged to a completely different era and was basically incomprehensible to me, who hadn't come from any of the places I had grown up in, unlike all the others there. Everything was first generation with me, everything was happening as if for the first time, nothing, neither bodies, faces, customs, nor language, originated in that place or had been bound up with it for a longer period, and so couldn't be viewed in that way.

Actually there were only two forms of existence, I reflected: one that was tied to a place and one that wasn't. Both had always existed. Neither could be chosen.

I got up and went behind to the snack bar, bought a coffee and a chocolate Daim, and as I folded down the table and put the cup in the tiny round hollow, the mooring ropes were thrown on board, the gangway was lifted, and the engine revs increased. The hull trembled and shook. Slowly the boat moved forward as it swung to the left and soon the bows were facing the islands off Bergen. I closed my eyes, enjoyed the throb of the boat, the regular hum that rose and sank, and fell asleep.

When I opened my eyes I saw the contours of an enormous forest stretching back and, behind it, in the distance, a range of mountains.

So, not far to go.

I got to my feet and walked to the stern, up the stairs, and onto the deck. It was empty and as I approached the railings, no longer sheltered by the superstructure, the wind was so strong that it almost upended me. I held on tight and was laughing inside with joy because not only was the wind full of raindrops, which beat against my face, but darkness had fallen and the immense wake behind us was a luminous white.

Only when the lights of the ferry terminal became visible, just a few small twinkling dots in the dense darkness, still far off, although – because of the boat's great speed – we would soon be gliding alongside, illuminating the waiting room, the ticket office window, the two buses, some cars, and a crowd of people about to either embark or meet someone, only then did I go back in.

Mom was one of those waiting with their arms down by their sides and head bowed in the rain and wind, she waved to me, I went over and gave her a hug, and as we walked toward the car the express ferry was already roaring into the distance.

"Great to see you," she said.

"Ditto," I said, and got in. "How are things?"

"Good, I think," she said. "There's a lot to do, but it's interesting work, so I'm not grumbling."

We drove through the forest and came out by the bay on the other side, by the shipyard where Kjartan worked. There was an enormous hull visible in a dock hall or a dock. Kjartan crawled through shafts and small passages fitting pipes, and when he talked about his work it was not without a certain pride in his voice, although he did admit he was a mediocre, if not poor, pipefitter, it lay so far from who he was, it was such an ill-suited occupation for him and had been ever since he joined the proletariat at the end of the 1970s. He was also the safety rep at the shipyard, which had occupied a lot of his time, from what I gathered.

A steep climb up a forest-clad mountain, over the summit and down the other side, to Hyllestad, the municipal center at the end of Åfjorden, along the fjord to Salbu, where Grandma and Grandpa's and Kjartan's houses stood on top of a little hill.

Rain fell across the cones of light as Mom parked in the yard, and when she switched off the headlamps it was as if for a moment the deluge had stopped until the engine died and the rat-a-tat-tat on the roof and hood took over.

I got out, took my bag, stepped across the soft gravel and opened the front door.

Oh, that smell.

I hung my jacket on the hook above Grandpa's overalls, moved back a couple of steps to make room for Mom, who hung up her coat, put her bag at the foot of the stairs, and went into the living room.

Grandma was in the chair beside the window at the back, Grandpa on the sofa beneath the window in the long wall, both watching TV with the volume deafeningly loud.

"Well, look who it is," Grandpa said.

"Hi," I said.

"Yes, the Norwegian population is growing!" he said.

"Think I've stopped growing now," I said, and turned to Grandma, wanting in some way or other to greet her with more warmth, but I couldn't exactly give her a hug where she was sitting, I had never done that and I never would. She held one arm across her chest, as if in a sling, it trembled and shook. Her head shook too and her feet were stretched out on a stool. How's everything, Grandma? No, I couldn't say that.

I walked toward her and smiled.

She looked at me and her mouth moved.

I went up to her and lowered my head to hers.

She had almost no voice left, all I heard was a breathy whisper.

What did she say?

Hi.

Her eyes smiled.

"I came by boat," I said. "The rain's terrible."

Yes.

I straightened up and looked at the door as Mom came in.

"Shall we make some supper?" she said.

The next morning I slept until twelve and went down in time for lunch, which they always had at this time here. Mom had made potato dumplings, we ate them in the kitchen, the mist hung heavy in the air and the leaves on the tall birch outside the window were yellow and glistened with moisture.

After lunch, while they rested, I went for a stroll around the five-acre property. Beyond the little mere, which was black and covered with water-lily leaves alongside the banks, rose the spruce-clad hillside, silent and somber against the low sky. I wandered over to the barn, even more sunken and run-down than I remembered, opened the door to the animals on the ground floor, the three cows shifted in their stalls, the one farthest away turned its head and watched me with its gentle eyes. I walked past them and through the low door leading to the barn. It was half full of hay, I climbed to the edge of the loft and swung myself up, poked my head into what had once been a henhouse, and where there were still feathers on the floor, even though it must have been ten years since a hen had roosted on a perch here.

I would have to bring Ingvild here one day.

This was such a happy thought, that she might sit on the sofa and chat with Grandpa, chat with Mom, and see this world here, which was so magical for me. At the same time there was something almost criminal about the idea, something transgressive and forbidden, of bringing two completely different worlds together in this way: if I saw her on the sofa I would immediately realize that she didn't belong there.

I went onto the barn bridge and lit a cigarette, shielded it with my hand against the drizzle, which was turning into rain. Mom appeared outside the house, she opened the car door and got in, drove toward me so that she could turn. I went down to find out where she was going.

"I'm off down to the shop. Want to come with me?"

"No, I think I'll do a bit of writing."

"OK. Is there anything you want?"

"Some newspapers would be nice."

She nodded, turned, and drove back down. Soon afterward her car passed me on the road below.

I tossed my cigarette where they usually burned paper and went indoors. Both of them had got up, they were in the kitchen. I quietly closed the door behind me, thought of going up to my room and trying to write a bit, but then I saw something through the open door and stopped. Grandma lifted her trembling hand and took a swipe at Grandpa, which with some fumbling footwork he managed to sidestep. She sat down in her wheelchair, paddled it with her feet and took another swipe. He stepped to the side again. All this went on in eerie slow motion and without a sound. Grandpa went out the other door, into the living room, and Grandma maneuvered her chair back to the table with tiny feet movements.

Upstairs in my room, I lay on the bed. My heart was pounding with agitation at what I had just witnessed. It had been like a dance, the grisly dance of the aged.

I had never considered what the relationship between my grandmother and grandfather was like, in fact, I had never thought they even had a relationship. But they had been married for what would soon be fifty years, they had lived on this modest farm, brought up four children, struggled and toiled to make ends meet. Once they had been young, as I was now, with their lives ahead of them, as I had mine. I had never considered that, either, not seriously.

Why did she try to hit him?

She was heavily medicated, which made her paranoid, gave her delusions, that was why.

I knew that, but it didn't help, the image of the two of them was stronger.

Through the floor I could hear the radio, the weather forecast and the news. I could imagine him sitting right next to it with one hand under his ear, staring straight ahead, unless his eyes were closed in concentration.

Grandma trembling in the kitchen.

The impact of what I had seen was so overwhelming that I got up and went downstairs in an attempt to smooth things over, my presence might reestablish a kind of normality, I thought vaguely, as the steps creaked beneath me and the sight of the gray telephone on the table under the mirror reminded me of the old telephone they'd had, the one hanging on the wall, consisting of a mouthpiece and an earpiece, all in black Bakelite.

But could that be right? Could there have been such an old nineteenth-century-style contraption here when I was young? Or had I seen it in a film and imagined there was one here and it had stuck in my memory?

I opened the living-room door, Grandpa instantly got up in the awkward way he did and straightened as he watched me.

"It's good you came," he said. "I've been thinking we should put up a new fence below the barn, and now that you're here perhaps you could help me?"

"Be happy to," I said. "Right away?"

"Yes," he said.

In silence, we put on our outdoor gear, I followed him down to the cellar, where he had some green weather-treated fence posts and a roll of wire netting. I carried everything down to the end of the property, to the top of the little mound where the neighbor's land started, and went back to fetch the sledgehammer Grandpa had just pointed to.

Manual work was not my strong suit, to put it mildly, so I was a bit nervous as I walked toward him with the sledgehammer in my hand, I wasn't sure I could do this or do it in a way that would satisfy him.

Grandpa took some wire cutters from an overall pocket and snipped off the old netting, then wriggled the first post back and forth until it was loose enough for him to pull up. I did the same on the other side, according to his instructions. When we had done that he put one of the new fence posts in position and asked me to knock it into the ground with the sledgehammer. My first blows were circumspect and probing, but he didn't say anything and soon I had built up enough courage to hit it harder and with more assured swings.

The black peaked cap he always wore was dotted with droplets of rain. The blue material of his overalls had darkened. He gazed across the fjord and told me the story about the plane crash on Mount Lihesten in the 1950s, I had heard it many times, it was the mist and the drizzle that had reminded him, I supposed. But I liked hearing him tell stories, and when he had finished and hadn't said anything for a few minutes, he just stood there with his head bowed next to the fence post, which was now firmly bedded in, I asked him about the war. How had it been here during the war, had anyone offered any resistance and had there been any Germans stationed here? We moved toward where the next post would be and he started telling me about those days in April 1940. When the invasion was announced he and a pal went to Voss, where they were mobilizing for war. They went on foot, borrowed a boat and rowed across Sognefjord, crossed the mountain, it was April, crusty snow and moonlit nights, he said, descended to Voss, to the military camp there, where everyone from Vestland was supposed to meet. He shook his head and laughed. They were all drunk when he arrived and there were hardly any weapons. Nor any uniforms. The officers were in Fleischer's Hotel drinking. When they ran out of booze, he told me, they requisitioned the bar on the cruise ship Stella Polaris. It was moored in Bergen and the alcohol was sent up by train.

"So what did you do?" I said.

"At first we tried to get hold of weapons and uniforms. We walked around Voss and asked all the uniformed soldiers we met if they could help us. No one could. My friend said to a guard, you know we're soldiers even though we're not in uniform. Can you phone someone? No, answered the guard, and then he showed us the telephone cable. It had been cut. So we went back home. When we rowed across Sognefjord we took boats with us and left them on the northern side so the Germans would find it harder if they followed us. But of course when we arrived, the country had been occupied."

It took him an age to tell the story, no detail was too trivial, right down to the dogs barking as he approached the farms at night, and by the time he had finished there was only one post left. I hammered it in, he fetched the roll of wire netting, we started to attach it to the posts, he held it while I banged in fence staples.

"There were Germans stationed here, yes," he said. "I got to know one of them well. He was an Austrian and had been to Northern Norway when he was growing up, they sent poor kids up here in the summer in the thirties, and he had been one of them. A nice fellow. He had a lot of interesting things to say."

Grandpa told me there had been a prison camp in the district, mostly Yugoslavs and Russians working on a road project. Grandpa had a truck, it had been requisitioned by the Germans, and he often used to drive to the camp, which was in Fure. He took food with him for the prisoners, he said, Grandma made packed lunches and he hid them under rocks in the surrounding terrain. He said he reckoned the guards knew, but they turned a blind eye. Once he had seen one of the prisoners being shot.

"He was standing in front of the German soldiers screaming Schiesst! Schiesst! And that was when one of them shot him. But the officers were furious. Discipline was strict, you know. So the soldier who fired his gun was sent to the Eastern Front. For German soldiers Norway was a dream posting compared with all the other places they could have been stationed. Toward the end of the war they mostly sent old men and young boys here. I remember I saw a new contingent arriving, and one of the officers said to them: Was wollen Sie hier, alte Leute?"

He laughed. I hammered in the staples and unrolled the wire as far as the next post. He carried on telling me stories. The Austrian, who seemed to be a friend from what he said, decided to make his escape in the days before the German capitulation, he boarded a boat with a woman from the village and her two sons, and vanished. Later the two sons were found floating in the water on the other side of the fjord, presumably killed with a rock.

I looked at him. What on earth was he telling me?

"Not so long ago a book came out about it. I've got it in the house. It's very interesting. Who could have guessed he would be capable of something so awful? But he must have killed them. There is quite simply no other explanation. And then he disappeared. Into thin air. He may still be alive."

I straightened up and helped Grandpa roll out the wire to the next post, where I pulled it as tightly as I could and secured it at the top and bottom so that it would retain the tension, then I banged in more staples.

"What was he like?" I said, and looked up at Grandpa, who was gazing into the mist above the fjord.

"He was a nice man, you know," he said. "Polite and cultivated and friendly. I haven't got a bad word to say about him. But there must have been something else inside him," he said.

"Yes," I said. "Did he get away, do you think, or did he die?"

"It's hard to say," he said. "He probably died trying to escape."

That was the last post, Grandpa snipped off the ends of the wire and I carried the roll and the sledgehammer to the cellar while he walked beside me. As we entered the living room, both red in the face after the rain, Mom was making pancakes in the kitchen. Grandma was sitting in her chair, and when she saw me she said something. I went up close and lowered my head.

The clock, I thought she said. He's taken the clock.

"Who has?" I said.

Him, she said, looking at Grandpa, who sat down on the sofa.

"He's taken the clock?" I whispered as softly as I could so that he wouldn't hear.

"Yes," she whispered.

"I doubt that," I said. "Why would he?"

I stood up, my stomach hurt, I went to join Mom, half closing the door behind me so that they wouldn't hear us in the kitchen.

Mom was holding a ladle over the big hotplate and carefully pouring the mixture, which immediately began to solidify with a sizzle.

"Grandma says Grandpa took her clock," I said. "Stole it from what I could hear."

"Yes, I heard her say that too," Mom said. "It's the medication. It might be making her paranoid and causing her to imagine things. She's pretty bad at the moment. But she'll come out of it. Do you understand?"

"Yes," I said.

For some reason I was close to tears and went into the hall, put on my boots, and stood under the overhang by the front door to have a smoke.

A bus stopped down by the road outside the school. A few minutes later Kjartan walked up over the hill, dark eyed and white skinned, carrying a bag in one hand, some letters and a newspaper in the other. Klassekampen. He had read it for as long as I could remember.

"Hello there," he said.

"Hi, Kjartan," I said.

"Did you arrive yesterday?"

"Yes," I said.

"We'll have a chat later," he said.

"Yes," I said. "Mom's making pancakes. They'll probably be ready in a quarter of an hour or so."

He continued toward his door, stopped and looked across.

"There's that one-legged crow!" he said.

I took a few steps toward him and stared in the direction he was pointing, up to the pole carrying the electricity cable to the barn. Sure enough, on the top, there was a crow with one leg.

"Johannes shot its other leg off. It's stayed here ever since."

He chuckled and closed the door behind him, I stubbed out my cigarette in the soft gravel and took it with me to put in the trash can under the sink.

"Yngve called, by the way," Mom said. "He had to do an extra shift this evening and won't be here until tomorrow morning. He's driving up," he said.

"That's too bad," I said. "Shall I set the table?"

"That'd be nice," she said.

After we had eaten at the table in the TV room, since Grandma and Grandpa had moved their bedroom to the living room because of the trouble Grandma had with stairs now, Kjartan looked at me and asked if I felt like catching up at his place. I nodded, we went up to the large open and light top floor of his house, he put on some coffee, I settled down on the sofa and looked through the pile of books on the table.

Bobrowski. Hölderlin. Finn Alnæs, Musica, the first volume in his major oeuvre Ildfesten, which, according to Mom, he had broken the back of now, only two of the promised five novels had come out anyway. Kjartan had been passionate about these books for several years, there was something about the presence of the cosmos that appealed to him, I gathered from the way he talked about them.

"Are you learning anything at the Writing Academy?" he said from the kitchen.

"Yes, I am," I said.

"I've met Sagen," he said. "He's run lots of the writing courses for Sogn Skrivarlag."

"We haven't met him yet," I said. "We've only had classes with Fosse and Hovland."

"I don't know them," he said, and came in with two cups. They were wet, he had just rinsed them, in mine there were still coffee grains at the bottom, half dissolved in the water.

"We've finished the poetry course now," I said.

"So you've been writing poems?"

"Yes, we had to. But it didn't go well."

"Don't say that," he said. "You're only nineteen. When I was nineteen I barely knew what a poem was. You're lucky to be there."

"You're right," I said. "Have you written anything recently?"

"A couple of poems."

He got up and went over to the dining-room table, where his typewriter was, grabbed a pile of sheets, flipped through them, came back, and handed them to me.

"You can take a look if you like."

"Yes, I'd love to!" I said, suddenly touched that he regarded me as his peer.

dwindling beck

skegges nibble
at the green rock weave through the swaying grass the shade cools

a brother of the sun
lashes its tail

"What's a skegge?" I said, looking up at him.

"Skegge? A trout. What do you think?"

"It's very good," I said. "I particularly like the start. It seems to elevate it somehow."

"Yes," he said. "It's the trout in the mere, you know."

I read on.

with a mouth of lush church grass
I stand at the crossroads drinking the light of faith on the shores of eternity
I lead my body, on like a dun horse in the dusk toward the forest somewhere

I had tears in my eyes again, this time because of the poem, the image of the body that he leads toward the forest like a horse in the dusk.

I seemed to be full of tears, they had accumulated inside me, waiting for an opportunity to be released.

"This poem is fantastic," I said.

"Do you think so?" he said. "Which one is it?"

I passed it to him.

He skimmed through it for a few seconds and snorted.

"'On the shores of eternity,'" he recited. "I was being a bit ironic there, you know."

"Yes," I said. "Nevertheless."

He got up and went to get the jug of coffee, poured some, and placed it on a newspaper.

A door opened downstairs; from the way it was closed I realized it was Mom.

"So this is where you are!" she said.

"We're reading some poems," Kjartan said. "Have a look if you like."

"I'd love to," she said.

I got up and walked with the cup in my hand to the other end of the room, where there were bookshelves, an armchair, and a stereo. I took out a few books and thumbed through them.

When they started talking, I stood by the window and gazed out, at Mount Lihesten, which had just become visible through the mist, a black wall rising where the sea began and falling at the end where the fjord finished.

Was that where Ingvild's family cabin was?

When I entered the living room, Grandma was asleep in her chair, her head lolled back, her mouth wide open. She'd had Parkinson's disease for as long as I could remember, I had barely a memory in which she wasn't shaking. But when I was a boy the illness wasn't as far advanced, it didn't prevent her from working on the small farm she had moved to at the end of the 1930s when she married Grandpa, and where she had lived ever since. According to Borghild, she had been surprised how tiny it was and how small people were out here. It might have been simply that conditions were tougher here than in the inland region she came from, there was less food and therefore also smaller people. Mom told me she had always emphasized that they should be impeccable, in terms of what they wore and the way they behaved, and for that reason had the reputation of wanting to be better than others. Grandpa worked as a driver, he drove buses; Grandma was in charge of nearly everything that was done on the farm. This was the 1950s, but from what Mom had told me about her childhood it sounded more like tales from the previous century. A man came here in the autumn and did their slaughtering for them, she told me, Grandpa never did it himself. Every single part of the animal found a use. Grandma rinsed the intestines in the stream to use them for sausages. The blood was boiled in big pots in the kitchen. I had no idea what else she did, apart from what Mom told me. There were only two generations between us, yet I knew nothing of how she had spent her life, not really, not essentially, I knew nothing of her relationship with objects and animals, life and death. When Grandma and I looked at each other it was from either side of a chasm. For her, family was the central point in her life, in other words, her family, the one that came from the farm where she grew up, and then her children. I had the impression that Grandpa's family, which had moved inland from the islands a generation earlier, was not important. Her family was the center of her existence, and the soil. Kjartan would sometimes say that the soil was her religion, that they were soil worshippers in Jølster, where she came from, a kind of ancient heathendom they had clad in the language and rites of Christianity. Look at Astrup's pictures, he would say, all the fires they lit on Midsummer Eve, that's Jølster folk for you, they dance around the flames as though they were their gods. Kjartan would laugh when he said such things, and it was not without disdain, yet there was always some ambivalence because Kjartan had a lot of her in him: the serious attitude to life and the deep sense of duty were in Kjartan too, and if she worshipped and cultivated the soil, Kjartan worshipped and cultivated nature, the presence of the universe in the form of birds and animals, mountains and skies. He would deny that any such connection existed between him and his mother, after all he was a communist, an atheist, a ship's pipefitter. However, all you had to do was look them in the eye to banish any lingering doubts. They had the same brown eyes, the same wary gaze.

Now there was nothing left of her life, disease had consumed her, eaten up her body, leaving only shaking and fits. It was hard to believe when I saw her sitting there asleep with her mouth agape that her strong will, which couldn't even rule her body now, and her strict morality, which she was no longer able to express, could have left such a deep mark on her children. But it had.

Mom helped Grandma into bed, undressed her, brushed her hair, and helped her on with her nightdress, all while I read The Ceremonies, my latest favorite book, trying not to look. Not because Grandma was being undressed necessarily, but because it was Mom doing it, and it seemed so intimate and private, the daughter caring for her old mother, this wasn't meant for my eyes, so I sat with my eyes trained on my book, attempting to let it absorb me.

It wasn't difficult, all the spaces in it were so open, and still connected with one another in quite sensational ways. Not just the spaces, incidentally, also the characters, which were usually closed off, could suddenly open and simply merge into one another. A man staring at an axolotl in an aquarium is mysteriously transformed into an axolotl staring out from an aquarium at a man. A fire in antiquity becomes a fire in the modern age. Then there were all the other peculiar things that went on. A man suddenly starts regurgitating rabbits, it becomes a problem, a minor catastrophe, the whole of the apartment he has rented is full of small white rabbits.

Mom said goodnight to her parents, came out, and closed the sliding door.

"Would you like some coffee? Or is it too late for you?" she said.

"I wouldn't mind a cup," I said.

I liked these short stories so much, but I couldn't write like this, I didn't have the imagination. I didn't have any imagination at all. Everything I wrote was connected to reality and my own experiences.

Yes, but not the new novel.

A wave of pleasure surged through me.

It was really fantastic. Some mysterious men, maybe angels, who collect people's conversations and reflect on them.

But this pleasure didn't come alone, it also brought with it some despair, because I knew I would never be able to carry it off. I couldn't write the story, it would never work.

Mom came with a pot of coffee and two cups, put them down, and went to fetch a dish of thin squares of potato crepe.

"Borghild made them," she said. "Do you want to try a bit?"

"Please."

Borghild was Grandma's sister, a strong vivacious woman who lived alone in a little house above the farm where they grew up. She usually cooked for the weddings in the district, she knew all the old recipes and everything about the family, those who had died and those who were still alive. Mom was close to her, even more now, as they didn't live far from each other.

"How are you, Karl Ove?" Mom said. "You've said so little since we've been here. That's not like you."

"Maybe not," I said. "But I'm fine. The Writing Academy's pretty hard going, that's all."

"What's hard going about it?"

"It feels as if I'm not good enough to be there. I don't write well enough, it's as simple as that."

"Remember you're only twenty," Mom said.

I took a whole crepe and ate it in two bites.

"Nineteen," I said. "But I'm at the Academy now, you know. It doesn't help me to think it might be better when I'm twenty-five."

Mom poured coffee into the two cups.

"And I'm in love," I said. "That might be why I'm not saying much."

"Someone you've met this autumn?" she said, and lifted her cup to her lips and drank while watching me.

"I met her at Easter, when I was staying with you. Just once. Then we wrote to each other, and then we met in Bergen. She's studying Psychology. Comes from Kaupanger. Same age as me."

"But you're not seeing each other?"

I shook my head.

"That's the point. I don't know if she wants me. I made a fool of myself and then . . . well, nothing."

A snore that sounded like a snarl came from the other room. Then someone coughing.

"I'm sure it'll be fine," Mom said.

"Maybe," I said. "We'll see. Otherwise I'm OK. I love being in the apartment and Bergen generally."

"I might come and see you both in a couple of weeks," Mom said. "There are also a couple of student friends I'd like to visit. Gerd, do you remember her?"

"Yes, of course."

"I've been wondering whether to do another course, you know. I'd like to do a degree as well. But it's a question of finance and I would also have to apply for a leave of absence."

"Yes," I said, taking another crepe.

Upstairs in the bedroom, I lay in the darkness for a long time before I fell asleep. The darkness linked the little space inside with the enormous space outside. The old wooden bed was like a little boat, or that was how it felt. Now and then a tree whooshed and the rain on the leaves pitter-pattered against the window. When it stopped, there would be a whoosh somewhere else, from some other trees nearby, as though tonight the wind had strategically deployed its energies and was riding across the countryside in several units.

The feeling I had when I arrived here was that life was over. Not in the sense that the house stood under the sign of death, more that what was going to happen had happened.

I lay on my other side, my head on my arm. The sound of my pulse beating reminded me of something Grandpa had once said, that you shouldn't lie listening to your heartbeat if you wanted to sleep. It was an odd thing to say, I couldn't remember what had occasioned the comment, but whenever I lay like this and my pulse beat against my ear I was reminded of it.

Only a few months ago Mom had told me that Grandpa had suffered from anxiety for a long period at the beginning of the 1960s, it had been so bad that he didn't go to work, he didn't move from the sofa, so terrified was he of dying. Kjartan was the last child at home then, he had been young and wouldn't have understood anything.

This information was unsettling, in a way, most of all because I hadn't known anything about it and would never have guessed. Were there more such pockets of drama in the lives of my closest family? But the information in itself, what it said about Grandpa, I couldn't get to tally because if there was one characteristic I associated with Grandpa it was his joie de vivre. Then again I had never thought of him as an independent person with an independent life, he had always been simply "Grandpa," in the same way that Grandma had always been "Grandma."

A whoosh went through the old birch again, and a little cascade of droplets hit the wall, as though it were a dog shaking off the rain.

Darkness. Silence. The beat of my pulse. Da-dum. Da-dum. Da-dum.

Unlike with Grandpa it wasn't death I heard but life. My heart was young and strong, it would beat away through my twenties, it would beat away through my thirties, it would beat away through my forties, and it would beat away through my fifties. If I got to Grandpa's age, and he was eighty, I had used only a quarter of my life so far. Almost everything lay before me, bathed in the hopeful light of uncertainty and opportunity, and my heart, this loyal muscle, would take me through it whole and unscathed, ever stronger, ever wiser, ever richer in life lived.

Da-dum. Da-dum. Da-dum.

Da-dum. Da-dum. Da-dum.

I saw Yngve's car from the living-room window, the windshield wipers sweeping from side to side, the dark shadow in the driver's seat that was him, and told Mom, who was massaging Grandma's feet on her lap, that Yngve had arrived. She gently lifted Grandma's feet to the floor and got up. Grandma and Grandpa had eaten lunch at twelve, we had waited, now she went into the kitchen to prepare the meal.

The car stopped outside. Straight afterward the door opened, I heard him in the hall and turned to him as he came in.

"Hi," he said.

"The Norwegian population is growing, I can see," Grandpa said.

Yngve smiled. His eyes brushed mine.

"Hi," I said. "Good trip?"

"Absolutely fine," he said, and passed me a pile of newspapers. "Brought these along for you."

Mom came in.

"There's some food ready if you're hungry."

We went into the kitchen and sat down. Mom had made a big pot of stew. I guessed the plan was to freeze it so that Grandpa only had to heat it when they were alone again.

"Was the drive OK?" Mom said, placing the pot on the table, where there were already crisp breads and butter and a jug of water.

"Yep," Yngve said.

It was as though he had a membrane around him which prevented me from getting into proper contact. But that didn't have to mean anything, sometimes that was how it was, and he had been driving for several hours, sitting alone in the car and thinking his own thoughts, it was a change coming here, where we had been all day and a very different atmosphere of familiarity and naturalness had been established.

Yngve filled his deep dish with stew, positioned the ladle on my side of the pot, I helped myself. Steam rose from the dish, I took a crisp bread and bit off a piece, poured water into a glass, raised a spoonful of stew to my mouth, blew on it.

"Ann Kristin says hello, by the way," Yngve said. "I met her yesterday and said I was coming up here."

"Thanks," Mom said.

"Where did you meet her?" I asked as casually as I could. He had said he was staying in town to work, not to go out, and if he had gone out and met Ann Kristin, then he was lying and why would he lie?

"In the canteen at Sydneshaugen," he said.

"Oh," I said.

After the meal we drank coffee in the living room, Grandpa talked, we listened. Kjartan came in, wearing the same clothes he had worn for the past two days, his hair a mess, eyes flashing behind his glasses. Yngve didn't respond to Kjartan's monologic conversation as he usually did, there was something submissive and withdrawn about him, as though he were looking inward and not outward. Could be anything, I thought, he was just a bit reticent.

Outside, the rain was coming down.

Kjartan went back to his flat, I read the newspapers, Mom washed up in the kitchen, Yngve took his bags up to his room and was gone for a while. When he returned he sat in the chair by the fireplace with a book.

I lowered the newspaper and stared out the window. Dusk was falling. The light from the lamp outside the neighbors' house, a stone's throw below us, was striped with rain.

Grandma was asleep in her chair. Grandpa had also fallen asleep. Mom, on the sofa beside him, was reading. Yngve was reading too. I watched him, and knew he had noticed, because you do when someone watches you in a silent room, you notice. Nevertheless, he didn't look up, he kept his eyes firmly on the book.

There was something wrong.

Or was I being paranoid?

He was reading, for Christ's sake, I couldn't make that into a sign that something was wrong.

I lifted the newspaper and continued reading. Then it was his turn to watch me. I concentrated on not looking up.

Why was he watching me?

He got up and went out. Grandpa woke as the door was closed, blinked a few times, struggled to his feet and wandered over to the wood burner, opened it, and threw in two logs. The wooden floor above creaked.

Then it went quiet.

Had he gone to bed?

Now?

Because he had been out last night? And hadn't been working at the hotel as he said?

I took my cup to the kitchen and poured myself a refill. The fjord lay a somewhat lighter shade of dark in the growing murk. The rain drummed on the roof and walls. I went back to the living room, grabbed my pouch of tobacco, and made myself a roll-up. Grandpa was cleaning his pipe, he tapped it on the glass ashtray a few times, poked at some black clumps and flakes with the white pipe cleaner. Grandma had woken up, she tried to sit upright, leaned forward but fell back again. Then she moved her hand to the two buttons on the armrest, succeeded in pressing one, and the chair began to rise with a low hum as she was lifted up, or pushed forward, and a moment later was able to grasp the walking frame. But her back was too bent for her to walk, and Mom got up and asked where she wanted to go. I couldn't hear the answer that issued from her trembling lips, but it must have been the kitchen, because that was where they steered her steps. While all this was going on, Grandpa was engrossed in his pipe activities.

The floorboards above creaked, and then the staircase. The door opened and Yngve fixed me with a look.

"Coming for a walk, Karl Ove?" he said. "There's something we have to discuss."

The hope that had held me aloft melted and my insides crumbled. Everything collapsed.

Yngve was going out with Ingvild.

I got to my feet and went into the hall. He had his back to me as he put on his waterproof jacket. He said nothing. I slipped my feet into my shoes, bent over and tied them, then rose and put on my jacket. He stood still, waiting. After I had zipped up, he opened the door. Fresh air streamed into the house. I pulled the hood over my head and tied it under my chin, Yngve walked over to the car, opened the door and took out his umbrella. The rain was a regular drumbeat on the gravel and the house, more of a soft patter beyond in the vast darkness, where it fell on grass and moss, trees and bushes.

Yngve opened the umbrella, I closed the door behind me, we set off down the hill. I stared at him, he had his eyes on the path ahead. My legs were trembling jelly, my insides in disarray, but there was also something hard in the center. I wasn't going to give him anything. He would get nothing from me.

We walked through the gate, past the neighbors' house and down onto the asphalt road.

"Shall we walk down?" Yngve said.

"OK," I said.

The junction, where three roads met, was illuminated by street lamps, but as soon as we had passed it and come onto the road leading into the valley, the night was all around us. Trees stood like a wall on either side. There was a faint rushing sound from the river and the rain falling in the forest. Otherwise all we heard was our own footsteps. I stared at him. He glanced at me.

"There's something I have to tell you," he said.

"Yes, so you mentioned," I replied. "What do you have to tell me?"

He looked straight ahead again.

"Ingvild and I are going out together," he said.

I said nothing, just glared at him.

"It's only . . . ," he began.

"I don't want to hear any more," I said.

He went quiet, we carried on walking.

The falling rain, our footsteps, the wall of trees in the darkness. The smell of wet spruce, the smell of wet moss, the smell of wet asphalt.

"I have to explain what happened," he said.

"No, you don't."

"But, Karl Ove . . . "

"I don't want to hear about it, I told you."

We reached the firing range, a shed in front of a long narrow piece of open ground to the right of the road.

In the distance was the drone of traffic. It came down the slope from the mountain at the end of the valley.

"It wasn't something I planned," he said.

"I DON'T want to hear!" I said. "Don't you understand? I don't want to hear anything!"

We walked on in silence. He glanced at me once, was about to say something, changed his mind, looked down, stopped.

"I'm going back then," he said.

"You do that," I said, and carried on walking, listening to the sound of his fading footsteps behind me. The next moment a car came around the bend and transformed the darkness into an inferno of light. It lingered on the retina for several seconds after the car had passed, and I walked on blindly until my eyes had got used to the night again, and the road and the trees reappeared.

I would never talk to him again. I couldn't leave until tomorrow morning, so I would see him, and I would see him in Bergen, that was inevitable, sooner or later I would bump into him, the town wasn't that big, but I wouldn't say anything then, nor here, I wouldn't say a word to him ever again.

I walked to the end of the valley, to where the waterfall plunged down the mountainside and the river flowed beneath the road, saw the faint glint of water as it hit the rocks and the pool at the bottom, it seemed almost obscene, water in the water, in the pouring rain, on top of that, and then I made my way back. My jeans were wet and I was frozen, and there was nothing good waiting for me in the house.

Had they slept together?

Everything in me seized up. I stopped.

Yngve had slept with her.

When he left here he would go home and sleep with her again.

Stroke her breasts, kiss her on the mouth, pull down her panties, penetrate her.

My heart was pounding wildly, as though I'd been running.

She called his name, whispered his name, kissed him, spread her legs for him.

I moved off again.

She would ask how it had gone, what I had said. He would tell her. I was the "him" they talked about. The little brother. The naïve little brother who sat in his room waiting for her, who thought she wanted him, while she was out partying with Yngve, fucking at Yngve's place. Just that, the fact that she spent the night at his place and in the morning showered in the bathroom there, sat down and had breakfast there, with a growing sense that it was normal and her due.

She caressed him, she must have done that, she looked into his eyes, she must have done that, she said she loved him, she must have done that, this wasn't me being paranoid, this is what happened. It happened every day.

The little house on the hill shone before me, the darkness profound, almost impenetrable on all sides.

I would never be a part of his life again. I would never visit him wherever he lived. I wouldn't give a damn about him in a way that I had never done with anyone else before. If he thought everything would be as it was between us, that I would ever tolerate this, then he had another think coming.

Now it was all about getting through the evening. He was here, I couldn't avoid him, but it didn't matter, I would ignore him, and that was good because then he would believe it was just something I was doing now and eventually everything would go back to normal, only later would he realize that in fact I would never speak to him again.

I opened the front door and went into the hallway, hung up my jacket, darted up to my room and changed my trousers, dried my face on a towel in the bathroom, then went down to the ground floor and into the living room, where they were watching TV.

Yngve wasn't there. I looked at Mom.

"Where's Yngve?" I said.

"He's gone to see Kjartan," Mom said.

I sat down.

"What's going on?" Mom said.

"Nothing," I said.

"Something is going on, I can see," Mom said.

"Do you remember me saying I was in love?" I said.

"Yes, of course," Mom said.

"Yngve's going out with her," I said. "He's just told me."

Mom took a deep breath and sighed as she looked at me.

"Well, it's not my doing," I said.

"You mustn't fall out," she said. "It'll pass, Karl Ove. It's bad now, but it"ll pass."

"Yes, it might," I said. "But that doesn't mean I ever want anything to do with him again."

She got up.

"I've made some supper," she said. "Can you set the table?"

"Alright."

I carried in cups and plates, bread and butter, salmon and scrambled eggs, a selection of meats and cheese, a pot of tea and milk. Once I had finished Mom asked me if I could go get Yngve. I looked at her.

"OK," I said. I slipped on my shoes and walked the few meters down the yard to the other door. Perhaps he would think everything was as it was when I arrived and he was welcome to think that.

I opened the door, entered the hall, went over to the stairs. Music was on loud upstairs. I took a few steps up, enough to see the living room. Yngve was sitting in a chair staring into the air. He hadn't heard me. I could have shouted, but I didn't because, to my horror, I saw tears running down his cheeks.

Was he crying?

I quietly went back down, out of sight. Stood for a moment in the hall, silent. That was the first time I had seen him crying since he was a little boy.

But why was he crying?

I stuffed my feet into my shoes, closed the door carefully behind me, and trudged across the yard.

"He's coming," I said as I went into the living room. "He said we should start."

Early the next morning Mom drove me to the ferry in Rysjedalsvika. The boat was fairly empty when it arrived, I sat down in the same seat I'd had on the way over. The weather had eased a little during the night, the sky was still overcast, but the cloud cover was lighter and it wasn't raining anymore. The boat sliced through the heavy gray water at such a strangely fast pace beneath the tall, motionless, overarching mountains between which the fjord lay.

I had gone to bed before Yngve returned in the evening and was up before he woke in the morning, so I hadn't seen him since briefly catching sight of him in the chair at Kjartan's, but I had heard him, his voice from the floor below as I was trying to sleep and his footsteps up the stairs to his room on his way to bed. Being under the same roof as him was unbearable, I seemed to burn inside, all I could think of was that he would regret what he had done.

Now, surrounded by light in a boat in the middle of the fjord, on my way home, everything seemed different. Now it was her I thought about. She had allowed herself to be taken in by him, to be blinded by his surface charm and had said yes. She didn't realize I was better than him. She had no idea. But she would find out. And what then? Would I be there for her? Or would I let her go her own way?

Could I go out with her after she had been with Yngve?

Oh yes, I could.

If she wanted to be with me, I would.

There was nothing to say I had to remain in Bergen after this year and nothing to say she had to, if they broke up.

I went to the back, to the snack bar, and ordered a coffee, took it with me up onto the deck and sat down on a bench under the roof, from where I could see the forest, which, on the way, had just been a large deep shadow beneath the mountains, but was now clearly defined beneath the white sky. Dark green, almost black, spruces packed into a dense jagged area with the odd deciduous tree luminous in its autumn-yellow colors.

I caught a taxi home from the ferry quay, after all that had happened I deserved that. However, being back in my room, surrounded by all my possessions, didn't feel as good as I had imagined because this was where I had waited for her, day in, day out, and now, knowing what I did, that she had never been on the point of coming up to see me, but had been with Yngve, I could see with total clarity how foolish I had been. All the fine thoughts I'd had about her, the whole dream I had built up around her appeared immeasurably naïve now that I knew how the land actually lay, what had actually gone on.

Yngve knew how I had felt, he knew that I was waiting at home, hoping, while he was meeting her and going out with her. Was that part of the thrill, I wondered? Having me sitting here like an idiot looking out the window?

I couldn't stay in my room, so I put on my jacket and went out, but where could I go? It was Sunday, all the shops were closed and I didn't want to sit on my own in the cafés that were open.

I stopped outside the block of apartments where Jon Olav lived and rang the bell. No one answered, I walked on, up the hill and down past Støletorget, and soon I was crossing Torgalmenningen, burning inside the whole time, I was a fool, I had nowhere to go, no one to visit, I just walked, burning with shame about everything. I walked along Nygårdsgaten, cut up by the Science Building and went into the park, the plan was to sit down and have a smoke, it was Sunday, I was out for a Sunday walk, but in the park, look, that was where I held Ingvild's hand and I didn't want to think about that, even then she must have known she didn't want me, that I was no good for her, and I didn't want to go to Danmarksplass, Yngve lived there, and for all

I knew she had his keys for the weekend and was in his flat now. I didn't want to walk the other way either, Sydneshaugen School was there, where we had drunk coffee, the gate where we had stood talking when Morten appeared. Instead I walked down the first hill and came out by the Grieg Hall, followed the road past the library and the station, turned right, where the old town gate once stood, and then continued uphill, back along the roads at the top of Fjellsiden.

Yngve was probably on his way home now. If Ingvild wasn't in his flat he would drive straight up to Fantoft, where she would be expecting him.

She opens the door and gazes at him with tenderness and affection.

They embrace.

They kiss and kiss with mounting passion.

Glance at the room, then they undress each other at top speed.

A cigarette afterward.

What did your little brother say?

He got angry. But it'll pass. You should have seen him. Ha ha ha!

Ha ha ha.

Wave upon wave of heat rose to my head, which I lowered, and into my face. I walked past an old fire station, it was made of wood and painted white, beneath it the town's myriad colors vibrated, I walked along the very highest line of houses until I slowly began to descend and was back outside my place.

That is where he lives, I thought. The brother who believes he's a writer. And when I opened the door and went into my room it was as though I was still in the street looking at myself, the conceited idiot who closed the curtains and kept out the world.

Rolf Sagen was going to teach us for the next two weeks. His course didn't deal with genres, neither prose, nor poetry, nor drama, nor essays, but writing itself, the process of writing and a variety of relevant strategies. He gave us a number of practical tips, such as how it could be useful for prose writers and dramatists to make what he called a "hinterland," you wrote down everything about the characters and their relationships and in so doing knew much more about why they acted as they did than was apparent from the finished text – "hinterland" was the complete world of which the narrative revealed only glimpses – and also he talked about the underlying motives or premises of writing. Sagen was a trained psychologist, and he spoke a lot about how important it was to penetrate down into the deeper layers of consciousness when you wrote. He had a few activities for us to do. One of them was about emptying our minds of thoughts, it was like meditation, we should try to be ahead of our thoughts, deny them space, just forge on into the unthought, and then, at his command, write down the first things that occurred to us.

"Let's start now," he said, and so we sat around the table, all of us with our heads bowed and eyes closed. I couldn't do it, I was just thinking about this situation, about having to empty my mind, but it was beyond me. Two minutes passed, three, maybe four.

"Now write," he said.

The first thing that occurred to me was the name of a town: Darmstadt. I wrote a little story about it. When everyone had finished we had a break and when we resumed we had to read out what we had written.

Sagen held his beard between thumb and forefinger in concentration, nodded and said this was interesting, unusual, remarkable, fruitful. When it was my turn the string of superlatives came to an end. He listened to what I read out, then eyed me.

"You're using only the surface of your mind when you write," he said. "And if you do that there won't be any depth in the text. What was the first word that occurred to you?"

"Darmstadt."

"Hm, a German town," he said. "Have you been there?"

"No."

"Well," he said. "I'm afraid there isn't very much more to say about the text. You'll have to try to penetrate deeper into your consciousness."

"Yes," I said.

What he was actually saying was that my writing was superficial. He was right, I'd realized that there was a chasm between what the others wrote and what I wrote. I described a young man walking the streets of Kristiansand. I hadn't drawn either him or the streets he walked from the depths of my consciousness. Sagen confirmed what I had suspected, he articulated it in words, I had to descend into the depths of my own consciousness, into the darkness of my soul, but how the hell was I supposed to do that? This was not something I found easy! I had read "Death Fugue," no writer had ever delved farther into his consciousness than Celan when he wrote that, but what use was this insight to me?

The next day we had another activity. This time we were given a few nonsense words to keep repeating in our heads until Sagen told us to write the first thing that occurred to us.

Once again all eight of us sat around the table with bowed heads and closed eyes. Now you can write, Sagen said, and I scribbled the first words that came into my mind.

Two leather chairs
in the wind

That was all.

Sagen scratched his chin.

"That's interesting," he said. "Two chairs in the wind. They're outside, I take it. Yes, they must be."

"That's an exciting intro," Knut said.

"You'll have to work on it a bit more, Karl Ove," Trude said. "It might turn into a poem."

"It's an image that doesn't immediately make itself apparent," Sagen said. "There's a tension, there's nothing contrived about it. Yes, that is interesting. You're on the right path, I think."

I had been thinking about the two leather chairs we had at home when I was growing up. They stood on a green hill and the wind blew in from the sea.

But this was just nonsense, I realized that, although I found myself unable to dismiss the others' comments that it might be the beginning of something, a poem.

I kept going when I got home.

Two leather chairs
in the wind
a yellow bulldozer – that was the next thing that occurred to me –
noise from a town
you have already left

As soon as I had written that I knew the sort of comments I would get. Delete the yellow bulldozer. Remove the "already" from the last line, it's redundant. So I did that and the poem was finished.

Two leather chairs
in the wind
You have left

At any rate it looked like a poem. I knew where the image of the leather chairs originated, ever since I was small I had been fascinated by the relationship between inside and outside, when what was supposed to be inside was outside, and vice versa. One of the most hypnotic memories I had was the time Geir and I had stumbled over a cellar full of water in a half-finished house. Not only that, there was no floor, so we stood on a little rock surrounded by water, indoors! The episode on the garbage dump, which featured in one of the texts that got me accepted into the course, also dealt with this idea, the way Gordon and Gabriel set out chairs, a table, and lamps in the forest. Two leather chairs in the wind had its roots there, the magic of childhood in six words. Noise from a town you have left was different, I had seen many instances of it in the poems I had read, something is stated and revoked at the same time. Also the converse, where the same merges into the same, such as, the hare snows into the hare, but so far I hadn't come up with any such images myself.

Up until now!

Oh!

In a flash I added two more lines.

Two leather chairs
in the wind
you have left.
The girl disappears
into the girl.

That was it. A fully fledged poem.

To celebrate, I stuffed the photography book down my trousers, hung my shirt outside and went down to the basement. With the book open in my left hand, which I could now hold and leaf through simultaneously, and my right hand round my dick, I stared at one photo after another. The girl with the basket of laundry was still my favorite, but there was no longer anything pure about it, every situation I imagined myself in with her was permeated by the thought of Yngve and Ingvild and the fact that I had lost Ingvild, the only girl who meant anything to me. I flicked back and forth, to escape the thought, more or less as Sagen had advised us, it struck me, and I finally succeeded in concentrating long enough on one of the girls' wonderful bodies for me to come.

That was at least something.

Back upstairs, I killed time until I could go to bed. Fortunately I had no problem sleeping twelve hours at a stretch. I couldn't say I looked forward to going to the Writing Academy, not a day passed without something disparaging being said about me, that is, something disparaging about my writing. No one meant it as such, it was called critique, and was supposed to be constructive, but in my case it was so useless because there was nothing else in my texts to compensate for the criticism. It was immature, it was clichéd, it was superficial, and I was truly incapable of penetrating deeper into my own consciousness, where the essence of a writer was to be found. In all the discussions we had I was reminded of this, it was my role, and if I wrote something good, such as the poem about the two leather chairs, it would still be seen in the light of the person I had shown myself to be, a sort of fluke, the anthropoid who writes Hamlet.

The only benefit of the Academy during those days was that so much happened, there was so much to react to while I was there, that the thought of Yngve and Ingvild was pushed into the background. For the same reason, my room was unbearable, there were no distractions, so if we didn't have any writing assignments I went out, just for a walk – one night to Jon Olav's, where I could have a cup of coffee, but then couldn't visit again until a certain number of days had elapsed so that my lack of friends wouldn't become a burden to him, I had placed myself in a kind of quarantine – the next night to Anne's, for her the same rules applied, after a cup of tea and an hour-long chat I couldn't show my face there until after four or five days, preferably more – and there was no one else to visit. I couldn't go to the movies alone, that carried too much of a stigma, and Café Opera was out of the question. To stand alone in the bar, ashamed not to know anyone, that wasn't a situation I wanted to expose myself to. Besides, the chance that I would bump into Yngve and Ingvild, or their friends, was too great. Just the thought of being in the same room as them, of being present as they gazed at each other or even touched each other, made my flesh run cold. Morten was a savior, even though we had nothing in common we could always chat for an hour about something, and he didn't find it strange that I popped by, after all we were "neighbors."

One evening there was a ring at the door. I thought it was Jon Olav and went to open up.

Ingvild stood on the steps.

"Hi," she said, sending me a hurried glance.

At that second, as I met her eyes, it was as though nothing had happened. My heart was pumping as if I were in love.

"You?" I said.

"Yes, I thought we should talk."

She looked down as she said that, pushed a strand of hair away from her forehead.

"Come in," I said.

She followed me in and sat down on the sofa.

"Would you like some tea?" I said.

She shook her head.

"I won't be long."

"I'll put some on anyway," I said.

I went into the kitchen and put a pan of water on the stove. Her coming to see me was the last thing I had expected and the place was a mess. I sprinkled tea leaves over the bottom of the teapot and went back to her. She had lit a cigarette. The ashtray was half full, I took it and emptied it in the kitchen trash bin.

"You don't need to tidy up for me," she said. "I'll be off in a couple of minutes. There was just something I had to say to you."

She laughed as she said it. She glanced down, she glanced up.

"The tea will be ready soon," I said. "We're doing poetry at the Academy and we've been given some fantastic poems. Especially one. Would you like to hear it?"

She shook her head.

"Not now, Karl Ove," she said, squirming on the sofa.

"But it's not very long," I said. "Hang on a minute. I'll find it."

"No, please don't. It's not the right moment."

"It'll be fine," I said, rummaging through the pile of photocopied poems, found what I was after, and turned to her.

"Here it is. It won't take long."

I stood in the middle of the floor with the piece of paper in my hand and started to read.

Death Fugue

Black milk of daybreak we drink it at sundown we drink it at noon in the morning we drink it at night we drink it and drink it we dig a grave in the breezes there one lies unconfined
A man lives in the house he plays with the serpents he writes
he writes when dusk falls to Germany your golden he writes it and steps out of doors and the stars are flashing he whistles his pack out he whistles his Jews out in earth has them dig for a

he commands us strike up for the dance

Black milk of daybreak we drink you at night

[*] Translated by Michael Hamburger

I read it as I had been taught, with a regular rhythm, not stressing individual words, not stressing anything because it carried meaning, rhythm was paramount, rhythm was everything.

While I was reading, Ingvild smoked and studied the floor in front of her.

"Isn't that good?" I said.

"Yes," she said.

"I think it's fantastic. Absolutely brilliant. I've never read anything like it."

I sat down at the other end of the sofa.

"Yngve told you what happened, didn't he?" she said.

"The tea," I said, and got up. "Just a minute."

I went to the kitchen, poured the boiling water over the dry tea leaves, which would swell up and become soft and supple within seconds, the biggest would go clumpy, while all the properties in them would be released and infuse the water and color it, golden at first, then darker and darker.

I brought out the teapot with two cups, put them on the table.

"It has to stew a bit first," I said.

"I have to go soon," she said. "I only wanted to talk to you about what has happened."

"Can't you have a cup of tea anyway?" I said.

I filled her cup, the tea was too thin, and I poured it back into the pot, and then I poured again. This time it was darker, if not perfect, at least drinkable.

"Do you take milk?"

She shook her head and grabbed the cup with both hands, took a sip and put the cup back on the table.

"It had nothing to do with you," she said. "What happened."

"Right," I said, filling my own cup.

"I hope we can be friends despite everything. I'd like to be friends with you."

"Of course we can be friends," I said. "Why shouldn't we be able to?"

She smiled, no eye contact, took another sip.

"So, how are things?" I said.

"They're fine," she said.

"How's the course going?"

She shook her head.

"I'm not sure," she said.

"Same here," I said. "But the Academy course only lasts a year, not six like in Psychology. I'll have to see what I do afterward. Maybe Lit. But I'm planning to keep writing."

Silence.

It was painful with her there.

"Do you still live in Fantoft?" I said.

She shook her head.

"I'm moving into a collective."

"Are you?"

"Yes. I think I'll have to go," she said, and stood up. "Thank you for the tea. See you."

I accompanied her to the hall, smiled at her and said good-bye, watched her disappear around the corner, went back in, washed the two cups, emptied the ashtray so that I wouldn't be reminded of her visit, lay back on my bed and stared at the ceiling. It was eight o'clock. Two hours until I could sleep.

For as long as there were classes at the Academy I coped very well during the day. I trudged through the rain in the morning and, if nothing else, appreciated meeting the other students, we saw so much of one another that I was relatively natural with them, and then I trudged home through the rain in the afternoon beneath the fast-darkening sky. I made myself something to eat, I sat and read until my restlessness became too much and drove me out, mostly into the great nothing, in other words, I met no one. I had nowhere to go, and I couldn't stay in my room, what was I supposed to do? Ten wild horses couldn't drag me into a cinema on my own or into Café Opera. Living like this was fine for a while, there was nothing wrong with it as such, the situation was explicable, I was taking a course in which there were very few students and those there were, were older than me, none would have been a friend of mine under normal circumstances, which contrasted sharply with the situation for the average student, who was surrounded by hundreds, if not thousands, of other like-minded people. Yes, there was a rational explanation, I was at the Writing Academy, and when I finished there I would take out a student loan and go to Istanbul to write, a town where no one expected me to know anyone, which farthermore was exotic and foreign, an adventure, Christ, a room of my own in Istanbul!

I wrote letters and described my plans. I read novels I had heard about at the Academy, by Øystein Lønn, Ole Robert Sunde, Claude Simon, Alain Robbe-Grillet, Nathalie Sarraute, although they were difficult for me I plowed through them in the hope that something would stick. I walked down into the town center and bought records, drank coffee in the cake shops old people frequented, where I didn't care how I looked or what impression I made or if people wondered why I was on my own. I didn't give a shit about old people and I didn't give a shit about myself, either. I sat there studying the records, reading books, drinking coffee, and smoking. Then I walked home, killed time, went to bed, another day dawned. The weekdays were no problem, the weekends were more difficult, at two or three in the afternoon the urge to go out and have fun, like other students, slowly made itself felt, at six or seven it became acute, they were drinking all around me while I sat alone. At eight or nine it felt better, soon I would be able to go to bed. And occasionally something would hold my attention, a book or my writing, to make me forget time and the situation, and when I next checked my watch it could be twelve, one or even two. That was good, for then I would sleep in longer the following morning, shorten the day. Some Saturdays I went out in the evening, I was sick of my room and my footsteps were drawn to the town center, past Café Opera perhaps, where the windows were full of laughing, chatting people and golden beer, and although all I had to do was open the door and go in, it wasn't locked of course, I couldn't do it, in some way or other this was how life had become. Once I did anyway, and it was as I had imagined, a nightmare, I burned inside as I stood at the bar drinking, my chest burned and my head burned, I knew no one, I had no friends, and everyone could see that, I was alone in the bar acting as if it were the most natural thing in the world, I drank and calmly surveyed the room, is there anyone I know here tonight? . . . No, indeed, how strange, not one! Never mind, it's nice anyway, to have a beer before I go home to bed . . . busy day tomorrow, might as well take it easy now . . . As I hurried home afterward I was furious at myself and my own stupidity, I shouldn't have gone there, it was ridiculous, why did I have to display my failings in that way?

The following weekend I rang Yngve. He had a TV, I would ask him if he was planning to watch the Saturday match, if so, could I pop up? I hadn't forgotten the business with Ingvild, I would never forgive him for it, but we had been brothers for much longer than I had been in love with Ingvild, and it ought to be feasible to separate the two relationships from one another, to have two thoughts in your head at once.

"Hello," he said.

"Hi, this is Karl Ove."

"Long time, no hear," he said. "How's it going?"

"Fine. I was wondering, actually, if you were going to watch the soccer match this afternoon?"

"I was, yes."

"Would it be OK if I came up to see it?"

"Yes, of course. It would be great."

"Will Ingvild be there? If so, I won't come."

"No, she's at home this weekend. Just come on up."

"Alright, see you then. Bye."

"Bye."

"By the way, have you done the pools?"

"Yes."

"How many lines?"

"Thirty-two."

"OK. See you."

I bought a bag of beer in the nearby shop, showered and changed clothes, trotted up the hill in the rain, went into the kiosk and did the pools, waited for a bus, jumped on, sat looking at all the lights and movement that abounded in this town, the dislocations of color and form that occurred, all the light that glittered in the water, floated in the water, all the umbrellas and swishing windshield wipers, all the lowered heads and laced-up hoods, all the rubber boots and waterproof jackets, all the water running down the gutters, by the curbsides, and on the roof, the gulls circling above and settling on the top of a flagpole, bedraggled, or on the ridiculously high statue in Festplassen, a man of normal dimensions standing on a pillar, how high was it, twenty meters? Thirty? Christian Michelsen, what had he done to deserve such a fate?

Bergen, the town of swishing windshield wipers.

Bergen, the town of drafty, toiletless studios.

Bergen, the town of human fish. See their gaping mouths.

This is where Grandpa came after selling books in the outlying districts, going from door to door, offering his little library, and with the money he bought himself a new suit. This is where he bought the ring to marry Grandma. Bergen, this was the town for them. He dressed up when he came here, put on his best clothes and his finest hat, presumably he had always done that.

Across Danmarksplass, to the right under the signs by the little wooden shed where they sold tires, to the left again straight afterward, and uphill between the workers' houses.

Everything was normal, I thought, as I rang the bell and waited for him to open up. Everything was as it had been.

And it was.

Yngve had bought chocolate toffees, just like the ones Dad used to give us while we watched the televised English soccer matches on a Saturday afternoon when we were growing up, he had brewed up a pot of coffee, which we drank before moving on to beer and chips at the start of the second half. We kept track of the scores in the other eleven matches, he had ten right so far, but it all went haywire toward the end, I had seven correct results, which was more or less what I got whenever I did the pools.

After the match Asbjørn and Ola came up, we sat drinking and talking for a while, then we caught a taxi into town and went to Café Opera. Ingvild's name wasn't mentioned once. I kept a fairly low profile for the first few hours, I had nothing to say, nothing to contribute, but I got drunker and drunker and then there I was, aglow at the center of the world, babbling away about anything that came into my head. I told them I was going to move to Istanbul to write next year, I said I wrote better than Bret Easton Ellis, he had a cold heart and I didn't, I said that Jan Kjærstad had read what I'd written and liked it. We can't go home now, I groaned, when they flashed the lights and fortunately no one had any plans to, almost everyone who had been in Café Opera was now in the streets chatting and waiting to hear about a party. Erling and Arvid were there, they lived in a big house up in Villaveien, right behind the Student Center, in a collective, we could go there, apparently there wasn't that much to drink, but that wasn't a problem because someone immediately jumped into a taxi to get what booze they had from home, while we slowly made our way upward, Erling and Arvid first, then the rest of us dragging behind like the tail of a comet.

Both Erling and Arvid came from Tromøya. I remembered Erling as the goalkeeper in the team above us when I was growing up. He was always gentle, he always smiled, but he was not averse to making the odd acerbic comment. Although he was not especially tall there was something ungainly and sometimes almost limp about him, I had noticed that even in the days when he kept goal. Arvid was big and sturdy and always occupied a lot of space wherever he was. The two of them formed a focal point. If they gave a thumbs-up or a thumbs-down it was significant. But I was safe, apparently, as I was Yngve's brother. At any rate, I had been when I arrived in Bergen.

The rooms in the old wooden house were spacious and almost entirely unfurnished, I wandered around, the booze came, I drank, someone was staring at me, I went over to him, asked him what he was staring at, he said he hadn't seen me before and was just wondering who I was, I shook his hand and then I bent his fingers back until he screamed and I let go. What are you doing?! he hissed, what the hell is wrong with you? I left him and went into the adjacent room, where there was a whole crowd sitting on the floor, among them one of Yngve's fellow students, the one who had been at the table the first time we went to Café Opera. You're the spitting image of Jan Kjærstad! I shouted, pointing at him. You look just like him! I do not, he said, I don't look anything like him. He doesn't, Karl Ove, said Asbjørn, who was also there. And you look like Tarjei Vesaas! I said, pointing at Arvid. Is that a compliment or what? he laughed. No, in fact it isn't, I said, and turned away because Yngve was standing behind me. Just take it easy, will you, he said. I heard you almost broke someone's fingers in there. That's crazy. You can't do that here. Everyone knows everyone, right? Take it easy. I am taking it easy, I said. I'm having a good time. We're talking about literature. Kjærstad and Vesaas. I left him and went into the kitchen, opened the fridge, the alcohol had made me so damned hungry, and I saw half a chicken, which I grabbed and sank my teeth into, sitting on the counter and occasionally washing it down with whiskey. That moment, which was wonderful, sitting on the counter in a student apartment eating chicken and drinking whiskey was the last I remembered. Afterward everything was black, apart from an image of me hauling rocks into the living room and putting them on the floor, running in and out and continuing until someone stopped me and then everything disappeared again.

This was the pattern for the end of autumn, I tagged along with Yngve and his friends, was silent and shy but polite and affable for the first few hours until alcohol had me in its grip and then anything could pass my lips, anything could happen with my hands, until I woke up in an internal darkness the next day, when image after image of what I had done and said was hurled back at me, and I could only get myself going with a huge effort of will, drag myself back into normality, which then slowly took over. Normality was where I belonged, I realized that more and more, the longer the semester went on, I didn't have the depth or the originality you needed to become a writer, on the other hand I didn't want to sit there with the others without saying a word, inhibited and silent, because that wasn't me either, and so the only thing that helped, the only thing that could raise and transport me into something else, something freer, much closer to myself, was drinking. Sometimes it went well, sometimes the evening finished at the right moment, before anything of consequence had happened, except that I had been happy, but then there were the times it didn't go well and I lost it, the way I had lost it in Northern Norway the year before, I was completely out of control. One habit I had developed was to feel car door handles as I walked past, if one was open I would get into the driver's seat and try to start the engine, I knew you had to connect some wires but I wasn't sure which, and I never succeeded in starting up a car, but the following day just the fact that I had tried was terrible. I released the hand brake inside a car that was open and parked on the hill near where I lived, causing it to roll back down a meter or two and hit the car behind. I ran off chortling inside. Not only that, I also tried to make off with lots of bikes, I entered backyards and searched for ones that were unlocked, if I found one, well, then I would cycle home on it. Once there was a bike beside the bed in my room when I woke up. I had to wait until it was dark before I could take it out and leave it in a neighboring street, scared all the while that someone would see me and the police would come. Another time I saw some people sitting behind a window on the second floor somewhere, I went up the stairs, knocked on the door and went in, they shook their heads, I turned around and went back out. There was no evil in me, I just wanted to destroy things, not people, but so long as my sense of judgment was so clouded anything at all could happen, I realized that, and presumably that was why my fears grew so inordinately in the days afterward. Yngve, with whom I was now spending as much time as I had done before, told me I shouldn't drink and suggested I smoke hash instead, maybe that would be better. He said I had begun to acquire a bad reputation and it was affecting him, too. But he didn't stop inviting me out, probably because he saw more of the person I was normally than the person I could become when we were on the town.

In the middle of November I was broke, but basically that suited me fine, we had a monthlong writing period and so I went to Mom's, stayed in her tiny room and wrote at night while she lay asleep at the far end of the same room, then slept in the hall during the day while she was at work. In the evenings we ate together, chatted or watched TV until she went to bed and my night shift started. After two weeks she drove me to Sørbøvåg, where there was more space, and I immersed myself in the life that went on there, so infinitely far from the life I lived in Bergen, but I was not without a guilty conscience, for what I was doing, the abjectness of it, became so clear when I was surrounded by frailty and disease, but also vitality and warmth.

After Christmas Yngve moved into a collective in Fjellsiden, the apartment he had occupied until then was due to be sold. The collective was in a splendid large detached house, I often went there, it was one of the few places I could go. He lived with three others, one of whom, Per Roger, I talked to, he was interested in literature and was a writer himself, but as he was in Yngve's circle, I felt so inferior to him that I barely answered when he asked me something and nothing came of the relationship.

An essay course started at the Academy, I wrote about Tolkien's Lord of the Rings, one of the books I was really passionate about, alongside Bram Stoker's Dracula, and even though they didn't fall into the category of literature the teachers favored and taught, I still received some praise from Fosse, he said my language was tight and precise, my arguments solid and interesting, and that I obviously had a talent for nonfiction. The praise was double edged: did it mean that my future lay in literature about literature and not in literature itself?

Øystein Lønn dropped by on various occasions, the idea being that we should hand in our texts to him, but I didn't want to, I couldn't face any more humiliation in the classroom, and instead went to see him privately, at his hotel, with my text in hand. At the beginning of the course he had said he was at our disposal from dawn till dusk, and all we had to do was go and see him if there was anything we wanted to discuss. So, one evening at seven, I trudged down the hills below my place, the street lamps above me swinging in the wind, the rain beating on the walls and roofs. The heavens were inexhaustible, it had rained every day since the beginning of September and except for a couple of hours I hadn't seen the sun for what would soon be eight months. The streets were deserted apart from a few people who rushed past hugging the walls, in Bergen it was vital to get from A to B as fast as you could. The water in Vågen glittered in the reflection from the buildings along the quay, an express ferry drifted in and docked. As I passed the terminal it had lowered the gangplank and passengers were disembarking, mostly into waiting taxis.

Lønn was staying at Hotel Neptun around the corner, I went in, was given his room number at reception, went up, and knocked on the door.

Lønn, a sturdy fellow with big hands and a broad face, stared at me in surprise.

"You said we could come and see you if we had something to discuss," I said. "So I brought a text with me. I wonder if you would mind having a look at it."

"Not at all," he said. "Come in!"

The room was dark, he had only the two bedside lamps switched on, and the carpet, which was red and stretched from wall to wall, seemed to absorb all the light.

"Sit down," he said. "What was it you wanted me to look at? I can do it for tomorrow if you like."

"It's short," I said. "Just over a page."

"I'd better have a look at it then," he said. I passed him the text, he perched a pair of glasses on his nose and began to read.

I glanced around cautiously. It was a story about some young boys who had climbed up the steel cables of a bridge, it was snowing hard, they disappeared in the whirl of falling snow, one of them jumped. It transpired this happened regularly, that a boy jumped to his death. The novella, or short prose text, was inspired by Julio Cortázar.

"Ye-es," Lønn said, removed his glasses, folded them and put them in his shirt pocket. "A nice little story. Concise and pithily told. There's not much more to say about it, is there?"

"No," I said. "Did you like it?"

"Yes, I liked it a lot."

He got up. I got up too. He handed me the text.

"Good luck," he said.

"Thank you," I said.

He closed the door behind me, I walked down the corridor and felt like screaming at my own stupidity, what had I been trying to achieve? What had I expected? That he would say actually I was brilliant? That he would write to his publisher about me?

No, not that I was brilliant, I didn't believe that, but that he should take an interest in me and perhaps tell someone at his publishing house, that would have been a possibility, I had thought. Publishing houses did sometimes take an interest in Writing Academy students, that was well known. So why not in me?

When Lønn finished his course he did it with a few well-chosen sentences about each and every student and the various literary projects that he had been allowed to share. Praise for everyone apart from me, whom he failed to mention.

I left, furious and bitter.

It was true I hadn't handed in any work to him like the others, but he had read one of my texts. Why would he make a secret of that? If he thought it was so awful, surely he could at least have said?

After that, I stayed away from the Academy for several weeks. I had already skipped some classes in the autumn, and I stepped it up after Christmas, there was no obligation to attend classes, we were free to decide, and for as long as it felt as if I was having my head shoved down the toilet whenever I was there, I had no reason to attend everything, I reasoned, it was better to sit at home and write, after all that was what I had said when I applied, that the course would give me the opportunity to write full-time for a year.

So during the spring I was more often at home than in the Academy, and after the Lønn business I almost gave up attending classes. I didn't write either, everything felt meaningless, apart from going out, which had continued, I did everything I wanted to do, the decadent bohemian city lifestyle, the writer going to wrack and ruin with his eyes open wide and a bottle on the table. I broke one of my rules, I went out drinking on my own one evening, I sat in Fekterloftet with a carafe of white wine. Fekterloftet's speciality was that all the girls who worked there were stunning. That was why I had chosen this particular place to go, thinking I might be able to start a conversation with one of them, but it didn't happen, they were interested in serving and little else, so once I had finished the second carafe I got up and went to Café Opera, where I hung out in the bar until they closed, without seeing one familiar face, then I walked home. I woke up to someone shaking me, opened my eyes, I was lying in the hall, on the floor, sat up, it was Jon Olav. I had crashed out next to his door. The pockets in my waterproof bulged with small stones. I realized I must have collected them to throw at his window. Then someone living there must have come along and I followed him in. Jon Olav laughed at me, and I went back home, my body aching for more sleep. A couple of days later I went to Café Opera in the morning, I wasn't in the mood to go to the Academy and didn't feel like sitting at home, so I decided to wander down and buy myself a bottle of wine and see what happened. Getting drunk in the middle of the day was a good feeling, there was a lot of freedom in it, suddenly the day opened and offered quite different opportunities now that I didn't care about anything. Just walking down the street to buy some newspapers at a kiosk was an experience when you were drunk. It was as though a hole into the world had been opened, all the usual stuff, shelves of chewing gum, pastilles, chocolate, had an unpleasant air when you saw it through drunken eyes in the middle of the day. Not to mention the newspaper articles I read, back at a window table a few minutes later. Something raw and terrible attached itself to them, while I in fact viewed them with vivid, almost triumphant, feelings. Jesus, man, I was somebody, I could see something no one else could see, I could see into the depths of the world.

I drank all day, at around five I ate there, then I went down to a bookshop and bought a novel by Jayne Anne Phillips, which I tried to read for the next few hours with limited success, I could no longer concentrate for more than a few minutes at a time, every sentence I read made me swell with emotion. I can do that too, I thought. No, I can do better than that. Much, much better.

I started to doze off, closed my eyes and went absent for odd moments, came to with a jerk, how long had I been gone? Around me Café Opera was slowly filling up. Suddenly Per Roger was standing in front of me.

"Hi, Karl Ove," he said. "Are you out on your own?"

I saw no point in denying it and nodded.

"Come over and join us then!" he said. "We're sitting over there."

I stared at him. What was that he said?

"How much have you actually had to drink?" Per laughed. "Are you coming? We've got girls there too!"

I stood up and followed him to their table, sat down on one of the chairs, nodded to the others. There were five of them. The nearest one had shoulder-length fair hair and glasses, sideburns, and a T-shirt with a skull, a snake, and a dagger on underneath a grayish-white goatskin jacket. The guy beside him had long dark hair and sluggish eyes. Then there was a girl, perhaps a couple of years older than me, whom the last member of the group, a short-haired, dark handsome guy with a crafty expression, clearly had a soft spot for.

"This is Karl Ove," Per Roger said.

"I've seen you before," said the fair-haired guy. "You a student?"

"I'm at the Writing Academy," I said.

"Oh really," he said. "You're talking to the wrong man then. If there's one thing I haven't got, it's culture! My name's Gaute by the way."

He was from Bergen, his pal was from Bergen too, while the sly dark-haired guy was from Odda. The girl was an Østlander. Gaute and Per Roger talked and laughed a lot, the others didn't say that much, laughed now and then at what Gaute said, but seemed to be somewhere else. I drank and looked out the window, at the dry asphalt reflecting the street lamps. A little guy, around twenty-five, wearing a white shirt, sat down at the table. His eyes were blue, cold, and bored.

Gaute looked at me.

"Do you know what the skin around a cunt is called?" he said.

"No."

"A woman."

He laughed, I did too, and then we skål-ed. Slowly I entered a new phase of intoxication, I rose higher and higher, it was wonderful, I didn't care about anything anymore. Laughed a bit, made the odd comment, went to the bar and got more beer as the glasses emptied.

You didn't have to be with Gaute for long to know that he disliked everything that smacked of power and the Establishment with all his heart, in fact he hated it. I had met a lot of people with antibourgeois attitudes, but they were students and a part of the system, this guy seemed to have drawn his own conclusions, he was completely on the outside, joking and laughing at everything, quips about Jews and blacks came thick and fast, and I laughed at them so much I could hardly stop. When Café Opera closed he suggested we go back to his place and play a few records and smoke a bit, we shambled out, flagged down a taxi, and went to his apartment, which, it turned out, was on the Nordnes peninsula.

When we got out of the taxi and into the stairwell, Per Roger said they had been drinking for six months now and were planning to continue. I said I could imagine doing that. Just stick with us, he said, and then we went into Gaute's apartment.

"It's my mother's," he said. "That's why it's so nice here. Sorry. Ha ha ha! But I don't want any shouting, OK. There are neighbors here too."

"Come on, Gaute," Per Roger said. "If I want to shout I will."

Gaute didn't answer, took out a record, I sat down at the table. The music he played was somber and loud. The other long-haired guy, whose name I couldn't remember, brought an enormous carrot from the fridge and started carving it, sitting on the floor with his back against the wall, engrossed in his task.

"What are you doing?" I said.

He didn't answer.

"He's making a pipe," Gaute said. "He comes from Åsane. Full of losers there, and that's what they do. But you're not a Lords of the New Church man, are you?"

I shook my head.

"Pop and indie," I said.

"Pop and indie," he said, shaking his head. "Can we be bothered to wait for the pipe? You've got tobacco, haven't you?"

"Yes."

"What would you say if I put a bit of horse on the table?" he said, with his cold eyes.

"A horse on the table?" Gaute said, laughing. "What the hell are we going to do with that?"

"Have you got anything to drink?" I said.

"There might be a drop left somewhere. I don't know. You'd better have a look. If you want," he said, nodding toward the kitchen. "I feel like a smoke myself."

He looked at the guy from Odda.

"Did you say you had some on you?" he said.

The Odda guy nodded, took out a clump of hash wrapped in silver paper and a packet of large Rizla papers and passed them to Gaute. He heated up the clump, I put the tobacco in the paper, picked out the longest threads and ran the lighter over it a few times, the way I had seen others do it, gave it to him, he mixed the hash into the tobacco, rolled up the cigarette, licked it, and passed the whole salami to me.

We smoked half of it, I got up and went to the toilet, I felt as though my head had been blitzed, all my thoughts were scattered, one bit here, one bit there, mumbling to myself as I peed.

When I went back in, Gaute and Per Roger were talking loudly, almost shouting, a wild hodgepodge of Jew jokes, wordplay, and brutality. The guy with the eyes wasn't to be seen anywhere. The guy from Odda was sitting with the girl on his lap making out. The long-haired loser was filling the carrot pipe with tobacco. I slid down the wall to the floor. Across the table they began to discuss the most brutal ways you could kill yourself. Gaute leaned forward and passed me the joint. I took a deep drag.

"Give it here," Gaute said with a snigger. I passed him the joint, he took a drag and his cheeks were hollow for ages before he exhaled the smoke and passed the joint on to Per Roger.

"You've landed in a suicidal viper's nest," he said, and laughed. "We'll drink for as long as we can, and then we'll kill ourselves. That's the plan. And you're in, Per Roger says."

"Yes," I said. "For the drinking part anyhow."

"Can't have one without the other," Gaute said, and laughed again. "But we have to do it in turn. So those who are left can sell the hair and the gold teeth and keep going for a few more days. Ha ha ha!"

Per Roger laughed as he stared at me.

Then he said:

wriggle with the snake
slither and slide
whither the viper wills

"What was that?" I said. "Hávamál or what?"

"No, it's a poem I wrote."

"Did you? That's fantastic."

"We all know which snake you're thinking about!" Gaute said. "We also know where it's going! 'Slither and slide,' that's you!"

Per Roger laughed at what Gaute said, but he stared at me with serious wide-open eyes. I looked down.

The Odda guy and the girl got up and were gone. I couldn't be bothered to look where. I disappeared, when I opened my eyes again the room was empty, apart from the guy with the carrot, who was sleeping on the floor. I stood up and went out. The darkness was dense, the streets were deserted. I had no idea what the time was, just walked toward town, barely present inside myself. A car raced up behind me, it was a taxi, I raised my hand in the air, it stopped, I got in, mumbled my address, and when it accelerated down the cobbled street it was as though I was taking off, I was floating on the backseat, like a balloon under the car roof. Oh, I had to control this feeling, I couldn't fly inside the taxi, but it didn't work, I couldn't hold myself down, I floated like a balloon under the roof the whole way home. Once there, I undressed, went to bed and slept like a log. When I awoke it was pitch black outside. I looked at my watch. It was five o'clock.

Five o'clock in the afternoon or the morning?

Surely it had to be the afternoon?

I leaned forward and peered through the window. Two kids in waterproofs were kicking a ball to each other in the park on the other side of the street. Afternoon then. I went down to the basement and had a shower, and then, absolutely ravenous, I fried all the eggs I had and put them on six slices of bread, which I wolfed down. Followed by a liter of milk with Nesquik.

It felt as though I had seen hell's gates open.

I wrote all night with the rain beating against the window and drunken night owls sporadically walking past in the otherwise empty street. In the morning, the house filled with the noise of people starting the day, I went back to bed, and when I awoke, at around one, it was from a dream in which I had died. I was doing this more and more often, and I was more frightened in these dreams than I had ever been awake. Usually I fell from a great height, but sometimes I drowned. It was as if I was absolutely clear-headed and conscious, as if what happened was real. Now I am going to die, I thought.

I got dressed, ate a few slices of bread and butter, and went to Yngve's.

I rang the bell. One of the girls opened the door.

"Hi," she said. "Yngve's out. Would you like to come in and wait?"

"Maybe," I said. "Is Per Roger in?"

"No. He's been away for several days. I think he's on a binge."

I said nothing about having been drinking with him the other night, I didn't want any conversation.

"You'll be alright, won't you?" she said, and when I nodded she disappeared into her room. I slumped on the sofa, took one of the magazines on the table and flicked through.

After a while I went over to the window and looked out at the gray ocean that was the sky and the red rooftops and white walls that ran down cheek by jowl toward the town center. For all I knew he might be out until the following day.

The girl came back, she slipped into the kitchen, poked her head out and asked if I wanted a cup of tea.

"No, thanks," I said. "Incidentally, you don't know where Yngve is, do you?"

"No idea. I think he was going to see Ingvild."

"Oh. Well, that might be a while then," I said. The natural consequence of what she said was that I should go. But I didn't want to. I'll give him another half an hour, I thought, and went into his room. It was a part of the collective and not as private as it would have been, had it been his bedroom in a normal apartment, but I still felt a little uneasy at being there. It smelled the same as the place in Solheimsviken, and the possessions were the same, right down to the white IKEA bedspread. I looked through his record collection, wondering if I should play some music while I was waiting, but decided that would be too much, sitting in his room and playing his records when he came home, that wouldn't look good.

Perhaps it would be best to go home.

I got up and went into the hall. As I bent down to tie my shoelaces the door opened and Yngve stood in front of me with a dripping umbrella in one hand and a Mekka bag in the other.

"Are you off?" he said.

"No, not now," I said. "Didn't think you'd be here for a while."

He took his purchases into the kitchen, I sat down in the living room.

"I'm going to make an omelette," he shouted from inside. "Want one?"

"OK," I shouted back.

We ate without speaking, he sat with the remote control in front of him zapping through the sports pages on Teletext. Afterward he made some coffee, the girl came down, Yngve cracked a joke, she laughed, I lit a cigarette and thought I'd better go now, however it was still better sitting here than at home.

"I've finished the music for your lyrics by the way," he said. "Would you like to hear it?"

I followed him into his room. He hung the guitar strap over his shoulder, switched on the amplifier, adjusted the echo box, and strummed a few chords.

"Ready?" he said.

I nodded and he began to play, slightly embarrassed. He didn't sing very well, but that wasn't the point, I only had to hear how the tune went, nevertheless I still couldn't watch him as he stood there with his head lowered and the guitar hanging over his hips, singing. But it was catchy, a nice simple pop song.

I told him. He lifted the guitar over his head and put it on the stand.

"I need some more songs," he said. "Couldn't you just dash off a few?"

"I'll try."

We went back into the living room. He said he was going to a party tomorrow, someone in his department was giving it, a little out of town.

"Do you feel like coming?"

"Maybe," I said. "Will Ingvild be going?"

"I think so, yes."

I had met them together two or three times. It had been strange, but it had gone well, all three of us pretended nothing had happened, and now that I no longer believed there was a chance of going out with her, I didn't have any problem talking to her either. Once we had been alone at the same table in Café Opera, the conversation had flowed easily and naturally, she talked about her father and her relationship with him, I listened, she talked about her time at gymnas, and I told her a little about mine, she laughed in the fantastic way she did, when her eyes seemed to burst into laughter. All my feelings for her were intact, she was still the one I wanted, still the one I yearned for, but now that it was impossible, now that there was a definitive obstacle in the way, I was no longer afraid of talking to her. And while at the beginning of their relationship I had avoided them like the plague, I hadn't wanted to see them at all, yet had started meeting Yngve, though still not her, everything had been turned on its head: now I wanted her to be there or come along when I was with Yngve. I just wanted to see her, just be in the same room as her, be filled with her presence.

I sat up all night penning lyrics for Yngve. It was fun, it was quite different from writing texts to read out at the Academy, here this was about thinking up some phrases that sounded good and then finding something that would rhyme. This wasn't about anything in particular, didn't have a theme, didn't go anywhere, and it was liberating. It was like doing a crossword.

By three in the morning I had one song ready.

Over My Head

I die in dreams
Nights in blue
Cannot forget
Know we're through

Howl at the moon
There we lie
Know no bounds
Off we fly

Know it's alright
Take it as read
Know you can do it
Tho' it's over my head

You're moving on Why, oh why
You know no bounds
Off you fly

I die in dreams
Nights in blue
No way, it seems
Gone like the dew

Know it's alright
Take it as read
Know you can do it
Tho' it's over my head

When I went to see Yngve the next evening Ingvild was there and I left the lyrics in my jacket pocket, sat down with a beer in my hand instead, and casually asked how she was doing. She was wearing the white sweater with the blue stripes and blue jeans. She was both at home and not at home with her surroundings, and I wondered whether she was always like that, split somehow, always with one eye on herself, or was it just here, at Yngve's? They sat beside each other on the sofa, but apart. They hadn't touched each other since I arrived, either. Was that because of me? Were they being considerate to me? Or was that how they behaved with each other?

She said everything was going well and she loved being in the collective in Nygårdsgaten. The history of the collective went back to the 1960s, she said, actually Kjartan Fløgstad had lived there once. Now some of Yngve's friends lived there: Frank from Arendal, an odd character, according to her, and Atle from Kristiansand, as well as two other girls.

After a while she got up to go for a shower, and after she had gone I took out the song I had written for Yngve. He cast a quick eye over it. It's great, he said, and stuffed it in his back pocket.

Ingvild walked through the room wrapped in a large towel.

I looked away.

"We have to go soon," Yngve said. "You'll have to hurry."

"Yes, yes," Ingvild said.

We had another beer, then he stood up and started to get dressed. Opened the door to the room where Ingvild was standing drying her hair.

"Let's go. Come on," he said.

"I just have to finish drying my hair," she said from inside the room.

"Couldn't you have done it a bit earlier?" Yngve said. "You knew we had to go soon, didn't you?"

He closed the door.

"Good thing I didn't book a taxi anyway," he said without looking at me.

"Yes," I said.

There was a silence. The girl who lived there went into the living room and switched on the television.

At the party, which consisted mainly of Media students, plus a crowd of Music types, I was as usual Yngve's little brother and nothing else. Girls thought it amusing that we were so alike, I said next to nothing, apart from when someone put on a classical record and asked what it was and none of the Media students could answer, and I said, my face half averted and embarrassed at myself, that it was Tchaikovsky. It was. Yngve eyed me with surprise. How did you know? he said. Lucky break, I said, and it was, too, I had one record by Tchaikovsky and that was the one.

Ingvild took an early taxi home, Yngve stayed and it was painful to see that he didn't appreciate her more, that he was happy to see her go. If it had been me I would have flung my arms around her. I had worshipped her. I had given her everything I had. Yngve didn't do that. Did he care about her at all?

He must. But he was older, more experienced, a different light burned in him than my stupid naïve one. And what I also saw was that he gave Ingvild space, a larger space than she occupied, which I couldn't have done, never in this world, because we were in the same space, she and I, the space of uncertainty and hesitation, half groping and half clutching. She needed him as much as I did.

After we had run through various dramatists and various drama traditions at the Academy, the idea was that we should write something in the genre ourselves, as usual. I put off doing this until the evening before it was due, then I plodded off to Verftet to sit there all night. We had a standing offer of a desk there if we needed an undisturbed place to write in the afternoon and evening, I had borrowed the keys and done it a couple of times, there was something about being alone in a common room that I liked, perhaps because there was nothing in it that reminded me of myself, I wasn't quite sure why, that was just how it was, also this evening when I let myself in and walked through the empty hallway, up the empty stairs, and into the empty rooms at the top.

The others had already handed in their contributions, photocopies of their work lay in piles on the table in the adjacent room. I found a typewriter, put on some coffee, stared at the reflection of the room in the black windows, as though it had been pulled out of the drifting waters of Vågen. It was nine o'clock, I had decided I would sit here until I had finished, even if it took all night.

I had no idea what to write.

The coffee was ready, I drank a cup, smoked a cigarette, stared at the image of myself in the window. Turned and looked at the bookshelves. They wouldn't have a photography book of scantily clad or naked women here, would . . . ?

But they did have a book about the history of art. I pulled it down and leafed through. Some of the sixteenth- and seventeenth-century paintings were of naked women. Perhaps there was something I could use there?

It was too big for me to fit into my trousers. And I didn't want to carry it under my arm because even though the chance of someone appearing at this time was minimal it wasn't impossible, and how would I explain lugging an art book down to the restroom?

I put it in a bag and went down the spiral staircase and into the toilet. A picture by Raphael stood out at once, two women in front of a well, one naked, the other dressed, the naked one was strikingly beautiful, she was looking enigmatically to the side, her small breasts were pert, a strip of cloth covered her nether region, but her thighs were visible and I got a hard-on, I flipped through, stared at a picture by Rubens, The Rape of the Daughters of Leucippus (1618), one of the two naked women was the red-haired, pale freckly type with a small chin and a full body, then there was Botticelli's The Birth of Venus (1485), where one breast was bared, and Titian's Venus of Urbino (1538), in which the woman in the foreground had one hand resting between her legs while she gazed straight at the observer with a provocative, self-assured expression on her face. I studied her naked breasts for a long time, her broad hips and small feet, but there was more to see of course, and I went on to Bartholomeus Spranger's Vulcan and Maia (1585), in which the woman, with her hands on a strong bearded man, thrusts her hips forward with a lustful glint in her eye. Her breasts were supple, her skin was all white, her face almost childish. She was good. The next was Delacroix's The Death of Sardanapalus (1827), the woman in the foreground had her back to us, one breast was revealed, thrust right forward, because she had a sword to her throat, and the whole of her bottom was visible, perfectly formed. During this time, as I flipped backward and forward, trying to decide which picture to go for, I moved slowly, holding myself back. Maybe Delacroix? No, it had to be Ingres! Odalisque with Slave (1842). She's lying full-length with her arms behind her head and is all wonderful curves, or, oh, of course The Turkish Bath (1862). Only women in this one and they were all naked. They sat and stood in every conceivable pose and every possible type was represented: cool, passionate, half concealed, fully exposed. All skin and flesh and female forms as far as the eye could see. But which one, oh, which one? The one with the chubby face and the open lips? I loved faces in which the mouths were slightly open and the teeth always visible. Or the blond just behind with the haughty gaze? The one with the small breasts staring at her hand? Or the one, oh yes, sitting behind her, leaning back, arms outstretched, eyes closed in ecstasy, it had to be her!

Afterward I stood still for a moment to make sure there was no one in the corridor outside, then I went back up, returned the book to its place on the shelf, poured myself a cup of coffee, lit a cigarette, and sat staring at the blank page.

Nothing. I had no idea what to write.

I went for a little walk inside, browsed through the books, went into the photocopy room, skimmed through the others' work. They were what you would expect, each and every one of them had written in complete keeping with their own particular style. Most I just cast a quick glance at, but I took Petra's into the classroom and read it carefully. It was a kind of absurd, almost surreal, comedy where people did totally unmotivated and pretty crazy things, it was high tempo, devoid of meaning, my main impression was: chaos and randomness.

Surely I could do that too?

I began to write, and I wrote quickly, one scene after the other appeared on the paper, as a kind of extension of what I had read. There might have been some slight similarities in the characterization, what they got up to was also unmotivated and unexpected, but it was not a carbon copy of Petra's, ultimately the characters did do different things, and I was very pleased when I had a first draft at around three. I touched it up, went through the whole drama one more time, and by eight in the morning I had got so far that I was able to photocopy the text ten times and put the copies in a pile beside the others. When the first student arrived, at a quarter to ten, I was asleep in my chair.

The whole day was spent analyzing the texts. I was praised for mine, although Hovland had some criticisms regarding its dramatic quality, in other words, the link between the characters and the scenes, I defended myself by saying there wasn't supposed to be a link, that was the whole point, and he nodded and said yes, but even incoherence requires coherence; the rule of thumb for all writing is that you can write about boredom, but it mustn't be boring.

Petra had watched me during the analysis, but she said nothing, even when Hovland asked her directly for her opinion she said she had no comments to make. It was only when the lesson was over and people were tidying up and putting on coats that it came.

"You copied my text," she said.

"I did not," I said.

"You were here last night, you read my text, and then you wrote yours. That's copying pure and simple."

"No," I said. "I didn't read yours at all. How can I copy it if I haven't read it?"

"D'you think I'm stupid or what? You sat here, read it, and wrote a variation on a theme. You might as well admit it."

"Well, I would admit it if there was anything in your claim," I said. "But there isn't. I didn't read your text. And I didn't copy it. If there's any similarity at all it's pure chance."

"Ha!" she said, and got up, put her papers and books in her black bag. "It makes no difference to me, it's alright if you copy what I do, but lying about it is not at all alright."

"I'm not lying," I said. "I didn't know a thing until you read it to us."

She rolled her eyes, put on her jacket, and walked toward the exit. I waited a few minutes, for my head to cool down and for Petra to be so far away that I couldn't catch up with her, then I made my way home. I recognized this situation, it was the same as the one I had been in at school, when I had voted for myself as class rep and received only one vote, and someone found out, by asking everyone in the class who they had voted for. I denied it, they couldn't prove anything, I just said no, it wasn't true. In this case, it wasn't possible to prove anything, no one else but me knew that I had read her piece, I just had to keep denying it, she was the one making a fool of herself. But I had no great desire to show my face there again, for if no one else knew for certain, I did. The night before, it had seemed natural, a matter of course, I had only borrowed a little from her, surely that was justified, but during the analysis and in our subsequent exchange it took on a different aspect, I had plagiarized her work and what did that make me? How could I become so desperate that I not only plagiarized a fellow student's work but on top of that deluded myself into thinking I had made up everything myself?

Once I had copied a poem into my diary and pretended it was me who had written it. I had been twelve at the time, and strange as it might be that I could so openly dupe myself, you wrote this Karl Ove, you did, while I had copied it from a book, age was a mitigating circumstance. Now I was twenty though, an adult man, how could I have knowingly done anything so base?

For the next few weeks I stayed at home. I wrote my novel, it was hopeless, but I was nearing the end, and it was important I had something concrete and tangible to show for my work this year.

I had sent a text, the one Øystein Lønn had read, to the Cappelen magazine Signaler and one day it came back. I nurtured wild hopes of an acceptance as I opened the envelope, but guessed which way the wind was blowing, so it was no surprise when I read:

Dear Karl Ove Knausgaard,

Thank you for sending me your contribution. I read it with interest, but I am afraid I cannot use it in SIGNALER 89.

Best regards,
Lars Saabye Christensen

It gave me a little frisson of excitement to see Saabye Christensen's signature, it meant he had read what I had written. For a few minutes at any rate I had filled his mind with what existed in mine!

XTC brought out Oranges and Lemons, I played it again and again, right until deLillos released their Hjernen er alene, The Brain Is Alone, then that was what was played on my stereo day and night. Outside, the skies were lighter and the rain fell less often. The feelings of spring, which had been so strong when I was a boy, which had filled all my senses and somehow raised body and soul after the winter's heaviness and darkness, overcame me again. I kept at my novel, I wouldn't finish it until the semester was over, but I planned to hand in what I had done as my final assignment at the Academy. It was the same novel that had got me into the course, and there was no development evident in it, I wrote in exactly the same style now as I had done then, the whole year had been wasted, the sole difference was that when they accepted me I thought I was a writer, while now, on the verge of finishing, I knew I wasn't.

One evening Yngve and Asbjørn appeared on the steps.

"Are you coming out?" Asbjørn said.

"I'd love to," I said. "But I don't have any money."

"You can borrow some if you want," Asbjørn said. "Yngve has a broken heart, so we have to drink him through it."

"It's over with Ingvild," Yngve said, and smiled.

"OK," I said. "Count me in. Hang on a moment."

I grabbed my jacket and tobacco and walked to town with them. The next three days were a blur, we drank day and night, slept at Asbjørn's, got drunk in the morning, ate in town, continued drinking in his apartment, went out in the evening, to all sorts of weird places, such as Uglen or the bar at Rica, and it was wonderful, nothing could beat the feeling of walking across Torgalmenningen and Fisketorget in the middle of the day, drunk, it was as though I was right and everyone else was wrong, as though I was free and everyone else tied and bound to everyday life, and with Yngve and Asbjørn it didn't seem wrong or excessive, just fun. On the last night, we didn't know it would be the last, we took cans of spray paint with us. At Hulen, where we ended up, the place wasn't very full, when I went to the toilet I spray-painted a slogan inside the cubicle, soon afterward a member of the staff came with a cloth and bucket to clean it off, once he had left I did it again, we laughed and decided to go the whole hog, spray paint some buildings in town, and we went out, to Møhlenpris, I wrote U2 STOPS ROCK 'N' ROLL along a big brick wall in letters as high as myself, they had just played on a rooftop, it hadn't been good, and Bono had formulated the slogan U2 Stops Traffic, which was even less good, while Asbjørn wrote RICKY

NELSON RULES OK over the tram depot wall, and Yngve wrote CAT, WE NEED YOU TO RAP on another wall, we continued like this toward his collective, where we stopped to have more to drink. An hour later we had all crashed out. When we woke up it was to the fear of what we had done, because the trail led to us: the graffiti started outside Hulen and continued all the way here, to the wall beside the door, where you could read YNGVE IS A DAMN. . . It wouldn't take much of an investigation to work out where the vandals who had spray-painted the whole of Møhlenpris lived. Especially Asbjørn was jittery, but I wasn't immune, and that was strange because all I wanted to do was to keep on drinking, live the life, not give a damn, yet I hit a wall whenever I did that, a wall of petite-bourgeoisie and middle-class manners, which could not be broken down without enormous anguish and fear. I wanted to, but I couldn't. Deep down, I was decent and proper, a goody-goody, and, I thought, perhaps that was also why I couldn't write. I wasn't wild enough, not artistic enough, in short, much too normal for my writing to take off. What had made me believe anything else? Oh, but this was the life-lie.

What I had learned over the course of the year at the Writing Academy was that there was a literature that was real literature, the true lofty variety, which stretched from Homer's epics and the Greek dramas through the course of history up to the present day with writers such as Ole Robert Sunde, Tor Ulven, Eldrid Lunden, Kjartan Fløgstad, Georg Johannesen, Liv Lundberg, Anne Bøe, Ellen Einan, Steinar Løding, Jon Fosse, Terje Dragseth, Hans Herbjørnsrud, Jan Kjærstad, Øystein Lønn, Svein Jarvoll, Finn Øglænd, the Danes Søren Ulrik Thomsen and Michael Strunge, the Swedes Katarina Frostenson and Stig Larsson. I knew that the great Scandinavian poet of this century was Gunnar Ekelöf, and the great Finnish-Swedish modernist Gunnar Björling, I knew that our own Rolf Jacobsen wasn't fit to tie their shoelaces and Olav H. Hauge was rooted in tradition to a far greater degree than they were. I knew the last great innovation in the novel took place in France in the 1960s, and that it was ongoing, especially in the novels of Claude Simon. I also knew that I couldn't reinvent the novel, I couldn't even copy those who were being innovative as I didn't understand where the novel's essence lay. I was blind, I couldn't read; if I read Stig Larsson's Introduction, for example, I couldn't say what was new about it or what the essence was, I read all novels the way I had once read crime fiction and thrillers, the endless series of books I had read as a thirteen- or fourteen-year-old, about Black September and Jackal, about spies during the Second World War and randy elephant hunters in Africa. What had changed during this year was that now I definitely knew that there were differences. But this hadn't had any impact on my own writing. To solve this problem, I had made a subgenre of the modern novel my own, this was the one I marketed as my ideal, American novels and short stories written by Bret Easton Ellis, Jayne Anne Phillips, Jay McInerny, Barry Gifford. This was how I excused what I wrote.

I had gained an insight. At great expense, but it was real and important: I was not a writer. What writers had, I did not have. I fought against this insight, I told myself I might be able to have what writers had, it might be attainable provided I persisted for long enough, while knowing in fact this was only a consolation. Probably Jon Fosse had been right, probably my talent did consist in writing about literature and not writing literature itself.

This was my final assessment, some days after going on a bender with Yngve and Asbjørn, walking home from the Academy after handing in my manuscript. The novel wasn't finished, and I had decided to spend the rest of the spring and summer on it. When it was completed I would send it to a publisher. I had decided on Cappelen, to whom I felt some loyalty after the personal rejection by Lars Saabye Christensen. I assumed I would get another rejection, but I wasn't entirely sure, they might see something in my writing that Jon Fosse and Ragnar Hovland hadn't, after all they, too, had seen something inasmuch as they had accepted me into the course – this was a small hope, but it was there and would be there right until a letter from Cappelen landed in my mailbox. It wasn't over until then.

The light in the town had been changing character during the spring. The dampness and the gloom of the autumn and winter hues were gone. Now the colors were dry and light and with the white houses reflecting the light, even the indirect light when the sun was behind the clouds, shimmering and bright, it was as though the whole town had risen. In the autumn and winter Bergen was like a bowl, it lay still and took whatever came its way; in the spring and summer it was as though the mountains folded back, like the petals of a flower, and the town burst forth in its own right, humming and quivering.

You couldn't sit inside in the evenings then.

I knocked on Morten's door, asked if he wanted to go with me to Christian, and if so, could he lend me some money, he could, and we perched at a table staring at all the beautiful girls who were out walking, not the black-clad, intellectual kind, but the nicely dressed, blond conventional kind, while we discussed how difficult everything was and we slowly got drunk and the evening dissolved into the usual darkness. I woke up under a bush by Lille Lundgård Lake with someone tugging at me, it was a policeman, he said I couldn't sleep there, I got up sleepily and went home.

I knocked on Ingvild's door in her new collective, she was surprised to see me but also happy, I sensed, and I was happy too. It was a big collective with a corner window facing Nygårdsgaten and the Grieg Hall, I said hello to the others living there, faces I had seen but not spoken to, all in some way or other connected with Yngve. Ingvild was fully integrated into student life, that was good to see, at the same time it made her harder to reach, I was on the outside, she said twice she wanted me as a friend and I assumed that probably meant she didn't want me as a boyfriend.

We sat there on the big sofa, she had made some tea, seemed happy, I looked at her, tried not to show how depressed I was, how sorry I was that we weren't together, and never would be, then I smiled and talked about more pleasurable matters, and when I left she must have thought it was all over as far as I was concerned and now we were actually only friends.

Before leaving I asked her if she could lend me a hundred kroner or two. In fact I was flat broke, didn't even have enough money for a smoke.

"Yes, of course," she said. "But I want it back!"

"Goes without saying," I said. "Have you got two hundred?"

I owed both Yngve and Asbjørn so much that I couldn't borrow any more. I also owed Morten quite a bit, and Jon Olav and Anne. I had also begged a hundred here and a hundred there when I had been out, off Yngve's friends, no one was that careful when they were out drinking, and I didn't have to pay everyone back.

Ingvild had two hundred. I stuffed the money in my pocket and went downstairs as she returned to her room.

Strange, I thought as I emerged and felt the warm air on my face and saw the row of trees that had begun to burst into leaf behind the Grieg Hall. The moment she was out of sight, I missed her. I had seen her only a few minutes earlier, she had been sitting a meter away from me, her knees together and her upper body leaning over the table, and now I was both excited and sad at the thought that she might be sitting alone in her room at this minute, at the mere knowledge that she existed.

At the end of May Yngve had exams and I joined them in the evenings when they were out celebrating. The town was awash with people, they were everywhere, the air was warm, the trees were an explosion of green, and as I walked around in the evening beneath the light sky, in the dusk-gray streets that never really became dark, all of this gave me strength, all of this lifted my mood, I had such a strong feeling of being alive and, not least, that I wanted to live more.

The year was over, the next day we would be having the end-of-year meal at the Academy and be given the certificate, or whatever it was, to prove we had attended the course. I would go, say good-bye to everyone, and then I would turn my back. Never think about it again.

Among Yngve's student friends spirits were high, beer after beer was brought to our table, and even though I didn't say that much, even though I was temporarily my silent self, I was still there, I drank and smiled and looked at the others, who babbled away about this and that, Ola was the only person I knew, the others I had only seen, so I sat down beside him, he had always taken me under his wing in the sense that he took me seriously and listened to what I said, as though there was something sensible or interesting in it, although he himself was light-years above it. He even laughed at my jokes. But I didn't want to impose on him, or Yngve, who sat there with his head raised, clinking glasses and talking.

By the time the lights flashed and we drank up, then went downstairs to hang around outside until we were all gathered as usual, I was so drunk that I felt as if I were in a tunnel, the sides were all dark, the light was only ahead, wherever I was looking or thinking. I was free.

"There's our Kjærstad!" I said.

"Enough already," he said. "It's not funny, even if you think it is."

"It is pretty funny," I said. "Shall we get going? What are we waiting for?"

Yngve came over to me.

"Easy now," he said.

"OK," I said. "But let's move."

"We're waiting for someone."

"Aren't you pleased it went well?"

"Of course."

He turned to the others. I rummaged through my pockets for cigarettes, couldn't make my lighter work, and threw it to the ground.

"Got a light?"

I asked the guy who resembled Kjærstad, and he nodded, took out a lighter and lit my cigarette, cupping his hand to shield the flame.

I spat and took a drag, looking around me. The girls with us were four, five years older than me, but I was good-looking, surely this wasn't the first time a twenty-year-old had fucked a twenty-five-year-old?

But I had nothing to say to them, even when I was as drunk as I was now, so there was no hope there. You had to say something first, that much I had learned.

Suddenly they started walking. I followed them, always staying in the middle of the crowd, I saw Yngve's head bobbing up and down a few meters ahead of me, and the luminous May night with all the smells, the animated voices, all the other people on the streets, my brain was whirring with thoughts of how good this was. I was a student in Bergen, surrounded by other students, we were off to a party, walking through the streets of Høyden toward Nygård Park, which lay still, breathing quietly, in the darkness between all the roads and buildings, it was 1989, I was twenty years old, full of life and energy. And watching the others walking with me, I thought they weren't like that, only I was, I rose higher and higher, farther and farther, while they stayed where they were. Fucking Media students. Fucking Media brats. Fucking Media theorists. What did they know about life? What did they know about what was really important?

Listen to my heart beating.

Listen to my heart beating, you dozy fucking little imbeciles. Listen to it beating!

Look at me. Look at the strength I've got!

I could crush every last one of them. And it wouldn't be a problem either. I could just go on and on and on. They could belittle me, they could humiliate me, they always had, but I would never give up, it wasn't in my makeup, while all the other idiots, who thought they were so damned clever, they had nothing inside them, they were completely hollow.

The park.

Oh, Jesus, the entrance to the park! Oh, shit, how beautiful. The dense green foliage, nearly black in the gathering dusk, and the pond. The gravel and the benches.

I took it all in. It became me. I carried it within me.

They stopped, one of them pulled out a bunch of keys from their trouser pocket and opened a door to a detached house on the opposite side of the street from the park.

We went up an old battered staircase, entered an old battered apartment. There was a high ceiling, a fireplace in the corner, rag rugs on the wooden floor, fifties furniture bought at the flea market or at Fretex, the Salvation

Army shop, a poster of Madonna, a poster of Elvis with a gun that Warhol had done, and a poster of the first Godfather film.

We sat down. Spirits and glasses appeared on the table. Yngve sat at the head of the table, I sat at the opposite end, I didn't like having anyone close to me, as you had on the sofa.

I drank. More darkness. They discussed, I threw in comments, Yngve sent me occasional glances and I could see he didn't like what I said or the way I said it. He thought I was showing him up. Let him think that, it wasn't my problem.

I got up and went to the toilet. I pissed in the sink and laughed at the idea of them putting in the plug, filling the sink with water and washing their faces the following morning.

I went back, poured more whiskey, almost everything was dark now.

"Look at the park!" I said.

"What about it?" someone said.

"Easy now, Psycho," Yngve said.

I dragged myself to my feet, grabbed my glass and hurled it at him as hard as I could. It hit him in the face. He fell forward. Everyone got up screaming, rushed to his side. I stood still for a moment and watched the scene unfolding. Then I went into the hall, put on my shoes and jacket, and staggered down the stairs, onto the street and into the park. The feeling of finally having acted was strong. I looked up at the sky, which was light and bright and wonderful, and stared into the green darkness of the park, and then I was gone, it was as though I had been switched off.

I woke up on a corridor floor.

It was light, the sun was streaming in through the windows.

I sat up. There were several doors along the corridor. An old lady stood eyeing me, behind her a younger woman, perhaps forty, she was eyeing me too. They didn't say anything, but they looked scared.

I struggled to my feet. I was still drunk, my body leaden. I understood nothing, it was like being in a dream, but I knew that I was conscious and staggered off down the corridor, a hand against the wall every now and then.

There was something about a fire engine. A fire and a fire engine. Wasn't there?

At the end of the corridor there was a staircase, at the bottom a door with frosted glass in the top part. I went down the stairs, pushed open the door, stopped outside, and squinted into the sun.

In front of me was the end wall of the Science Building. To the left was Lille Lungegård Lake.

I turned and looked at the building where I had slept. It was white and made of brick.

A big police car came down the road and turned into the gravel area in front of me as two women came out of the door behind me.

Two officers walked toward me and stopped.

"I think there's a fire," I said. "A fire engine went that way," I said, pointing across. "It's not here. It's farther away. It must be."

"That's him," said the woman behind me.

"What are you doing here?" one policeman said.

"I don't know," I said. "I woke up here. But I think you should hurry."

"What's your name?"

I looked at him. I teetered to the side, he put his hand on my shoulder to steady me.

"What difference does it make what my name is?" I said. "What's a name?"

"You'd better come with us," he said.

"In the car?"

"Yes, come now."

He put his hand on my arm and led me to the car, pushed open the door, and I got in at the back, a large space which I had all to myself.

Now I had experienced this as well. Being driven through the streets of Bergen in a police car.

Had they arrested me?

But it was the end-of-year meal today!

There were no sirens wailing or anything, they drove sedately and stopped at all the traffic lights. They arrived at the police station, grabbed my arm again, and led me into the building.

"I need to make a telephone call," I said. "It's important. I should be at a meeting. They have to know I won't be coming. I have the right to make a call, I know that."

I was laughing inside, this was just like a film, me, flanked by two policemen, asking to make a telephone call!

And I got my way. They stopped by a phone at the end of the corridor.

I didn't know the number of the Writing Academy. There was a telephone directory underneath, I tried to look it up and failed.

I turned to them.

"I give up," I said.

"OK," they said, and led me to a hatch where I had to empty my pockets and hand over my belt, and then they steered me down to the cellar, or whatever it was, at any rate there were iron doors on either side of the corridor and I had to go through one of them. The cell was completely bare except for a big blue mattress.

"Sleep it off here. Someone will collect you for questioning when you wake up."

"Yes sir!" I said in English, standing in the middle of the cell until they had closed the door behind them, then I lay down on the blue mattress and laughed to myself, for a long time, before falling asleep.

The next time I woke up I was still drunk and everything that had happened out there and on the way here had something dreamlike about it. But the iron door and the concrete floor were tangible enough.

I knocked on the door.

I ought to have shouted, but I didn't know quite what. Guard?

Yes.

"Guard, I've woken up!" I shouted. "Guard! Guard!"

"Shut up!" someone shouted.

That frightened me a bit and I sat down on the mattress. Afterward the door was unlocked and a policeman stared in at me.

"Are you sober now?" he said.

"Yes, I think so," I said. "Perhaps not completely though. Better than before anyway."

"Come with me," he said.

We went up from the cellar, him first, me next, into an elevator and through the floors. He knocked on a door, we went into an office, an older man, maybe fifty, maybe fifty-five, plainclothes, looked at me.

"Sit down," he said.

I sat down on the chair in front of his desk.

"You were found in Florida," he said. "You'd fallen asleep in the corridor of a nursing home. What were you doing there?"

"I don't know," I said. "I was so drunk. I don't remember a thing. Just that I woke up there."

"Do you live in Bergen?"

"Yes."

"What's your name?"

"Karl Ove Knausgaard."

"Have you any convictions?"

"Convictions?"

"Have you ever been convicted of anything? Drugs, breaking and entering?"

"No, no, no."

He looked over at a man standing in the doorway.

"Will you check that?"

The man went into the office next door. While he was there the man who was questioning me sat, head down, filling in a form without saying a word. Blinds covered the windows; outside, between the slats, the sky was blue.

The second man came back.

"Nothing," he said.

"You don't remember anything?" said the man questioning me. "Earlier in the evening, you don't remember anything? Where did you go?"

"I was at a party. By the park."

"Who were you with?"

"My brother, among others. And some of his friends."

He looked at me.

"We'd better call him in then."

"Who?"

"Your brother."

"What's he got to do with this? And what's all this about? I slept in the corridor of a nursing home, that's not good, I know, and you might consider it breaking and entering, but that's all I did."

"You don't remember anything?" he said. "The home was burgled last night and in the immediate vicinity there was a car crash. So things were happening. Then we find you in the corridor of the same home. That's what this is about. What's your brother's name?"

"Yngve Knausgaard."

"His address? And yours?"

I told him.

"You'll be hearing from us. You can go now."

I was escorted down to the ground floor, given my few possessions, and I went into the parking lot outside. I was so tired I could barely walk. I stopped several times to catch my breath, and before Steinkjellergaten I had to sit down on a step, I simply had no energy left. Up the hill, would I make it? But ten minutes later, after the passersby had stared at me, every single one, I got to my feet and lurched up the hill. The walk home from the police station took me close to an hour. In my room I lay down on the bed and fell asleep for the third time within twenty-four hours. Not for long. When I opened my eyes again it was still early afternoon. The heaviness had left my body, it felt normal now apart from a terrible hunger. I ate ten slices of bread and cheese, drank a liter of milk with Nesquik, and went to the phone booth to call the Academy. Fortunately Sagen was there. I told him I had been arrested and hadn't been able to go to the dinner. Arrested? he said. Are you joking? No, I said, I spent the night in a cell. I'm still in a bad way, I'm afraid to say. Could you send me the certificate, do you think? Certainly, he said. Shame you weren't here for the meal. Arrested, you say? Yes, I said. Thank you for everything this year anyway. I'm sure we'll meet again.

I hung up and, with my last coins, I caught the bus into town. The sky was dark blue, the sun red, and above Askøy, the clouds in the east looked as if they were on fire. I walked past the Student Center and down to Møhlenpris, intending to visit Yngve, perhaps he could clarify what had happened.

The door was open and I went up the stairs to the floor where the collective was and rang the bell.

Line, a nice blond girl from Østland, a few years older than me, opened the door.

She looked at me with something akin to fear in her eyes.

"Is Yngve in?" I said.

She nodded.

"Come in," she said. "He's in his room."

I went in, took off my shoes, kept my jacket on, knocked softly on Yngve's door and opened it.

He was standing by the stereo and turned when he heard me.

I stared at him in amazement.

Half his face was covered with a bandage.

Suddenly it all came back to me.

I had hurled a glass at him with all the strength I possessed.

I had thrown it at his eye.

He didn't say anything, just looked at me.

"Did I do that?" I said.

"Yes," he said. "Don't you remember?"

"Yes, now I do," I said. "Did I hit you in the eye? Are you blind?"

He sat down on the chair.

"No, the eye is intact. You hit me just next to it. I had to have stitches. There'll be a permanent scar."

I began to cry.

"I didn't mean it," I said. "I didn't mean it. I don't know why I did it. I didn't mean it. Can you forgive me? Oh, Yngve, can you forgive me?"

He sat like an emperor on the chair in the room, his back erect, legs apart, one hand on his knee, looking at me.

I couldn't meet his gaze, I couldn't look at him.

I lowered my head and sobbed.

Part 2

Three and a half years later, between Christmas and New Year 1992, I stood at the far end of the Student Center, by the stairs up to the concourse where the student organizations had their stands, waiting for the Student Radio program manager. I was going to do my civilian service there and had just come down from a couple of months at a camp in Hustad, on the coast outside Molde, where I had been with other Vestland conscripts to learn various aspects of peace work and conscientious objection to military service. It had been a joke; hardly anyone cared about the idealistic sides of the civilian service role. The majority of them were undoubtedly against war, but their principles didn't leave any deeper marks on them and I felt I had been transported back to a seventh grade confirmation camp, where everyone thought it was fun being alone and away from home, but no one had any time for the reason, our relationship with God and Jesus Christ, and consequently every opportunity to sabotage the teaching and exploit the freedoms we had for our own purposes was taken. The difference was really only age – most people in Hustad were in their early or midtwenties – and the length of the course – not two days but two months – and the facilities. They had a well-equipped music room, a well-stocked library, they had a dark room and video equipment, they had kayaks and diving gear and we could earn a diving certificate. Tours to the district were arranged, a bus came and picked us up; one evening we were driven to Kristiansand, where we were allowed to go out and get drunk. But the most important part was the courses. Someone had worked hard for conscientious objectors to be taken seriously back when young people were passionate about such matters and full of idealism. We didn't give a shit. Attendance was obligatory, but those who didn't feel well or had a headache could barely follow what the teacher was saying, and the mismatch between the teachers' idealism and passion for conscientious objection and our ignorance was occasionally painful to behold.

Beside the common-core subjects, we also had some electives, such as film or music or advanced courses on a variety of theoretical areas, and when we were offered the chance to make suggestions I put up my hand and asked if they could arrange a writing course for us. A literary writing course? The proposal was received with enthusiasm; if there was any interest they would certainly arrange it. I became a kind of leader of the little writing group, and the first thing I said was that we couldn't get up at seven, like the others, because if you were writing you might have stayed up all night, that was often when the inspiration came, and the crazy thing was that the teacher responsible for our group bought that lock, stock, and barrel, no, of course, you couldn't get up at seven then, I'll see what I can do. He arranged it, the writing group could sleep in. I felt guilty, he was nice and well-meaning and allowed himself to be used, but, on the other hand, I hadn't asked to come up here and it wasn't my fault they were so hugely well-disposed toward us.

He even organized a writer's visit for us. Arild Nyquist was flown up from Oslo to teach us for a day. He sat there with his sorrowful eyes and asked how many of us wrote seriously, who wanted to become writers. No one raised a hand. We're doing this to make life easier for ourselves here, someone said. I see, said Nyquist, that may not be the best criterion, but we'll have to make the best of it. I felt even guiltier then, for all I knew he had left his family to come up here and teach the ardent young conscientious objectors at Hustad Camp, he had once been ardent himself, and then he came face-to-face with us. But they probably paid him well, so it didn't matter.

One day we had a role-play session in the gym. We were given different world roles, someone represented America, someone Russia, someone China, someone India, someone the EU, someone the Scandinavian countries, someone Africa, and then we were handed booklets describing our roles. The teacher in charge suggested I should be the General Secretary of the UN and lead the international conference. Why her choice fell on me I had no idea, but such things happened, people did sometimes pick me out and credit me with certain qualities. When I was a Literature student one of the lecturers had made a mental note of me and in his lessons he could suddenly point to me and say, what does Karl Ove think about this?

So there I sat in the gymnasium trying to prevent a world war from breaking out, organizing meetings with various parties, mediating, and suggesting compromises. The only person I knew in Hustad from before, Johs, represented Russia. Johs was what Grandpa would have called a wizard, he studied Sociology and had been given the best grades they had given for many years, well, perhaps ever, it was said; he had studied in Paris and was at a level other students could only dream about. However, he carried this talent very lightly, he was a modest man, sometimes bordering on self-effacing, he was genuinely good and friendly, no one had a bad word to say about him, considerate and empathetic, and therefore also vulnerable, it had struck me many times, he also had good friends, they seemed to form a protective ring around him, they were his guardians. His parents were farmers in Jølster, only a few kilometers down from where Mom lived. He was strong but strength was in a way secondary with him, something you hardly noticed. What you did notice was his sensitivity. In his own eyes he was perhaps a very ordinary guy, what did I know, but he wasn't, I had never met anyone with precisely the mix of qualities he had.

He represented Russia in our role play, and he tactically outmaneuvered everyone, not least me, such that he, that is Russia, by the end of the day had made huge territorial gains in Europe and Asia and become the dominant major power, on the brink of total world control.

He had a good laugh at that.

In the evening, in the homey lounge where music blared and people sat around playing games or reading magazines, smoking and drinking beer, one of the semicriminal layabouts from Bergen came over to me, I was leaning against the railings over the floor below and he stood so close it felt threatening.

"You think you're someone, don't you," he said. "Like the UN General Secretary. Sitting there with your books. But you're nothing."

"I've never said I'm someone," I said.

"Shut your mouth," he said, and left.

Stories about him were circulating, one was that he had shouted Fuck you and your family! in the camp director's office, and the way he had added the family was funny. There were two or three of his kind there, they were hard nuts and could easily have beaten me to pulp if they'd had a mind to, but they were also completely off their rockers and ignorant, an immense ignorance that could have quite bizarre effects on the teaching when they attended classes, which was seldom.

It was of course ironic that such violent types should be here of all places, in a camp where the peace and pacifist flag flew aloft, but it was also typical because in some way or other they were the "alternatives," they lived half inside, half outside the bounds of society, and it was there the most important part of the seventies' alternative movement could be found. If you took away their ideology, all that was left was an outsider status and drugs.

There was another gang from Bergen and they were musicians. They came from Loddefjord, Fyllingsdalen, and Åsane, and hung around together all the time, slumped on the sofas reading comics or watching TV, but when they jammed together they went through a total transformation, they stood there like demons and conjured up complex soundscapes from nothing, they had mastered their instruments to perfection, but then, after these explosions, they reverted to type, chewing the cud, slumped somewhere. The exception was Calle, one of Bergen's stars, his band had released records, gone on tour, and now he was playing with Lasse Myrvold, the legend from the Aller Værste!, in a band he called Kong Klang. He was different from the other musicians, his curiosity stretched beyond the sphere of music, he was open, very much so, and basically brilliant, but when he touched on areas I knew something about, such as literature, he was also naïve, and I found that moving, somehow, as I did all chinks of weakness in the armor of others.

As far as possible, I stayed in the background in Hustad, spent all of the time on my own, did some reading, importantly The Magic Mountain by Thomas Mann, which I had bought in Danish as the Norwegian edition was abridged. It was the best novel I had read in many years, there was something about the relationship between sickness and health that was appealing, it made its first appearance when Hans Castorp left the sanatorium to go for a walk, up the beautiful mountainsides, and suddenly his nose began to bleed uncontrollably, and he continued his infatuations with women, in whom it is the illness Mann focuses on, the feverishness, the shining eyes, the coughing, the bent backs and poor physiques, all framed by green valleys and gleaming alpine peaks. The long ensuing discussions, between the Jesuit and the Humanist, which could almost be considered life-and-death duels, where everything really was at stake, were also captivating. They were bound up with descriptions of life at the sanatorium, I assumed, it was part of the same, although I couldn't explain it, I was unfamiliar with the frames of reference within which the discussions unfolded.

I had read Doctor Faustus when I was eighteen. All I could remember from it was Adrian Leverkühn's breakdown, when his greatest achievements in art coincided with his reduction to an infantile state, and the magnificent opening when Zeitblom and Leverkühn are children and the composer's father performs simple experiments for them, he manipulates dead material in such a way that it behaves as if it were alive. And then I had read Death in Venice, the old man at death's door who makes himself up and dyes his hair to impress the beautiful youth.

Everything took place in the proximity of death in these books, which were otherwise full of thoughts and theories about art and philosophy, they were at the heart of the great European tradition, but they weren't experimental like Joyce's or Musil's novels, they lacked a certain independence of form, and I wondered why they did, couldn't he do that? He wrote about the avant-garde, but allowed it to be written by a traditionalist like Zeitblom. Espen, my best friend, had no time for Thomas Mann, presumably because of the traditional and bourgeois character of his novels, this lay outside his sphere of interests. Espen was a poet and actually omnivorous when it came to literature, irredeemably curious and thirsty for knowledge, but more often than not with an eye for the most progressive literature, and that did not include the predominantly realistic novel. Espen kept his French and American poets to himself, I kept my mainstream novels to myself and then we met in the middle, with authors such as Thomas Bernhard, Tor Ulven, Claude Simon, Walter Benjamin, Gilles Deleuze, James Joyce, Samuel Beckett, Marguerite Duras, Stig Larsson, Tomas Tranströmer. I could talk about Thomas Mann and Espen would listen, but I could never get him to spend time reading him, nor did I dare try, in case he would think it was poor literature, which would definitely have rebounded on me and my taste. I saw our relationship as parallel to the one between Leverkühn and Zeitblom in Doctor Faustus – Espen was the artist, bent over his apocryphal books in his study, the poet, the genius, I was the plain, ordinary man, by chance his friend, who watched him at work and knew enough about it to understand he was unique, but not enough, never enough, to produce the same himself. I could write about literature, as Zeitblom wrote about music, I couldn't create it. If I had said something like this to Espen he would have objected violently, he didn't see himself like that, I knew, but there was an enormous difference between us: he could read Ekelöf, Celan, Akhmatova, Montale, Ashbery, Mandelstam, poets I had barely heard about, as the most natural thing in the world and there was no posturing about his reading, as unfortunately there was about mine, I brandished authors' names the way medieval knights brandished flags and banners, but not him, not Espen, he was genuine.

We had both taken the Lit course in the autumn of 1989 and the spring of 1990. At first I knew no one there and made no attempt at contact either, so it was the gymnas all over again, sitting alone in the canteen drinking coffee and pretending I was reading, standing outside the lecture room in the breaks smoking, sitting in the reading room in the afternoon and evenings, all the while with a slow panic in my body, my mouth open in my consciousness, as I wandered around acting as if everything was as it should be. When I closed my books for the evening, I sometimes went down to see Yngve, he had moved in with Asbjørn in Hans Tanks Gate just below the science building, watched TV with them or just drank coffee in their living room. I had taken a room in the same property as Yngve's previous collective, it was big and cost much more than I could afford, but I had gone for it anyway, I could always earn some money when the semester was drawing to an end and my student loan was all gone. When I had been broke the spring before, and was still at the Writing Academy, I had moved up to Sørbøvåg and worked for a few weeks with Kjartan. I painted one barn wall, he stood under the ladder watching me and said there was nothing better than watching others work for you. He collected manure from the muck cellar with his tractor, dumped it in great heaps around the farm, which I then spread with a fork. The job was hard work, my arms and upper body ached as I went to bed at night, but it was also satisfying, the physicality of the work, sticking the three prongs into the muck, which was partly caked, partly still wet, grabbing a chunk of it and scattering it, it gave me a good feeling, I could see I was making progress, pile after pile disappeared, and it was wonderful to put the fork down in the afternoon and go in and have a snack with Grandma and Grandpa. I got up at seven, had breakfast, worked till twelve, had lunch, worked till four, it was a purge, a penance, none of my terrible life in Bergen existed here, I was a different person here, someone who could not be criticized. I cooked, I walked Grandma across the floor, sometimes I massaged her legs as well, as I had seen Mom and Kjartan do, I kept Grandpa company, and Kjartan, who came home from work at about five, presumably had a little more time for himself than he usually did. Grandma wasn't doing well, and when I left them to work it was as if her shaking and convulsions lived on in me outside, something that had to be subdued and suppressed, but lay beyond my control. It was barely possible to speak to her, her voice was so weak, just a whisper, it was difficult to distinguish words. One afternoon Grandpa was talking about Hamsun, whom he had read with such pleasure, and Grandma whispered something from her chair, I leaned forward to listen, couldn't understand until the coin finally dropped: Duun! Olav Duun, the writer. Another afternoon I could see she was upset, she was trying to catch my attention, I went over and bent down, she pointed to Grandpa and whispered something I didn't understand, say it again, Grandma, I can't hear what you're saying, one more time, just . . .

I thought she said that Grandpa had killed someone.

"Has Grandpa killed someone?" I said.

Then she laughed! A quiet breathy, barely audible laugh, but her chest shook and her eyes gleamed.

So that wasn't what she had said, I thought, and laughed as well. But it wasn't so strange that I had heard it, a paranoid shadow sometimes lay between her and the world, if she could say Grandpa was a thief in her deepest confusion, couldn't she say that he had killed someone as well?

It was fantastic to see her laugh. Normally her days were so humdrum and full of suffering that it was painful to witness. One night I woke up to Grandpa calling for Kjartan, I hurried downstairs, both of them were waiting for me in the double bed in the dining room, Grandma shaking, eyes wide open, Grandpa sitting on the edge of the bed.

"Kjartan has to help her go to the bathroom," he said. "Go and get him."

"I can do it," I said.

She wore diapers at night, I understood, but I kept away from this part of the nursing, anything to do with intimate areas, dressing and undressing, it wasn't right, I was her grandchild, Mom or Kjartan had to do that. But in this situation I would have to do whatever was required.

I put one hand behind her back, the other under her arm, and began to lift. She was so stiff that it took a long time, but eventually she was sitting on the edge of the bed. She whispered something. Her jaws trembled, but she looked straight at me with her clear blue eyes. I leaned forward.

"Kjartan," she said.

"I can take you," I said. "Then we won't have to wake him. I'm already awake."

I took her arm and raised her into a standing position. But this was too quick, she was too stiff and fell back. I did it again, more slowly, and pulled the walker over with one hand, placed it in front of her, watched her gently, almost imperceptibly, move her hands down to the handles.

Finally she was holding it with both hands and her balance was good enough for her to be able to walk. She was wearing only a thin white nightdress, the bottom of her arms and legs were bare, her gray and white hair was loose, and I didn't like what I had walked into, I was much too close to her, in the wrong way. When we were in the bathroom I would have to help her to sit down on the toilet seat and undress her. No, no, no. No, no, no. But we were on the way, tiny step by tiny step she shuffled across the floor, first in the dining room where they slept, then the sitting room where the TV was. Her hands shook, her head shook, slowly and laboriously she put one foot in front of the other, they too shook. A lamp shone in the corner, otherwise everything was dark inside. I strode forward and opened the door to the hall. Beyond it was the bathroom.

"Soon be there," I said.

She moved a trembling foot forward. And then pee began to run down her thigh, and then it came in a stream and splashed on the floor. She stood perfectly still as it happened. Leaning forward, stock still, the pee splashing down, she looked like an animal, I thought. Standing in front of her, I met her eyes and they were anguished.

"It doesn't matter, Grandma," I said. "It happens. It doesn't matter. Just stay here and I'll get Kjartan."

I ran out, rang the bell twice in quick succession, opened the door and shouted up. He came steaming downstairs a few seconds later, prepared for the worst.

"You've got to help Grandma," I said. "It's nothing serious. She only wants to go to the bathroom."

He said nothing, went with me, took Grandma and led her into the bathroom with firm, resolute movements and closed the door behind them. I filled a bucket with water, wet the cloth, and wiped the floor.

I went back to Bergen with enough money to manage for the rest of the semester. I didn't tell anyone about what I had experienced, slipped into depressing Bergen life leaving Sørbøvåg as a closed room, a sealed experience, alongside all the other experiences I'd had that were incompatible with my life now or irrelevant to it. Especially after I had thrown the glass at Yngve's head it seemed like that, it was impossible to reconcile the person I was then, someone trying to inflict damage, destroy, preferably blind his brother, with the person when I was with them or with Mom, who knew nothing of all this. This was all I thought about, and the power in it was immense, it dragged me down to a place inside myself I hadn't been and hadn't known existed. If I could throw a glass at Yngve's face what else was I capable of? There was something in me I couldn't control, and it was terrible: if I couldn't trust myself who could I trust?

This wasn't a matter I could discuss with anyone else either. The afternoon in Yngve's collective, when I understood what I had done, I sat crying and begging for forgiveness, so upset that I couldn't go home, I slept there, on the sofa in the collective, surrounded by other students who didn't quite know where to look or what to do when I was there. One of them I hadn't seen before, he came in when I was on the sofa with my head bowed, so you're Karl Ove, he said, you live in the room above Morten, don't you? Yes, I said.

I'll pop by to see you one day, he said. I live in an apartment just opposite you two. I raised my eyes and looked at him. He was smiling so much his face seemed to split into two. My name's Geir, he said.

Two days later he knocked at my door. I was writing, shouted, come in, thinking it was Morten as the front doorbell hadn't rung.

"Are you writing?" he said. "I don't want to disturb you."

"No, no, come in. You're not disturbing me," I said.

He sat down, we spoke tentatively about common acquaintances, it transpired we were the same age and that he came from Hisøya and had gone to gymnas with several of the kids I had been at school with and whom I hadn't seen since then. He had gone to a military academy, dropped out, moved to Bergen, and started studying Social Anthropology. At first he wanted to talk about how happy he was and how good it was being in Bergen. He had his own money, his own place, and the university was overflowing with girls, could life be any better?

"No, perhaps it couldn't," I said.

He laughed and said he had never met a gloomier person. Anyone would think Job had taken up lodgings in Bergen! Come on, let's go for a walk to put you in a better frame of mind!

Why not! I said, and we headed downhill to the town center. We stood at the bar in Fekterloftet, ordered a carafe of white wine, and the embarrassment I always felt with people I didn't know – the thought that I was boring and of no interest and that actually they didn't want to be here – was completely absent. There was something about him I trusted. What I discussed with Geir that evening I couldn't have discussed with anyone else I had met in Bergen, not even Yngve. You carried your inner thoughts and passions within you, and perhaps shared them with a partner, what did I know about such matters, at any rate it wasn't something you brought up when you were on the town, it would have killed everything, caused others to shy away. Because it was all about having a good time, laughing, telling stories, or arguing till the sparks flew, but about matters that were outside your inner life, about what was between people, about what they shared. Bands, films, books, other students, lecturers, girls, various experiences remodeled as entertaining anecdotes or jokes.

There was nothing of that on this evening.

I talked about my year in Northern Norway, how I had been slightly in love with a thirteen-year-old and I had kissed another, how I had been completely crazy about a sixteen-year-old and had almost gone out with her, how I had drifted around and got drunk, been out of control, and it had continued down here, and I was scared of myself, not in some make-believe way, not to make myself interesting, but in reality, scared of what I might do. If I could try to destroy my brother anything was possible. If I'd had a knife would I have stabbed him? I also talked about my grandmother, the dignity she possessed in all the misery in which she was trapped. But most of all I talked about Ingvild. I told him about all our meetings, I went on about how fantastic she was but admitted I had done everything wrong from the very beginning. I said I was like Lieutenant Glahn, I could also shoot myself in the foot to make her look at me and perhaps think about me. Yes, I've got a scar on my foot, I said, and put my leg on a rung of the bar stool, look here, I got that trying to kick away a rocket on the ground near Hanne. Who on earth is Hanne? he said, someone I was in love with, I said, another one, he said, and laughed. What he told me about himself was not only different, it was diametrically opposite.

He was actually a militarist, he said, he had loved life at the military academy, the sound of reveille in the morning, the smell of leather and weapon grease, the uniforms, the guns and the discipline, he had dreamed about it all his life, he had joined the Cadet Force at home in Arendal and had never been in any doubt about his career path after finishing gymnas.

"Why did you leave then? If you liked it so much?"

"I don't know. It might have been because I discovered that I could do it, I knew it, and I wanted to do something I couldn't do. And then there was the lack of individuality. I spoke to the commander about that, I said I didn't want to be some sheep with a bell around its neck, he said that being led wasn't the problem, but where you were led. Basically he was right. But the moment of truth was when I saw the regulations. Then I realized that someone would always know where I was. And that wouldn't work. So I stopped and became a conscientious objector."

"Are you a conscientious objector?"

"Yes. Nevertheless I still love the sound of marching boots."

I hadn't even considered the possibility of liking the military; it stood for everything I was against. War, violence, authority, power. I was a pacifist but unhappy, he was a militarist and happy. It wasn't easy to say who was right. He also told me about one morning he had walked home with a girl he had been interested in for a long time, the sun was up, the town was deserted, they strolled hand in hand through the park and were heading for his apartment and the huge water bed he had there, how perfect the moment had been in every respect. He told me about everything he was learning in Social Anthropology and laughed at some of the bizarre rituals people had. He also laughed at me, but not in a way that annoyed me, quite the contrary, suddenly I could laugh at it too. I thought, I've got a new friend here. I had as well, but not for long because soon afterward he said he was moving to Uppsala after the summer. I was sorry, but said nothing. Fekterloftet closed its doors, we were drunk and made the rounds of the nightclubs, ending up in Slakteriet, as always Bergen's last late-night stop, and stirred by the light sky and all the happy people on the street now at the beginning of June, I suggested dropping in on Ingvild so that he could see her with his own eyes and so that I could say some of the many things that I had thought about her. He was up for it, we made our way toward Nygårdsgaten, I remembered that as visitors we ought to have something to take with us, ran over to the flower beds by the Grieg Hall, tugged at a rhododendron bush, it had just blossomed and was beautiful, pulled it free and stood there with it in one hand while Geir struggled with his. Then we crossed the street, I found some pebbles and started throwing them at her window. It must have been around four or half past. She opened the window, at first she didn't want to let us in, but I begged, she said OK, I'll be right down. As she opened the front door a police car came down the street and stopped next to us. A policeman stepped out, Ingvild closed the door and disappeared, the officer asked us what we were doing, I said we were going to give the young lady some flowers, I realized this was wrong, we had taken them from in front of the Grieg Hall, but, look, the roots are intact, we can run back now and replant them, it'll be fine. OK, said the policeman, and when we went to put the bushes back the car followed us and waited in the middle of the road until we had finished before driving on.

"That was lucky," I said.

"Lucky? The police came."

"Yes, but they could have fined us or thrown us into the drunk tank. Come on."

"I'm beginning to get the idea," Geir said. "You want to go back to Ingvild, don't you?"

"Yes, come on."

He shook his head, but came along. I threw pebbles at the window, this time she didn't open, and Geir tugged at me, he wanted to go home, I told him he could go, I didn't feel like going to bed yet. When he left I went over Høyden and down to Møhlenpris, felt some car door handles, sneaked into some backyards looking for unlocked bikes, sat down on a step and smoked, it would soon be morning, the sun was already shining at the edge of the sky. I went to the telephone booth behind the soccer field and called Ingvild's collective. One of the men answered the phone, I said I wanted to speak to Ingvild, he said, do you know what time it is, she's asleep, everyone's asleep, you can't call in the middle of the night, now I'm hanging up. I smacked the receiver a few times against the top of the coin box, but it didn't break and I opened the door and kicked the glass side.

Then another godforsaken police car came!

It stopped in front of me, a policeman rolled down the window and asked me what I was doing. I said I was fed up, my girlfriend had broken up with me that evening, and so I had kicked the telephone box, I'm sorry, I said, I won't do it again.

"OK, you'd better go home to bed."

"Alright," I said.

"Yes, and now. Let's see you on your way!"

And so I walked up toward Hulen while they sat in the car watching me. As I rounded the bend they followed me and only left when I turned up toward the park.

The fear and shame when I awoke were so great that I felt I was going to split open. I could have stood up and screamed, I hadn't learned anything, I had been there again, where there was no control and there were no limits, where anything could happen. Something shrieked inside me, but it would pass. Either simply by gritting my teeth, or talking to others. That had a mitigating and deadening effect. I went downstairs to Morten, he leaned back against the sofa and listened, his appearance had changed completely, he no longer wore deck shoes and red leather jackets, and he no longer studied Law, he had done a volte-face and was now an Arts student, with all that that implied in terms of black jeans, black T-shirts, black shoes, ring in the ear, and Raga Rockers on the stereo. He was already well-versed and often finished his arguments with, We're machines in Nirvana, Karl Ove, we're machines in Nirvana.

The next day a letter arrived from Cappelen. At first I didn't do anything, thinking it was like Schrödinger's cat: until the moment the envelope was open and I had read the letter it could equally well have been an acceptance as a rejection. It lay on the table all morning, I gazed at it every now and then, when I was shopping I thought of nothing else, and eventually, at around four, I could stand it no longer and opened it.

Yes, indeed. It was a rejection.

It was as expected, but I was still disappointed, so deeply in fact that I couldn't bear to be alone. I went downstairs to see Morten, he wasn't at home. I thought of Jon Olav, but didn't want to flag up my defeat to him. Nor Yngve. Remembered Geir, he lived only a few minutes away, and I went up to see him. He had already packed, some removal chests were still on the floor, but he whipped up two cups of instant coffee, we sat down on the floor and I recited my rejection to him.

"We have read your novel with interest, but I am sorry to say we cannot undertake to publish it. It is at times both entertaining and engagingly written, but as a whole we consider you have too little to say and it lacks pace. Accordingly, we would like to thank you for allowing us to read the manuscript, which you will find enclosed," I said.

Geir laughed.

"First of all, I'm impressed that you can already reel it off by heart," he said. "Secondly, that you've written a novel at all. I don't know anyone who would even entertain the idea."

"That doesn't help much," I said.

He snorted.

"Write another one!"

"Easy for you to say," I said.

"I suppose so. I'm basically dyslexic. I'd hardly read a novel before I came here. What would you recommend, by the way, if I were to get the idea in my head?"

"Dead Heat by Erling Gjelsvik perhaps?"

"Is that the best novel you've ever read?"

"No, no. I thought it would be a good start for you."

"Now don't you underestimate me. Come on. What's the best novel you've read?"

"Lasso Round the Moon by Mykle maybe? Or Pan by Hamsun. Or Novel with Cocaine by Ageyev."

"Then I'll read Mykle as he was the first one you said. You've already told me the whole plot of Pan."

"Yes, except for the fact that he takes his own life at the end. I didn't say that."

"Ha ha."

"He does!"

"Are you going to spoil all my reading pleasure?" he said.

"Everyone knows he does," I said.

"I didn't."

"You do now."

"Is there anything else you think I should know, Mr. Literature?"

"In fact, there is," I said. "I discovered it a couple of weeks ago. I was lying in bed and glanced at the bookshelf. And I read some of the writers' names backward."

"Oh?"

"Yes. Do you know what T. Eliot becomes?"

"No."

"Toilet. Such a shame about the S though. If it had been before the T it would have been Toilets."

"And you're about to start a Literature course, did you say?"

"Yes?"

There was a pause.

"What a pity you're going to move," I said.

"I've done Bergen. I know what it's like here. Now I have to try something else."

"I was thinking of going to Istanbul this autumn," I said. "Just renting a room and writing for a year."

"Why don't you?"

I shrugged.

"It feels as if I've got stuff to sort out here. And I have nothing to write about. Or everything to do with writing is just depressing. I have to learn. And I might as well do that here."

"Come to Uppsala then!"

"No. What the hell would I do there?"

"What the hell am I going to do? That's the whole idea. Go somewhere you know nothing about and see what happens."

"But I don't want anything to happen," I said. "Seriously. I don't."

I put my coffee cup down on one of the chests and got to my feet. There was a view of the park and the road down to the house where I lived from his window, and the fjord and the islands beyond. The sun was out now, a dark orange against the deep blue sky, and the trees in the park cast long narrow shadows.

"I wish you all the best then. You write first and I'll answer, OK?"

"OK."

We shook hands and I walked back downhill to my room. Of course I didn't know as I was unlocking my door that fourteen years would pass before I saw him again, the memory of him was only a few minutes old, and I assumed he would return to Bergen after a year in Uppsala; the thought that it was possible to leave everything for good was one I toyed with now and then, I didn't consider it a real possibility. For my part, I had decided to commit to another year in Bergen and then do something else, move elsewhere.

I reread the rejection letter. Then I sat down in front of the fire, scrunched up a few sheets, lit them, and started to place sheet after sheet in the flames. I had three copies of the novel and burned two. I would give the third to Ingvild. That would be my last act with her. No more visits, no more telephone conversations, no more nonsense, nothing. The novel would be a final farewell.

I burned my diaries while I was at it, and then I put the manuscript in a bag and walked downhill toward town.

The bottom door was open, I went up to the first floor and buzzed, she answered.

"Hi," she said. "Nice to see you."

"Likewise," I said.

"We're having dinner," she said. "I don't know. Would you like to come in anyway?"

"Yes. Thanks," I said.

I went in, took off my shoes, put the bag in the corridor, and followed her into the living room. Eight people were sitting around the table. Residents in the collective and some of their friends. I knew who everyone was. But they had been invited, I had only dropped by, and as they looked at me there was a strained atmosphere.

"Would you like to eat with us?" Ingvild said.

I shook my head.

It was humiliating, getting an extra little plate on the corner, the unbidden guest's extra little plate.

"No, I only wanted to talk, but we can do that another time."

"We can," she said.

My face was red, everything was wrong. I had come, made an entrance, now I would go again without anything happening.

"Bye," I said, and could hear how stupid that must have sounded.

"Bye," they said.

Ingvild accompanied me out.

"I just need the bathroom," I said, and made for the toilet. She went into the kitchen, I nipped out, grabbed the plastic bag containing the manuscript, dashed into her room, placed it on her bed, went back out, and was putting on my shoes when she reappeared.

Now it definitely would be a surprise, I thought, as I ran down the stairs and emerged into the warm summer evening, the streets suffused with sunlight, and that was actually the whole point.

The university was a new start. And, not least, it was something to hold on to. The lectures were a fixed point, the reading room was a fixed point, the books were a fixed point. Irrespective of what happened, irrespective of how dreadful I felt, I could always go up to the reading room and find myself a seat and sit there and read for as long as I wanted, no one could object to that, no one could say there was anything odd about it, it was the very essence of university life. I bought a two-volume encyclopedia of world literature and plowed my way through, writer by writer, from Homer to the 1960s, tried to remember a line or two about each one, about what they did. I went to the lectures, Kittang on classical poetry, Buvik on classical epics, Linneberg on classical drama. Among all the names and figures were some great emotional insights. Odysseus who tricked the Cyclops by saying his name was "No one." He was lost, but he gained life. The song of the Sirens. Those who heard it were also lost, felt themselves being drawn to them, did everything in their power to get close, and perished. The Sirens were both Eros and Thanatos, desire and death, the most desirable and the most dangerous. Orpheus, who sang so beautifully that everyone who heard him became spellbound and was lost, he descended into the underworld to retrieve Eurydice and this was within his power so long as he didn't turn and look at her, but he did, and so she was lost forever. A French philosopher by the name of Blanchot had written about this, and I read his essay about Orpheus, in which he wrote that art was the force that caused the night to open, but that it is Eurydice he wants and she was the utmost that art could attain. Eurydice was the second night, Blanchot wrote.

These ideas were too grandiose for me, but I was drawn to them and tried to get my head around them, to capture them, to assimilate them, unsuccessfully, I saw them from the outside, knowing that their full meaning escaped me. Give the sacred back to the sacred? The night of the night? I recognized the main figure, that which appears and disappears at the same moment or the simultaneous presence of the one and the other, which cancels out the one, this was a figure I had seen in many poems from that period, and I also felt a particular attraction to the ideas about the night, the second night, and death, but as soon as I attempted to think independently about it, in other words, beyond the form in which the ideas were presented, it became banal and stupid. It was the same as mountaineering, you have to place your foot exactly there, or there, your hand has to grip exactly there, or there, if not, you were left standing still, or you lost your grip and fell.

The utmost is that which disappears when it is seen or recognized. It was the core of the Orpheus myth. But what is that?

When I sat in the reading room, which was old and had a kind of somber atmosphere, and read Blanchot in the afternoon, a completely new feeling arose in me, something I had never felt before, a sort of extreme excitement, as though I found myself in the proximity of something unique, mixed with an equally extreme impatience, I had to go there, and these two feelings were so incompatible that I wanted to jump up and run and shout and sit perfectly still and read on all at the same time. What was strange was that the restlessness began to course through me at the moment when I read something good that I had understood and absorbed, it was as though it was simply impossible to bear. Often I stood up and took a break then, and while I walked along the corridors and up the stairs to the first floor of the canteen, the excitement and the impatience mingled with the dropped jaw of my consciousness, which was to do with my pursuing these paths alone, and so on, my soul in an inexplicable turmoil, I bought myself a coffee and sat down at a table and tried to appear as calm as possible.

There was also something panicked about my desire to acquire knowledge, in sudden terrible insights I saw that actually I didn't know anything and it was urgent, I didn't have a second to lose. It was almost impossible to adapt this urgency to the slowness that reading required.

In the middle of September I went to Florence with Yngve, we took the train down and spent four days at Pensione Palmer, not so far from the cathedral, where I had stayed the previous summer during the hitchhiking trip with Lars. We didn't talk about what had happened between us, we simply skipped over it, we were brothers, this bond was stronger than everything else, yet something had changed, perhaps most of all in me where the final remnants of naturalness had disappeared, I was conscious of everything that was said and done when we were together. The silences that sprang up were painful, we were brothers after all, we ought to be able to talk in a lighthearted, unforced way, but then there was a silence and I sat thinking about something natural I could say to break it. About a band? About Asbjørn or some of his other friends? About soccer? About what was around us, a town the train passed through, an incident outside the window on the street, a beautiful woman entering the bar where we were? Sometimes this worked well, for example, we could discuss the difference between the girls at home and the ones we saw here, the incredible elegance they had, not just the dresses with their tight jackets and narrow coats, their long boots and small neat scarves, but also the way they walked, studied and genteel, so glaringly different from our girls' earthy Fjällräven gait, which suggested nothing other than forward motion, slightly bent over, eternally prepared for a cloudburst, jogging, strolling, no more, no less, we're on the go! Yet the sight of the Italian women, girls would be the wrong word for them, was also depressing, they were in a different league, out of reach for us, who were of course of the same unsophisticated material as Norwegian girls, you just had to cast a glance at young Italian men, who were as sharply dressed and elegant as their female counterparts, who knew all the tricks in the book and who, what was more, courted them with an urbanity we couldn't have achieved if we'd practiced every day for the next year, in fact, if we had studied elegance and manners at university for six years, we wouldn't have got near them.

"I was twenty-two when I ate a steak for the first time," Yngve said, as we sat in a terrazza, each with an espresso, which we knew we should drink standing, but drank sitting anyway. Being Norwegian, we might just as well have drunk it standing on our heads as standing at the bar.

"I thought steaks and chops were the same thing," he said.

"Aren't they?" I said.

He laughed, thinking I was joking.

"So, I've never eaten a steak," I said. "But then I'm only twenty."

"Is that right?" he said. "We'll definitely have a steak tonight then."

While autumn had arrived in Bergen it was still hot and summery in Florence. In the middle of the day the sun was boiling even when it was behind a veil of clouds and the only yellow in the vegetation was caused by the aridity. We went to the Uffizi Gallery, wandered through the endless corridors looking at the paintings, all identical, we saw Michelangelo's statue of David and some of his unfinished works, the figures looked as if they were trying to break out of the marble blocks that entombed them. We strolled around the large cathedral, went up the stairs and stood right under the roof, continued along a narrow corridor and emerged at the top with all of Florence beneath us, we drank coffee in tiny cafés, ate ice cream, and took pictures of each other, Yngve was especially keen, I posed in front of every conceivable kind of wall in my black Ray-Bans, wearing black baggy pants and shirts with a variety of patterns. Now it was all happening in Manchester, and if this had gone unremarked in Italy, it hadn't in Bergen. First of all I had read about the Stone Roses, then I had gone to listen to them in a record shop, but the sound had been a bit weird, I'd thought, I wasn't sure it was good, but Yngve had bought it, he said it was great, and I bought it too and agreed. It grew and grew on you. The strange thing was that exactly the same had happened with the Smiths, I had heard their debut record in Kristiansand after reading about them in the NME, thought it was too odd, but then the hype reached Norway and it no longer sounded odd but right.

And so we wandered around the town, as beautiful as it was lively, full of people and small scenes, mopeds and palaces; in the evening we walked home and got dressed and went to a restaurant. It was a more refined eatery, I was ill at ease, didn't like to talk to the waiters, didn't like being served, didn't like being seen, didn't know what to do in the situations that arose, from how to taste wine to what to do with the napkin on the plate, but fortunately Yngve handled everything and soon we were eating our steaks and drinking red wine.

Afterward we smoked, drank grappa, which tasted like poor quality moonshine, and talked about Dad. We often did this, told each other about minor incidents we remembered with him and discussed recent events, his life in Northern Norway, which wasn't distant to us even though we met him only a couple of times a year and perhaps talked to him on the phone once a month, because he loomed large in our consciousnesses. Yngve hated him or, at least, was completely unreconciled, didn't want to hear about how he had changed and wanted a different relationship with us, that wasn't true, he was the same person, he didn't lift a finger for us, he wasn't in the slightest bit interested in us, if he showed a different face it was because he had convinced himself that was how it should be, not that it actually was. I agreed with Yngve, but I was much weaker; if I spoke with Dad on the phone I ingratiated myself with him and I had sent him a letter with photos of the Writing Academy although really I wished he didn't exist, indeed, that he was dead.

Weak, that was the word.

I was also weak with respect to Yngve. If there was a silence it was my fault and my responsibility. I knew Yngve didn't think like that, didn't care about silences, didn't feel a need to fill them at all costs, he was sure of himself. It was for the same reason that he had friends and I didn't. He was relaxed, didn't give any importance to what he said or did, went out with Asbjørn one Saturday morning, for example, and just wandered around town, perhaps sitting in a café for a few hours, it was no big deal, whereas if I did the same the whole time was so enormously significant that any jarring tone, any discordance, was potentially fatal, and so I was forced into, or I forced myself into, a kind of unnatural silence. So was it that silence that distinguished this situation and who would want it around them? Who could stand such stiff and forced behavior? And I didn't mean any harm to anyone, so it was better to keep my distance or stay under Yngve's wing, under his cloak of affability.

The same lack of ease characterized my behavior with him, but here there was a decisive difference, the link between us was not dependent on fluctuating situations; however stupidly I behaved I was his brother, he could never get past that and might never want to. The glass-throwing incident gave him a hold over me, it meant that I would always be beneath him, which I basically considered reasonable and felt I deserved.

We paid and went out into the Italian night, I was cheerful, we looked for a suitable bar, found one, it was new and completely empty, but they played good music and we didn't know a soul in Florence anyway. We had envisaged having one drink there, but the bar staff were effusive, wanted to talk and hear about Norway and Bergen, asked what kind of music we liked and immediately afterward the Stone Roses was throbbing through the building. We sat there, getting more and more drunk, and all my inhibitions, all the ties, all the silence and all the stiffness in me dissolved, I was sitting with my brother and we talked about whatever occurred to us and laughed and were happy.

"None of the people you know do anything themselves," I said. "But you can. You can play the guitar and write music. I don't understand why you don't start a band and play seriously. You make great songs."

"Do you think so?" he said.

"Of course," I said. "The others talk about music and bands. Surely that's not enough for you."

"No, I want to play of course. But you have to find people to play with."

"Pål's good, isn't he?"

"Yes, he is. That's two. If you play the drums, that's three. Then we need a vocalist."

"There are twenty thousand students in Bergen. One of them must be able to sing."

"I'll see what I can come up with."

We didn't need to go to the bar anymore to order, they came to us with more drinks the moment we had finished the last, joked with us and asked what other records they should play. When we got up to go it was with a lurch. But we managed to get out and home, talked more about the new band, switched off the light, and slept through till late the next day.

In the evening we went back to this fantastic bar. But this time it was crowded and the staff didn't recognize us. It was impossible to believe that they actually didn't remember us because no one else had been there and it was only the previous night, so they must have been putting on an act. But why? We ordered a beer each, drank up, and left, we headed for a discotheque recommended in a travel guide, it was by the river, which we followed, along a broad avenue, with less and less traffic the farther we went. It started raining, the streets shone in the light, beside us the river flowed slowly in the darkness, not a soul in sight. We should have seen it ages ago, Yngve said. Perhaps we've walked past it, I said. We must have been walking for three-quarters of an hour, and so we turned back. The effect of the beer was long gone. The rain was falling thick and fast. The lights from the hills across the river seemed to be hovering in the air. We didn't talk anymore, walking was enough. After half an hour Yngve stopped. Below us lay a kind of wooden platform, above it hung cables bedecked with light-bulbs, unlit, chairs stacked around the edge. Is it here? Yngve said. Here? I repeated. Well, we have come in the off-season. Come on, let's go back and get some sleep.

Two days later we got out of the train at the station in Bergen, this funnel of a town, and it was good to step into it, everything seemed homey and familiar, my place on earth. It was early evening, I knew being alone in my room after a week with company would be an anticlimax, so I went to Yngve and Asbjørn's, where we cracked open the bottle of whiskey we had brought with us and started drinking. Asbjørn said that unfortunately he had some bad news for us. Oh? We said, looking at him. Yes, your grandmother has died. What? Died? Yes, your mother phoned when you were on your way down to Italy. Did she say when the funeral was? Yes, it's come and gone. She said it had been impossible to get hold of you.

We got drunk and went to Hulen, it was a weekday and not very full, we hung around the bar drinking, when they closed we went home and kept going. There was a good atmosphere, I felt as though I was in the eye of a storm of people and action. At some point I put on a Superman outfit, sat drinking whiskey in the red cape and the rest of the outfit or bopped around to the music. It was a party, it felt as if the apartment was packed, I swung around, banged into the fridge, drank, changed the music, sang along, chatted with Yngve and Asbjørn, all the while in this fantastic Superman costume, until suddenly everything receded, like powerful tidal waters and the bare facts were revealed: only Yngve, Asbjørn, and I were there. We were alone. The party was in my mind. And Grandma, Grandma was dead.

Even though the music was still playing it was as though there was silence.

I put my face in my hands.

Oh, oh, oh, oh, oh, oh.

"What is it, Karl Ove?"

"Nothing," I said, but my shoulders were shaking and tears were running down my face, wetting my fingers.

They turned off the music.

"What is it?" they said again.

"I don't know," I said, looking at them. A sob escaped me, I couldn't stop it. "It's nothing."

"Do you want to sleep here? Maybe that's best," Asbjørn said.

I nodded.

"Lie on the sofa. It's late anyway."

I did as they said, lay down on the sofa and closed my eyes. One of them covered me with a blanket and I fell asleep.

The next morning everything was fine again, apart from my embarrassment at what had happened, crying in front of them. It didn't matter too much about Yngve, even though that wasn't good either, but Asbjørn?!

And the idiotic Superman outfit!

I took it off, had a cup of coffee with them in the living room, where Asbjørn told Yngve off for never putting the milk back in the fridge, it was just great looking forward to a glass of milk and coming home and finding out it was piss-warm.

I smiled and said they were like a married couple. They didn't like hearing that. I went down to Møhlenpris with my old suitcase, let myself in, and had a shower. With my hair wet, my shirt sticking to my shoulders and chest, I sat down to read. I had got to the end of the eighteenth century, which was bursting with English poets and novelists, and French dramatists, of whom I knew Racine was the most important, and some philosophers and letter writers. I closed my eyes and tried to remember the names and one work by each of them, continued into the nineteenth century, put down the book, took out the sheets showing the lecture program, there was one in the afternoon, I decided to go. It was about modern literary theory and I found the selection of texts for it and browsed through them before leaving. Stanley Fish. What a name. And Harold Bloom. My name's Fish. You don't say. Mine's Bloom. And over there's Paul de Man. Do you know him? Yes, I'm a fan of Paul the Man.

That was a text!

I'm a fan of Paul the Man.

When I had finished the text, I put a few books and a writing pad in a bag and walked up to the university. The grass in the park was dry, the sky gray, the leaves on the trees were pale green and yellow. A group of druggies sat under a tree, I took a detour so as not to see them or be accosted, everything about them filled me with unease, from their loud voices and aggressive actions when they weren't doped up to total apathy, which was inhuman, sitting or lying there disconnected from the world, yet with their eyes open, eyes in which you could read nothing. Then there were the syringes, the leather straps, the cartons of milk shake or chocolate milk, the food containers and plastic bags strewn around them, and their clothes, filthy, ragged, as if they hadn't been in contact with humans for several years but had spent the winter in the middle of a forest, after a plane crash maybe, with only one set of clothes. They drifted, they didn't live. And that was what they wanted to do, drift, not live.

Past them and out through the gate, past the Student Center, up the hill and onto the gravel path alongside the botanical garden, over to the passage between the Maritime Museum and the University Library, past the Faculty of Arts and through the gates of Sydneshaugen School, where I stopped, put the bag on the ground between my feet, and lit up a cigarette.

Farther ahead, beside the steps, someone from my department was smoking. He looked up at me at that moment, then shifted his gaze elsewhere. His name was Espen, I knew, fresh from gymnas, and although he hadn't said much in the contexts I had been with him I knew he was frighteningly well read. He had spoken about Beckett once with Ole, another student in our department, and I had been deeply impressed despite being two years older than him. He had long dark hair, sometimes gathered in a ponytail, brown eyes, glasses, he was thin, wore a brown leather jacket, often with a wool sweater underneath, he'd come to lectures on his bike and often sat for hours in the reading room. He seemed shy, on his guard, though not suspicious, more like a wary animal.

I picked up the bag and walked toward him.

"Are you going to the lecture?" I said.

He smiled, as if to himself.

"I guess so," he said. "Are you?"

"That was the plan. But as I was coming here I lost interest. Think I might go and read instead."

"What are you reading?"

"This and that. Nothing special. Stanley Fish."

"Oh."

"And you?"

"Dante at the moment. Have you read any Dante?"

"Not yet. But I will. Is it good?"

"It's very good," he said.

"OK."

"Mandelstam's written a really great essay about The Divine Comedy."

"Really?"

"Yes."

"Well, perhaps I should take a look. Mandelstam?"

"Yes, you should. It might be tricky to get hold of, but I can copy it for you if you'd like?"

"Yes, I would," I said. "That'd be great!"

I smiled, tossed my cigarette to the ground and crushed it.

"See you," I said, and went into the old school building.

On my way home I called Mom. Fortunately she was at home. I asked her how she was, she said fine, but it was incomprehensible that Grandma had gone. It had been quick. She had caught a lung infection and only a few days later she'd breathed her last. It happened at the care home where she had been moved at the end of the summer, when she could no longer live on the farm, her condition required more nursing and supervision than she could get there. Perhaps that was the reason she went so quickly, there was nothing to hold her, like her intimate surroundings at home, where she had lived for more than forty years. But Kjartan had been present when she died, and she hadn't been afraid.

I could hear that Mom was upset, but I didn't know how to react. She wanted to talk about how it had been in Italy, I said only that it had been good, I couldn't go into detail, after all we had been drinking and staggering around while Grandma was dying, that in itself was unseemly and nothing Mom needed to know. We arranged that I would travel up in a few weeks, go and see her grave, she was in the old cemetery across the fjord, it was nice there, Mom said, that was a nice thought.

We hung up, I walked home in the gathering dusk, lay on my bed reading Mark Twain, whom Ragnar Hovland had talked about, fell back into reality now and again, into the darkness surrounding the meager light from the reading lamp, the material of the light-blue pillow, the thought of Grandma, the first person close to me who had died. It was impossible to understand. But she was at peace now. She had been tormented, now she had peace. I read on, the thought of her lay constantly in the shadows of my consciousness, now and then it stepped out, she was dead, she was no more, Grandma, dear Grandma. I hadn't known her, but what is there to know? I had known who she was, who she was to me, ever since I had been a small boy. And that was what filled my mind now, her gentle presence, her eyes. How heartbreaking it must have been for her to depart this world, solely because her body no longer obeyed her, it refused her the most elementary support.

I had to write about this, had to write about her.

I got up, sat at my desk in just my underpants and wrote a poem:

Growing Wild

Your eyes are gone from the day you're gently faded out
My thoughts like mirrors
I lose control
Feel you within

Soft nights fall over me
My eyes are plunged in darkness
I want to fly

Want to believe in miracles
Feel you within

I shy from light and darkness
Who knows what you see
Who knows what will happen
Silence, silence
growing wild

The days crumble, disappear
Leaving no trace
I am always awake, waiting
Feel you within
feel you within

I shy from light and darkness
Who knows what you see
Who knows what will happen
Silence, silence
growing wild

The following day Espen came over to me in the reading room and gave me the Mandelstam essay. We went for a coffee, chatted about our course, some writing that had impressed us, I asked him a few questions about himself, where he came from, what he did, and I told him I had attended the Writing Academy. He knew, he said. He held the cup with both hands, but not in an embracing kind of way, more a confirmation by his hands, here we have a cup, while he held his head slightly lowered, staring straight down at the table. Sitting like this, he seemed to be negating the situation, as though it didn't exist. There was great strength in him, it gripped my insides, have I said something tedious? Something boring? Something stupid?

Then he cast a glance up at the clock, smiled, and said he hoped I would enjoy the essay and he was looking forward to discussing it with me.

We went back to the reading room, I started Olof Lagercrantz's book about Dante and sat over it until the afternoon, when I repaired to the canteen to eat. It was Friday and they always had rice pudding.

Ann Kristin was sitting at a table on the first floor. She smiled when she saw me and I went over holding a tray of rice pudding, juice, and coffee.

"Hi, Karl Ove," she said. "It's been a long time. Take a seat. This is Rolf, by the way."

She nodded toward a man on the other side of the table.

"So you're Karl Ove," he said. "I had your father at gymnas. He's the best teacher I've ever had. He was fantastic."

"Really?" I said. "Where was that?"

"Vennesla."

"Right," I said, and sat down, took off the bowl of rice pudding, the cup of coffee, and the glass of juice, pushed the tray away, and started to eat.

"What's he doing now?"

"He's working in Northern Norway. He's remarried and has a child."

"Classic midlife crisis," Ann Kristin said. "Oh, I heard that you went to Italy with Yngve."

I nodded and swallowed.

"Florence."

"Shame you couldn't be at the funeral."

"Yes. How was it?"

"It was dignified and lovely."

Ann Kristin was the eldest daughter of my mother's sister Kjellaug and Jon Olav's sister. In our childhood it had always been her and Yngve and Jon Olav and me, and that had continued during our studies, at least at first when Yngve and Ann Kristin had spent a lot of time together. But they had drifted apart, unless it had been prompted by a particular event, I wasn't aware of anything, I only knew they didn't meet outside family commitments anymore.

She was a strong character and could appear a little brusque, especially with Jon Olav, but she didn't hold back with me, either, not that I was afraid of her, it was just surface, underneath it all she was nice and more than usually considerate. I liked her, I always had.

This Rolf, was he her boyfriend?

"Do you study Russian too?" I said.

He nodded.

"That was where we met," he said.

"Rolf's the department's wunderkind," Ann Kristin said.

"You weren't the boy who always got the top grade at gymnas, were you? Dad talked about it for a while."

"I'm afraid so." He smiled.

"You really were his favorite pupil," I said.

"Yes, what do you expect?" said Ann Kristin. "Of course the teacher likes someone who only gets top grades."

"Not Dad," I said, to flatter him.

"Give him my best regards," Rolf said.

"Will do," I said.

"How's Yngve getting on?" Ann Kristin said. "I haven't seen him for ages. Is he still with . . . what's her name . . . ?"

"Ingvild?"

"Yes."

"No, they broke up this spring," I said.

"She was so like your mother."

"Was she?"

"Didn't you notice?"

"No. Where was the resemblance?" I said.

"The eyes, Karl Ove. They had the same eyes."

She smiled and turned to Rolf, who raised his eyebrows and grabbed his jacket from the back of the chair.

"Can you manage on your own?" Ann Kristin said to me. "Or should we stay and keep an eye on you?"

"Think I'll manage," I said. "Nice to see you both. Bye!"

They went out the door on the first floor, where corridors branched off to various other parts of the building, and I ate the rice pudding alone.

The following Sunday I met Gunvor. It was a coincidence, I had gone out with Yngve for a beer, he had been working, he met some people he knew, one of them invited us to his place, candles were lit, tea was served, quiet records were played. I sat on some kind of pouffe and was itching to leave when a girl sat down beside me. She was small, fair-haired with a small retroussé nose and beautiful, gentle eyes. Her energy levels were high, her personality was winning.

"Who are you?" she said.

"I'm Yngve's brother," I said.

"Well, that leaves me none the wiser. Who's Yngve?"

"The guy standing over there flirting."

"Oh. I haven't seen him before either. But, anyhow, it's not hard to see you're brothers!"

"No," I said.

"And what are you doing in Bergen?"

"Lit."

"Do you like Ragnar Hovland? He's my all-time favorite. Suicide in Turtle Café, just the title."

"Yes, he's funny. What are you studying?"

"Admin and Organization Theory. But I'm going to start History after Christmas."

"History? I feel like doing that as well."

She was open, but not in a naïve way, she wasn't the type to burst out with something she didn't understand, she was just very self-confident.

The others left one by one, we kept talking, it was the kind of night you could tell each other everything about yourself, and it's meaningful because there is also a shared willingness to listen. She was from a farm in Vestland, she had two brothers and a sister, she loved riding, particularly Icelandic horses, she had worked for a year on an Icelandic farm and spoke Icelandic fluently. I asked her to say something in Icelandic, she said Thad er ekki gott ad vita hver Karl Ove er! It's not easy to know who Karl Ove is. I laughed, I had understood. She said Icelandic horses had two additional gaits, and I laughed again, I found it difficult to understand how you could be so passionate about animals. Try riding one yourself sometime and you'll understand, she said.

We sat there until the guy whose flat it was wanted to go to bed. Then she accompanied me home, we talked the whole way, outside my front door for maybe half an hour, then she asked if we could see each other again, and I said yes, I would like that.

"Tomorrow?"

"Yes, great."

"Shall we go to the movies?"

"Yes, let's."

She left, I went to bed, strangely light-headed.

Two weeks later she turned around on the steps going up to her place.

"We're going out together now, aren't we, Karl Ove?"

"Yes," I said. "I am anyway!"

By then we had spent almost every evening since we met with each other. Her place, my place, Café Opera, Fekterloftet, long walks through Bergen's streets. We talked and talked, one night we kissed, and then we spent the night together, but nothing happened, she wanted to wait, wanted to be certain about me. You can be certain about me, I said, because I was aching with desire, all the time, I was walking beside her doubled up, but no, time was on our side, time was a friend. An evil friend, I said, come on, how dangerous can it be? No, it wasn't dangerous, but she wanted to wait, she didn't know me. But I've shown you everything! There's nothing left to see! I'm so small! She laughed, shook her head, I would have to wait. Lying next to her hot naked body!

These were hard conditions, but everything else was like a fever, like a dream, she came and went, the rest was like dozing, unimportant, she gave the world shape and gravity, she, Gunvor, my girlfriend.

Jon Olav had moved into a big apartment down by the cinema, I had introduced her to him long ago, now he was going to be away for a few days, we could use his apartment if we wanted? Yes, we did. We were there for two days and nights, we only went out for food, we couldn't be without each other, but still she wouldn't, she still didn't know me well enough.

Her youngest sister and boyfriend invited us to visit them in Hardanger, where they lived in a big old house. We caught the bus there, it was dark, the countryside was white with snow lit up by the moon, and above us, glittering in the sky, countless stars. It was twenty degrees below zero, the snow creaked as we walked up the hills, the cold air burned in our lungs, the skin on our faces was rigid, and around us there was silence.

They had lit the fire, made dinner, we sat chatting and eating and drinking red wine, I was happy. We had a room up in the loft, it was freezing cold, even under the duvet, and my desire was so great that I didn't know what to do, I snuggled up to her, kissed her beautiful breasts, her beautiful stomach, her beautiful feet, but no, I had to wait, she didn't know me well enough, still didn't know who I was.

"I'm Karl Ove Knausgaard and I want you!" I said then.

She laughed and she hugged me, she was so soft and supple, and her eyes were gentle, and she was mine.

But not completely, not fully, it was still just her and me, and not us.

I didn't read much during these weeks. It felt unimportant, but she went up to university every day, and so I did too, though mostly for appearance's sake, the sentences didn't make much sense to me, for everything was churning around, everything was open and undefined, until I saw her come and make the world secure and clear again. Her, Gunvor, my girlfriend.

Espen came over during a break, he asked if I had read the Mandelstam essay yet, I hadn't, I was thinking of reading The Divine Comedy first, he thought that wise.

"Which edition are you reading? The nynorsk one? I started it, but it's so archaic it's pretty impossible. So I bought the Swedish version. It's very good."

"I bought the nynorsk edition," I said. "I'll have to see how I manage."

His gaze, which had been open and innocent, suddenly turned stern and introspective and he directed it at the field down in front of us.

I hurriedly revisited what had just been said. After a while, with neither of us saying anything, he glanced up at me.

"Would you like to come to Alrek one afternoon? Then we can play chess or something. Do you play chess?"

"I know the rules," I said. "But I can't exactly say I play."

"You can have a refresher," he said.

"Yes, of course," I said. "But I'd like a trip over anyway."

We arranged to meet the following afternoon. In the reading room I took out the translation of Divina Commedia, started reading without taking notes, whatever stuck would stick of its own accord. I knew a little of what it was about, I had read a third of Lagercrantz's Dante book and formed a clear impression of what it was like. Still, however, I wasn't prepared for the feeling of time I got from the first pages, for the book not being about the fourteenth century but actually dating from that century, it was a part of that century, and I was able to experience it now.

Lasciate ogni speranza, voi ch'entrate.

The gates of Hell, Easter 1300. Dante, who has lost his way, in midlife, and who will find redemption by seeing all there is to see.

He will see everything and he will be redeemed.

But at the beginning of the first canto it wasn't in life where he had lost his way but in a forest, and the animals that attacked him were not sins or treachery, they were beasts of flesh and blood, baring their teeth and snarling. Hell wasn't an internal state, the entrance to it lay there, in the middle of the world, at the bottom of a precipice, surrounded by forest and wilderness on all sides.

I understood of course that the contents of the explanatory footnotes, about what the individual animals and places and occurrences represented, were real enough, but what was exceptional about the opening, which I felt in every cell of my body like a gnawing hunger, was the concrete physical and material nature of it, not the shadows cast into the world of ideas. Something was compared with the building of a ship in a yard in Venice, and suddenly, with immense force, I realized that Dante must have been sitting somewhere and writing this, perhaps peering into the air and pondering what comparison he could draw, and then he remembered a shipyard he had seen once, in Venice, which was still there as he wrote.

I was supposed to meet Gunvor in the afternoon, I packed up my things and walked through the corridors dangling a plastic bag from my hand and into the courtyard between the buildings, I had stopped to have a smoke when I saw her coming toward me. She smiled with her whole body, she stretched up onto her toes and kissed me on the lips. We walked hand in hand, down the hills and over to Nøstet, where her apartment was. She shared it with a girlfriend called Arnhild. Her best friend was Karoline, and on paper, with their ponderous unfashionable names, they were an intimidating trio – Gunvor, Arnhild, and Karoline – but in reality they were happy and cheerful and wonderfully normal. Arnhild was at the Business School and would wear lamb's wool sweaters and a pearl necklace, Karoline studied at university and was a few notches tougher, she was closer to Gunvor, they had the same sense of humor, they followed in each other's footsteps in the way that I gathered girlfriends did. Once she told us about the time a boy had tried to pick her up, he had come up to her and asked her if she wanted to go back to his place, she had asked why, he had said so that he could fuck her senseless. They laughed at that! They were dutiful and sensible, would never fritter away their lives, and the security of that meant that everything else around us had no effect on them. Going out on the town for them, for example, was enjoyable and there was absolutely nothing demonic about it.

Even though I lived alone in a relatively spacious apartment we preferred to be at Gunvor's; my place was dark and gloomy and there was almost no furniture, hers was light, it was in good condition and moreover there was something girly and feminine about the furnishings that I liked to be surrounded by, it was so clear that she was my girlfriend then, in all its soft frilly unfamiliarity. Waking up there, more often than not with the rain pelting down in the street, so early that it was still dark, having breakfast with them and going off to the reading room with her, was something I hadn't experienced before and I loved it with the whole of my black heart.

I introduced Gunvor to Yngve and Asbjørn and his other friends, who in a way had become mine, too, or not friends exactly but at any rate people I was often with, by dint of being Yngve's younger brother, my safeguard in Bergen, and she was a great hit with them. That wasn't so strange, it was impossible not to like Gunvor, she always laughed at what others said, was sociable and affable, didn't take herself seriously, but nor was she frivolous, she worked hard at what she did and was no stranger to high seriousness, she also had a strong work ethic, you had to work, you had to go to lectures, you had to read, only then did you deserve time off. But this sense of moral duty, which I also knew and regarded as an enemy, something I had to oppose, something that stood for the opposite of what I wanted to be, this sense of moral duty didn't weigh heavy on her, it didn't affect her personality, it was more like a kind of guiding line, thin and straight and strong, a sinew in her soul, not visible but important, it gave her strength and security, meant that she never doubted that where she was and what she was doing were right.

When I was with her it was as though something was being drawn out of me. The darkness became lighter, the crippled straighter, and the strange thing was that it didn't come from outside, it wasn't that she lit the darkness, no, it was something that happened inside me because I saw myself with her eyes, and not just my own, and in her eyes there was nothing wrong with me, quite the contrary. In this way the balance shifted. When I was with Gunvor I no longer wished to do myself any harm.

As arranged I headed over to Espen's the day after, up the hills behind the railway station, over the long flat stretch there, to Alrek, where I had been only once before, when as a sixteen-year-old I visited Yngve four years ago.

Espen was cooking in the shared kitchen when I arrived. Chicken casserole with tomato, he said, want some?

It was heavily seasoned, but good, he lit up when I said that.

Afterward he made coffee in a strange shiny, almost sculpted, jug, it was shaped like a little man with a hat on, and Espen dismantled it first, poured water into one part, then poured fine-grained specialist coffee of some kind into a funnel-like contraption which he dropped into the water part, before screwing on the top half, which had a lid with a black ball in the center, and put it on the hotplate. I had no intention of asking what kind of coffee it made, I would accept everything he served with a worldly air.

Each carrying a cup, we went to his room.

Oh, how strong it was, it tasted a bit like espresso.

Espen looked through his records.

“Do you like jazz?” he said.

“Ye-es,” I said. “I don’t listen to so much, but it’s OK.”

“Let’s take a classic then . . . Kind of Blue?”

“Fine by me,” I said, trying to read the cover to see who had made the recording. Miles Davis.

Espen sat down on the bed.

“I went to see him at a concert in Oslo. I didn’t have a ticket, so I snuck in.”

“You snuck in? How did you manage that?”

“I went into the building next door, down to the cellar, where I found some chairs. I carried them to make it look as if I was working there. Then I opened a door, and there I was, in the middle of the auditorium.”

He laughed.

“Is that true?”

“Yes. It was a great concert.”

Pale melancholic music began to float through the room. Espen took out his chess set, placed the board between us, grasped one black and one white pawn in each hand, moved them around behind his back and then held his fists in front of me.

“That one,” I said.

He opened his fist. Black.

"I'm not quite sure how to set out the pieces," I said. "It's pawns first, isn't it?"

"Yes," he said, laying out his pieces in an instant. I copied him.

I hated chess, losing at chess felt to me much more significant and revealing and humiliating than a game of tennis, for example. I wasn't that intelligent, wasn't that calculating, even if I strained my brain so much that smoke came out of my ears, I could never work it out, could never plan more than two moves ahead, at least not when I was small and played with Dad or Yngve, who beat me every time. I hadn't played since then, however, I was an adult now, I thought. Maybe the experience I had acquired would benefit me in some way or other. It was only problem solving really.

"No stopwatch?" he said.

"No," I said.

We started and three minutes later I was checkmate.

"How about another game?"

"OK."

Three minutes later I was checkmate again.

"Best of five. Then you've got a chance of turning things around."

"It's possible."

He crushed me for the third time. But I couldn't see a hint of gloating in him as he packed away the set and silently set about rolling a cigarette.

"Are you an active player then?" I said.

"Me? No. No, no. I just like it."

"Do you read chess columns in the paper?"

"Sometimes, yes. It can be incredibly interesting to follow the moves in old games between the masters."

"Oh yes," I said.

"But there are some standard moves you can learn. Openings and so on. I can show you if you'd like."

I nodded.

"Shall we do it next time?"

"Yes."

Outside, the sun was shining through the clouds. The light that fell diagonally through the air made the colors in the countryside beneath seem shrill in comparison with the matte gray surroundings.

"What books do you actually like reading? In modern Norwegian literature?" he said.

"A bit of everything," I said. "Kjærstad, Fløgstad, Jon Fosse. All sorts of books really. What about you?"

"A broad range, too. But Øyvind Berg is good. Tor Ulven is fantastically good. Ole Robert Sunde, have you read anything by him? A whole novel about the main character, who walks to a kiosk and back. Odyssey, right? His language goes in all directions. It's enormously digressive, almost essayistic. You should read it."

"I've heard about it," I said. "Think there was something in Vinduet once."

"Then there's Ekelöf of course. And Jan Erik Vold! Enthusiastic Essays. I think that's my favorite book. It's so unbelievably rich. Have you seen it?"

I shook my head. He jumped up and went through one of the piles of books on his desk, passed me a fat blue book with a picture on the cover of Vold swimming.

"There," he said. "He writes about all sorts of things. Not just literature. A lot about jazz and . . . well."

"Great," I said, leafing through it.

The music had stopped, he took the record off the deck.

"What shall we play now?" he said.

"I don't know," I said.

"Flip through and see if there's anything you like."

"OK," I said, kneeling down.

Would you believe it, he had Heaven Up Here!

"Do you like Echo and the Bunnymen?" I said.

"Yes, certainly do. Ian McCulloch has a wonderful voice. And he's so fantastically arrogant."

"Can we play that one? Perhaps it's a bit pathetic. After all I've got it myself, but it's so good."

"Yes, go on. It's a long time since I've listened to it."

When I left an hour later, down the hills shining in the wan November light, I was full of tensions. Espen was the kind of person you noticed. He had a strong presence, and as I was so weak I picked up all the different moods he radiated and probably didn't register himself. There was also something introspective about him, sometimes it was as if his gaze didn't leave his eyes, it stayed where it was, inside, making it seem hard and irreconcilable, but when it let go he was openness in person, friendliness itself, in a way that I wasn't sure he registered either, because his enthusiasm seemed to take over and actually he was just following the currents inside him.

I was impressed by him, not least because he was two years younger than me. What I couldn't figure out though, as I walked along, was why he had invited me of all people to his place. Our department was full of interesting and well-read students and he had turned to the one person who had no depth and no insight into literature.

But I was glad he had. If I couldn't live up to expectations right now, I might be able to eventually.

At home there was a letter protruding from the door crack. I opened it. It was notice to move. Owing to renovation work I would have to be out before the middle of December.

Was that legal?

Oh shit. I was living way beyond my means anyway. It was just as well. But I would have to get out and look for new accommodation.

I went to bed early, but woke to the sound of someone banging on the window. I got up and went over. It was Gunvor. She smiled and pointed to the door, I nodded and went to open up.

Five minutes later she crawled into the narrow bed beside me and the fullness of her breasts against my hands made my body explode with desire.

"Not yet," she said. "But soon."

I was more than lucky with the accommodation problem. It turned out that Jon Olav's friend Ben had just moved out of a large four-room apartment by Danmarksplass and no one had moved in yet. It had formerly belonged to the shipyard in Solheimsviken, it was an extension of the office buildings there, and was now owned by a bank. I called them, yes, the apartment was free, I could move in, but I ought to know that the whole building was due to be demolished soon and I would have to be able to move out at a month's notice. When would that be? Well, she didn't know, not in the immediate future at any rate. I accepted, and one evening Gunvor and I went there, we were met by Ben and he showed us around the four rooms. There had been a whole gang of them living there, but the rent was so low that two could easily make ends meet. Originally there had been two apartments: one with two rooms behind the kitchen and one with two rooms behind the bathroom. There were wall-to-wall carpets on the floors, they could be removed, apparently there were attractive wooden boards underneath, the windows were single-glazed, filthy from car fumes and the traffic noise from the overpass was tangible, but according to Ben you got used to it. The general condition of the place wasn't good, the kitchen was old, the stove looked to be from the early 1960s, but there was a shower stall in the bathroom and the rent, as Ben reminded me, was low.

I was given the keys and he left.

Together with Gunvor I walked around the rooms once more. We hugged in the middle of the floor of what I had just decided would be the living room in my part.

"Don't you want to move in with me?" I said.

"No," she said. "Absolutely not! But perhaps one day. Who knows what might happen!"

"Then I'll have to get hold of someone to live here. Do you know anyone who needs somewhere to live?"

"No. But I can keep my ear to the ground. No girls, that's all. I don't dare take any risks."

"You? You've got nothing to fear. Is that how you think? Is that true?"

She went over to the window. I followed her, stood behind her, kissed her neck and gently fondled her breasts.

"What's your favorite?" she said.

"Huh?"

"Food. What's your favorite food?"

"Shrimp, I think. Why?"

"I was just wondering."

I pulled up the carpet in one room, cleaned away all the remnants of glue, leveled any uneven bits and painted it green like a ship's deck. The few pieces of furniture I possessed Yngve brought in a van we rented, I would buy anything else I needed from IKEA when my student loan came in. He told me he had organized a rehearsal room, it was at Verftet, we could use it two nights a week. Fired up with enthusiasm, we talked about songs, lyrics, and tracking down a vocalist. The following day we met in a café at Verftet. Me with two pairs of drumsticks, him with a guitar case, Pål with a bass gig bag. I was nervous, I hadn't played the drums since the early days at gymnas, and I couldn't do much except for the absolute basics. Yngve was aware of this, it was less easy with Pål, he was probably expecting a serious jam session with three musicians.

"Actually, I can't play," I said. "Did Yngve tell you? I only fiddled around on the drums when I was at gymnas. I'm pretty hopeless. But I can learn."

"Relax, Yngve Junior," Pål said. "It'll be fine."

Pål was tall and thin and pale with dark hair and a slightly childish attitude to life. He wasn't exactly afraid to show his little quirks, it was more like he cultivated them. He was an eccentric and in Bergen he was famous for having read poems during the student demos with bells in his hair. He read a little, shook his head to make the bells ring, then read a bit more. Explosion of cheering. He played in an experimental band that emerged from the Shit Tape cassette label in Arendal, they were called the Coalmine Five after the politician Kullmann Five presumably, he loved everything that was odd, weird, way out. Yngve and he had been in the same class at their first school, I'd heard his name all my life but had only met him in the last year. He had published two collections of poetry at his own publishing house and was studying Marine Biology. In his early youth he had played with the Salvation Army, and as a bass player, Yngve said, he wasn't your steady plodder but melodious, inventive, an improviser. It was obvious from the very first moment we started to play that he knew his stuff. That is, from the first moment they started to play. I was fazed. I sat on the chair with the drumsticks in my hand, behind the set, all the drums and cymbals, the two of them standing on either side playing, and I didn't dare make a move, I was too afraid of messing up.

They played "You Sway So Sweetly." Pål tried various fingerings, he was searching for something and once he had it, it stayed while he went off on other forays, came back with new lines and then was off again until he was happy and the song was in place.

Yngve stopped and looked at me.

"Come on then," he said.

"Play yourselves in," I said. "Then I can hear how it goes."

They did. When they were about halfway I tentatively started to play. I should be able to keep the beat anyway, even if not much else was right.

"That was good, Karl Ove," Pål said. "But try to get the bass drum to fall in with the bass. I can mark it for you. DUM dum DUM DUM dum. OK?"

"And play a bit louder," Yngve said. "We can hardly hear you."

I blushed and played and hoped this would soon be over. Pål looked at me and his whole upper body rose whenever the beat on the bass drum was imminent. After a while he turned away and just played, but then there was eye contact and raised shoulders again.

We continued for two hours with the same song, over and over again. It was all about getting me on board, of course they had it off pat. After we had finished for the day and they were starting to roll up the cables and pack the boxes and straps, my shirt was drenched.

"You'd better find someone else," I said.

"Not at all," said Yngve. "It'll be great."

"That went really well," Pål said. "I don't know what you're talking about. All we need now is a vocalist and a name for the band. I suggest Misc M. Then we'll always have our own section in record shops."

"I was thinking of Odd & Bent," Yngve said. "That works in both English and Norwegian."

"Sounds like the description of a dick," I said.

"Speak for yourself," Yngve said.

"He is. He's talking about his own syphilitic dick," Pål laughed.

"What about Mao?" I said. "I was toying with that. Short and sweet."

"Troubled Waters," Pål said. "That's good too. Now we have to pour oil on troubled waters! Either of you know what troubled waters are actually?"

"No," I said. "Beside me in the reading room is someone with a great name. I wondered about this. He's called Finn Iunker. We could just use the name of someone we don't know, couldn't we? Finn Iunker and something or other. Finn Iunker and the Seaplanes, for example?"

"Not bad," Yngve said. "I wondered about Smith and the Smudgers."

"Or what about Ethnic Cleansing Cream?" said Pål.

Yngve laughed so much he had to walk around the room to recover.

"Or Holocaustic Soda?" I said.

"Kafkatrakterne?" Pål said, wriggling his shoulders to get the bass strap to sit better. "Kafkatrakterne!"

"Mm," Yngve said. "Not Coffee Machines but Kafka Machines. Yes, I like it."

"Kafkatrakterne it is," I said. "It's great!"

The last two places I'd had were at street level and all I had seen from them was passing heads and umbrellas. The new apartment was quite different. It was at the top of the old brick building, and from the living room there was a view of the big overpass in Danmarksplass, the offices behind, the big old cinema, the new REMA 1000 supermarket, and on the opposite side of the road the bookshop where I had in my, now incomprehensible, naïveté and immaturity bought Hunger. A crowd of drunks used to sit on the benches by the little parking lot outside the supermarket, there was a taxi stand – it took me a couple of nights to realize that was where the low ringing sound I heard came from, the phone was going almost all the time – and the road was one everyone used to get in and out of the town center, so there was always something happening. In addition, the hospital was close by and a regular stream of ambulances, with and without sirens and blue lights, weaved through the traffic day and night. For me this was a rewarding sight, I often stood looking out the windows, like a cow out of a stall, because I was empty inside then, I registered movements and followed what was happening, that was all. Look, a pickup carrying a long plank on the back with a white handkerchief tied around the end! A truck full of braying sheep, what on earth was this, was I in Yugoslavia all of a sudden? A lady with a fox stole around her neck, the kind where the head is intact, obviously insane, her stiff, rigid movements were unmistakable, she strode first down one side of the street, then back up the other. A group of at first three, then four and five, men gathering by the end of the hill up from the subway at half past three in the morning, what skulduggery were they up to? Woman gives man an ear bashing, man gives woman an ear bashing, countless variations on that theme. I also saw quite a number of swaying figures, sometimes in such a dire state that I couldn't believe my own eyes, people staggering along the middle of the three-lane highway, people losing their balance and running to one side, stopping when they regained it, running to the other side, just like we had done when we were children pretending to be drunks, copying what we had seen in silent films we were shown at parties.

Another improvement on my previous accommodation was the telephone that had been installed. I had the line connected and now I had my very own number.

Gunvor was the first to call.

"Will you be at home tomorrow?" she asked after we had been talking for a while.

"If you come I will be."

We agreed she would come by around noon. At twelve sharp she rang the bell. She had a plastic bag in her hand.

"I've bought some shrimp," she said. "They didn't have any fresh ones, I'm afraid, so these are frozen."

She took them out, a plastic bag of frozen Greenland shrimp, which I put on a dish so that they would thaw faster. She had also bought some butter, mayonnaise, a loaf of bread, and a lemon.

"Is this a special day or what?" I said.

She smiled and looked down, and I suddenly caught on. Today was the day. We hugged, went into the bedroom, I slowly undressed her, we lay down on the mattress by the wall. One leg kept trembling. The light from the overcast sky filled the room, fell over our white bodies, her face, her eyes constantly watching me.

Afterward we showered together and then we went to see how the shrimp were doing, we were strangely shy with each other, as though we had suddenly become two strangers. But this didn't last long, the gap closed, soon we were chatting as if nothing had happened, until our eyes met and once again the atmosphere became charged with seriousness. It was as though we were seeing each other for the first time. We were the same, but the noncommittal nature of our relationship had become committal in a way that changed everything. We gazed at each other in an intense, serious way, then her face dissolved into a smile, shall we eat your shrimp now?

This was the first time a glimpse of the future had shown itself in our relationship. Now it really was us, and what did that mean?

I was twenty years old, she was twenty-two, of course we would just continue as before. There was nothing to plan, everything came of its own accord. So far we had spent almost all of our time together, we were discovering each other, there was so much we had to tell each other about our lives, as well as everything else going on around us, while also doing things. We weren't conscious of what we were doing or why, at least I wasn't, hardly any of the others I knew were, either. Everyone went to the movies now and then, and to the Film Club, everyone went to Café Opera or Hulen, everyone went around visiting everyone else, everyone bought records and everyone went to the odd gig. Everyone slept with everyone else, or wanted to, either casually after a night out or on a regular basis. Occasionally a child was born, but that was an absolute rarity, a peculiarity, becoming a parent in our twenties as so many of our parents' generation had done was a no-no. Many students went up Mount Fløyen or Mount Ulriken on weekends, I didn't, I drew the line there, I would never be one for the outdoor life, and Gunvor wasn't either, or at least she restricted that part of her life to a minimum. Not much more than that happened, yet I experienced it as rich and meaningful in the sense that I never questioned it, there were no alternatives, in more or less the same way that people never questioned a horse and cart in the centuries before the car was invented. And somehow it was rich too, and full of significance, because every one of the tiny arenas of interest contained an unending wealth of nuances and distinctions, a band was not just a band, for example, it carried with it a multitude of other details, and there were thousands of them. A Literature student was not only a Literature student, although it probably looked like that from a distance, once you got closer to one, as I did with Espen, each and every one of them was his own complete world, there were hundreds of them, and of students, thousands. Then there were all the books that existed and all the knowledge they contained, as well as their interconnections. There were millions of them. Bergen was a tract of land and it wasn't just rain that fell into it, there was also everything that was thought and done throughout the world that found its way here, to the foundations of this town in whose streets we walked. 808 State released 808:90, the Pixies Doolittle, Neneh Cherry Raw Like Sushi, the Golden Palaminos A Dead Horse, Raga Rockers Blaff. People were beginning to buy their own computers. There was talk of a new commercial Norwegian TV channel which might be based in Bergen. Raga Rockers played at Maxine, Arvid shouted, "Hey, that's Yngve," as a guy ran onto the stage and threw himself into the audience. It was so unlike him and everyone laughed. I read The Divine Comedy in the nynorsk translation, wrote an assignment on it, which I presented in Buvik's course, held a forty-five-minute talk, which I had been dreading for several weeks, but it went well, at least according to Espen. Buvik said that I used Lagercrantz as a crutch, but that was allowed, and after that he would sometimes pick on me during lectures, apparently keen to hear my opinion on this or that. I blushed and mumbled and was so uncomfortable it must have been glaringly obvious, but I was also proud, it was me he had asked. I liked Buvik, I liked his style, the easily kindled enthusiasm, despite the fact that he had been a lecturer for many years and we were on the bottom rung of the hierarchy. He had short blond hair, round glasses, always dressed elegantly, was a good-looking man with a tinge of effeminacy about his gestures and body language, but he had obtained his doctorate in France, as far as I was led to believe, and I suspected it was predominantly an expression of his refinement, manners that were so perfect they were reflected in his body language. Linneberg was his opposite in so many ways: he spoke a kind of self-constructed working-class Oslo dialect, made a great point of it, had a ring in his ear, a great big head, his smile was often sardonic, and he liked to wear guises, such as the time he gave a lecture wearing a clown's red nose or when he held forth wearing a monkey mask. If he had to talk about Brecht he did it puffing on a huge cigar. Both of them had immense power over us, they were important figures and if they went to one of the first-year parties they could pick up any girl they wanted, I often thought about that, there was always an energy in the room when they lectured and it wasn't just intellectual curiosity and a thirst for knowledge from the students' side. They had such high status it was as if the gods had descended from Mount Olympus to sit among us in the canteen. Which, of course, they never did. That Buvik had asked me a question twice during a lecture was a sign of favor from the Sun God in my eyes. I didn't know what the others thought, with them I exchanged very few words, apart from Espen and Ole. But I was beginning to get a hold on the subject, I wrote another assignment, about Fløgstad's aesthetics, and reckoned in fact I had cracked the code. Academic writing was actually about hiding what you didn't know. There was a language, a technique, and I had mastered it. In everything there were gaps, which language could cover over, so long as you had acquired the know-how. I had, for instance, never read Adorno, knew practically nothing about the Frankfurt School, just the snippets I had picked up here and there, but in an assignment I could maneuver the little knowledge I actually had in such a way as to make it appear greater and more comprehensive. Another technique that was held in high regard was the ability to transfer knowledge from one field to another, preferably in a surprising way, this too was simple, all you had to do was build a bridge between them and then your work seemed to have a new original element, even though actually there was nothing new or original in it. It didn't have to be brilliant, not even particularly good, because all it was intended to do was provide evidence that you thought for yourself, had your own opinions, besides of course showing that you had knowledge of the topic.

These practice assignments on Dante and Fløgstad I called "essays" when I talked about them. I've just written an essay about Fløgstad by the way. In the essay about Dante, you know, I wrote about . . .

One day I was smoking under the Arts Block roof with Espen, as the rain poured down from the leaden sky, there was something about him, a kind of heightened wariness, and it was on the tip of my tongue to ask him directly what it was when he suddenly glanced at me.

"I was thinking of applying to the Writing Academy," he said.

"Oh?" I said. "That's great! I didn't even know you wrote. Though I did have a suspicion."

"I was wondering if you would mind casting an eye over something I've written. I'm not quite sure what I should send in. Or if there's any point."

"Not at all," I said.

"I've got some texts with me today actually. You can have them afterward if you want."

When he gave me the pieces later that day it was with the utmost discretion. We were like spies and the texts were secret documents concerning not only the security of our own country but all the countries in the NATO pact. A plastic folder came out of his bag, it was passed behind our backs, half hidden, we were standing next to each other, then popped into my shopping bag with the same fleetness of hand. Once the transfer was complete we talked about something else.

Being a writer was no great disgrace, quite the opposite, in literature it represented the supreme, the highest pinnacle of achievement, but it was shameful to boast about it because almost everyone wrote and until your writing had appeared in a journal or, oh bliss, had been published, it was basically nothing, nonexistent, and if you needlessly revealed this fact, you lost face, you showed you didn't want to be here but somewhere else, that you had a dream which, and this was the crux of the matter, probably wouldn't come to fruition. Until there was any evidence to the contrary, what Literature students wrote was for the desk drawer. The situation was a little different for me, I had been to the Writing Academy and had "a right to write," but if I displayed my work, and it was poor, I would immediately lose all credibility.

So it was important to be cautious. What Espen gave me in deepest secrecy was, on the one hand, "nothing," that is, invisible and had to be treated as such; on the other hand, for Espen it was probably more important, actually, much more important than a document regarding the security of NATO-pact countries.

I treated it with the respect and dignity it warranted. I didn't open the folder until I got home and was completely alone. After I had read the texts, which were poems, I regretted not having said to Espen that I was no good even if I had attended the Writing Academy course, actually I was a fraud because I could immediately see that the poems were good, I recognized the mark of quality from the first line, but I was incapable of saying a word about them. About why they were good, about how they could be better. I could only say they were good.

But he didn't notice, didn't ask for farther comment, he was happy I had liked them.

One weekend I took Gunvor home to meet Mom, who had moved to a house in Jølster, fifteen kilometers outside Førde. It was old and nice, situated on a small plain below some big farms on slopes leading up to high mountains. On the other side of the road was the River Jølstra. We caught a bus which stopped only a hundred meters from her house, freezing mist hung over the river as we walked up, Mom was waiting with a hot meal, she came into the hall as we tramped in, they shook hands and smiled, I was a little tense, but not as tense as Gunvor, she had been dreading this meeting for ages and talked a lot about it on the journey here. She was the first girlfriend I had brought home since I was sixteen, the first real girlfriend since I had grown up and, for all we knew, the last. It was important that Mom liked her for both Gunvor and me.

She did, of course. There were no signs of tension or nervousness to be seen in Gunvor, she was herself, as always, and they soon warmed to each other, I noticed their mutual regard and was happy about that and about being able to show Gunvor the easy relationship Mom and I had, and always had had, Gunvor witnessed me having long conversations, and in this way, in this context – in which I was also somehow closer to Gunvor – she saw the person I was when Mom and I were together, more real, less ambivalent.

The fire crackled, we sat around the table talking. Outside, in the freezing cold river landscape, cars rushed past in the distance.

“What a fantastic mother you have,” she said when we went to bed.

“She likes you,” I said.

“Do you think so?”

“Yes, it’s easy to see.”

The following day we went up to see Borghild, Grandma’s sister. She had curly white hair, a plump body with big upper arms, and wore thick glasses which made her eyes look frighteningly large. A longtime widow, she had a mind as sharp as a razor, latched on to the most surprising stories from all over the world and was always quick to condemn whatever she didn’t like.

She stared shamelessly at Gunvor for a few seconds when they met.

“So this is a visit from the young students!” she said. We sat down in her little living room, there were piles of magazines on the table with a large magnifying glass on top, she went into the kitchen and saw to some crepes and coffee, which were served five minutes later with a long list of apologies for the paucity of the offering.

"Borghild's responsible for the catering at weddings in this district," Mom told Gunvor.

"Well, I was once," she said.

"The last time was no more than six months ago, wasn't it?" Mom said with a smile.

"Yes, but that was nothing," she said. "Weddings now are not what they used to be. They used to last three days!"

Mom asked about various relatives, and Borghild replied.

"Grandma came from the farm down there," I said to Gunvor, and she stood up to see. I stood behind her. I controlled the impulse to cup my hands around her breasts, which always announced itself when I was standing behind her, and placed my hand on her shoulder instead.

"When I was growing up we still had sixteenth-century buildings there," Borghild said.

I glanced at her and my spine froze.

The sixteenth century, that wasn't long after Dante.

"But they were demolished, all of them."

"Has the same family lived there all that time?" I said.

"Yes, I rather think they have," she said.

I hadn't been there often and I didn't even know the names of all Grandma's sisters, knew nothing about their parents except that he, my great-grandfather that is, had been an avid Bible reader and had not only worked long, hard hours but also enjoyed the toil more than anything else. My great-grandmother, Borghild's mother and Mom's grandmother, I knew nothing about. She had given birth to eleven children, she had lived down below, that was the extent of my knowledge. I had a bad conscience about knowing so little, it felt as if it was my responsibility, if I was so ignorant I didn't deserve to be called a relative.

I determined that one day I would go up to see Borghild on my own and write down whatever she told me, not just for my sake, that is, getting to know more about my family, but because all the knowledge she possessed was interesting in itself.

We drove home alongside the big silent deep lake where Borghild told us fishermen used to sweep the waters with cocks; wherever the cocks crowed they got out their fishing tackle. Outside, it was pitch black. Apart from the road and the trees or the water beside them, which all lay beneath the yellow light of the street lamps, only the snow-clad mountain peaks were visible. It was a starry sky, everything felt open and spacious.

The bus back to Bergen left at four in the morning, we stayed awake till then, and were waiting at the stop, stamping our feet to keep warm, when it arrived, thundering around the bends above us. We slept leaning against each other for the four and a half hours the journey lasted, surrounded by the thrum of the heater, the drone of the engine, the occasional cough from other passengers, the door opening and closing, all in a distant dream, the characteristic sounds of vehicles boarding ferries, the silence afterward, when the monotony of the road takes over.

We walked straight up to the university from the bus station, said goodbye, I read for a few hours, then Yngve came and asked me to join him in the canteen, he had good news. Over the weekend he had been staying in a cabin in the mountains with some people from Student Radio, one of them had sung and played the guitar, Yngve said he had such a good voice that he had asked him straight out if he wanted to be in a band. He did. We would go out one night, all four of us, and get to know one another, they had agreed. His name was Hans and he came from Geiranger, studied History, and liked Neil Young, that was all Yngve knew.

We met him at Garage, the new rock scene which consisted of a small room and a long bar on the ground floor and a big dark basement beneath with a stage. They had started booking a number of good English and American bands as well as many from Bergen, where bands were springing up everywhere, Mona Lisa Overdrive was indisputably the best, Pogo Pops came a good second.

From Yngve's brief description I had expected a rough-looking guy with a lumberjack shirt, torn jeans, sturdy boots, tousled hair, and wild eyes, it was the Neil Young reference that did it, but the young man who came in through the door holding a dripping closed umbrella in one hand and whose eyes immediately sought Yngve's had nothing in common with the phantom I had conjured up and it disappeared the instant he came over to our table.

"Hans," he said, offering his hand. "You must be Yngve's younger brother and the drummer."

"That's me," I said.

He removed his glasses and wiped off the moisture.

"We're waiting for Pål," Yngve said.

"I'll get myself a beer in the meantime," he said, and went toward the bar. Someone put the Clash's London Calling on the jukebox and my spine tingled, that was a good sign.

"This has all the potential for being a legendary moment," Yngve said when he returned. "The night the vocalist met the rest of Kafkatrakterne for the first time."

"We'd seen each other at art school but didn't like what we saw," Hans said. "Perhaps we even got into a fight. But then the guitarist heard me sing and had a vision that would redefine the course of rock history."

"While the drummer said nothing and the bassist arrived late," Yngve said.

"Drummers don't have to say anything," Hans said. "Theirs is the most important function in the band. They're supposed to be silent and tough. To drink a lot, say little, and fuck all the time."

"Actually I'm silent and soft," I said. "Hope you can still use me."

"You don't look soft," Hans said. "But if you insist, OK. It's good to have variations on this theme. Tiny unexpected details which make it that much more exciting. On the other hand, there is the Charlie Watts type. The gentleman who stays with his wife and plays jazz in his spare time. A little gardening and so on."

"I can't play, either," I said. "Yngve probably didn't tell you, but I'm afraid it's true."

"This could be interesting," Hans said.

"Skål," Yngve said. "To the Kafkatrakterne!"

We raised our glasses, drank up, went downstairs and watched the band playing for a while, Pål eventually turned up and we hung around the bar chatting. I said nothing, it was the others who did the chatting, but I was still part of it, I didn't feel I was on the outside.

Hans had played in bands all his life from what I could understand. He wrote in the student newspaper Studvest, made programs for Student Radio, was interested in politics, against the EU, wrote in nynorsk, was confident but not in the least bit boastful, that lay as far from his character as it was possible to be. He had a strong sense of irony, liked to make jokes, often with a dangerous sting in the tail, but his presence was usually so friendly that the danger was somehow neutralized. I really liked him, he was a good person. Whether he liked me or not was a different matter. The little I said came from the bottom of a deep well, dark and somehow quaking.

When Garage closed and the evening was over I didn't go home but to Gunvor's. She had moved to one of the apartment buildings near Bystasjonen and rented a room in the loft. I let myself in with the key I had been given, she lifted her head a fraction and smiled through the hair covering half her face and asked if I'd had a good time. Yes, I said, and lay down beside her. She went back to sleep at once, I lay awake studying the ceiling and listening to the occasional traffic in the streets, the rain falling on the roof and the skylights. There was little I enjoyed more than coming here after I had been out on the town, having a place that wasn't mine but where I was welcome, where I could cuddle up to her and feel her bare skin against mine. Now and then I wondered if she felt the same, if she lay awake feeling my bare skin against hers with her soul at peace. The notion was alien, almost scary, because then I was viewing myself with her eyes while knowing who I was myself.

The clock radio came on, I opened my eyes drowsily, Gunvor got up and went to the bathroom in the hall, I closed my eyes, heard the faint hiss of the shower, the rumble of the traffic on the road past Bystasjonen, fell asleep, woke up to her standing there putting on first her bra, then a blouse and a pair of trousers.

"Are you going to have breakfast?" she said.

"No," I said. "I'm going to sleep a bit more."

Then, apparently the next moment, she leaned over and kissed me on the cheek in her waterproof trousers and jacket.

"I'm off. See you this afternoon?"

"OK," I said. "Can you come to my place?"

"Yes. Bye!"

She vanished as if in a dream, into the wet streets of Bergen, beneath its gray sky, while I stayed in bed until eleven. Instead of going to the reading room I spent the day in town. Went into all the secondhand shops and bookstores, bought some records and some old paperbacks as well as a brand-new novel that Else Karin from the Academy had just brought out. It was called Out, the cover was white with a picture of a woman kneeling, half of her was naked and the other dressed in a harlequin costume. I had no expectations, I had only bought it because I knew the author and was curious to see how her style compared with what I had written.

On the back, it said JEALOUSY – ILLNESS – INSANITY?

My goodness.

I went into the café with all the old people and sat down to read. On the second page, no less, came the bombshell. It was about me!

> You never came near, Karl Ove.
> The jury agrees with me.
> Your fingers were absent, just ask us.
> You didn't get my juices on you > unless you lied.

I read on, plowed through the pages scanning for my name. Ay, yay, yay.

> Karl Ove, you'll have to come and love me.

> Karl Ove, you didn't come near me.

You were a disaster, Karl Ove – and I was already so thin.

Lots about dicks and wombs, I noticed. Screams and ovaries being injected. Whipping and burning. Nothing short of a cabinet of horrors. One day you might understand, Karl Ove, I read. Hell, Karl Ove, I read. Then suddenly in lowercase, why, karl ove, why did you have to love me?

I put the book to the side and gazed down at Torgalmenningen. I realized of course this wasn't about me, yet I was shaken, it was impossible to read my name with complete neutrality, and it certainly wasn't neutral either, because she had chosen it, the name of someone she had attended a course with last year, and not another name, one that wouldn't have been a problem, there was no shortage of names.

On the other hand, I thought, this was a good story, one I could tell people. I went to the Writing Academy and although I might not have made my debut afterward at least I became a character in a book. Karl Ove has tossed and turned and been afraid. It's beautiful outside – Karl Ove knows – and he grabs the rod and closes the blinds tight, so tight, and the sun and the spruce trees are gone. Today he won't touch a drop of alcohol.

That evening we practiced with Hans. The first thing he did was to translate my lyrics into nynorsk. They sounded good, better than before. He also had a couple of songs with him, we began to work on one of them, "Home Father Nation." Afterward we went into the hall at the back of the factory where there was a stage and a couple of local bands were going to play. As the lights were lowered and the first band was about to start, to my astonishment, I saw Morten walk across the stage and take the mike.

Morten!

Thin and dressed in black, he stood there holding the microphone stand with both hands as he sang. I couldn't believe my eyes. The last time I saw him, when we were living in the same house only six months ago, he was a conventional, though unusually open and sensitive, Østlander; now there he was singing on the stage, his body language not unlike Michael Krohn's, full of devil-may-care assurance. He sang like Michael Krohn as well, and the band played like the Raga Rockers, so that wasn't good, they had no originality of their own, but from where I was standing that wasn't the point, it was the metamorphosis Morten had undergone.

He was studying History, he said when I met him afterward. Though mostly he was playing with his band. And you? he said. Have you made your debut yet? No, I said, I can't say I have, everything went to pot. But now I'm playing in a band, too. The Kafkatrakterne.

He laughed at that and disappeared into the enormous space that had arisen between us now that we were no longer neighbors.

At the beginning of January I finally managed to find someone to move into the second apartment, which I had been paying for until then. His name was Jone, he came from Stavanger and was the ex of Kari, Asbjørn's new girlfriend. He worked for an oil company, had his own little record enterprise on the side, organized record fairs, now he had been given a leave of absence to study at the Business School and was more than happy to live with me. I was pleased about that, didn't give the poor state of the apartment a thought until the evening when he parked a white van outside and I went down to help him carry up the furniture.

"Hi, Karl Ove!" he said, although we had never seen each other before, and I realized he was the extrovert type.

Red hair, pale skin, somewhat torpid movements.

"Hi," I mumbled back. I wouldn't have dreamed of using his first name until I actually knew him.

"What sort of a hovel is this?" he said, looking up at the filthy, decaying brick facade.

"Cheap," I said.

"I'm only teasing," he laughed. "Come on. Can you give me a hand with the heavier stuff?"

He opened the doors, put on some gloves, and climbed into the back of the van. Everything was top quality, I could see. A decent water bed, a decent living-room table, a decent sofa, a large TV, and a fantastic stereo. We started with the bed. After we had maneuverd it upstairs and into his room I had such a bad conscience I could barely look him in the eye. The two drafty rooms with the old kitchen and the old bathroom would be no good for him, I should have spelled out what sort of place it was he was moving into, but now it was too late, now he was here and looking around. But he said nothing, we carried up one piece of furniture after the other, one box after the other, he joked and laughed, which it soon became clear was how he was, and he didn't appear to be bothered by the poor standard of the accommodation, which was all I could think about. By the next day he had unpacked and organized everything, and what his part of the apartment said was, there is something off kilter here: an elderly man in a spanking new discotheque, an old biddy dressed and made up like a young woman, a rotten tooth with a new white cap.

But he liked where he was. And I liked him, knowing he was there on the other side of the hall was good, and bumping into him in the morning and evening was good too, I was never alone somehow, although we had little to do with each other beyond that.

A few weeks later I discovered that the apartment beneath mine was free. I told Espen, with whom I had spent more and more time that winter, and suggested he phone the landlord, the bank, that is, and ask them if he could move in. They said yes and only a few days later we were "neighbors." He was the frugal type, he wandered around town searching for skips full of old furniture, used whatever he found to furnish his whole apartment, which was identical to mine, except that it was totally separate from the adjacent one and his toilet was in the hall and as cold and drafty as all the other student toilets in this town, where not one apartment or room could have been done up since the early 1940s. His coffee table consisted of concrete blocks with a board across, the rest of the furniture was old but fully functional and the overall impression when you entered was brilliant, what with all the books he had accumulated.

This was my life now. I was twenty-one years old, doing the first year of a Literature course, I had a stranger living next door to me, I had a friend I still didn't really know on the floor beneath, and a girlfriend. I knew nothing but I was getting better and better at pretending I did. I had a brother who allowed me into his world. And then there were Jon Olav and Ann Kristin, whom I met occasionally, and Kjartan, who had moved to Bergen and started studying when Grandma died. I saw him now and then in the canteen at the Student Center, where he stuck out, forty years old and gray-haired as he was, alone at a table, surrounded by youth on all sides. I also saw him in the canteen at Sydneshaugen, he was often sitting with others from his course then, all young, of course, and the glint he'd had in his eyes when he pontificated on all his philosophers at home in Sørbøvåg was gone. It was still Heidegger and Nietzsche, the Pre-Socratics and Hölderlin, at least when he talked to me, but for him they were no longer the future, as they had been when everything in his life gathered around this burning point.

I had no future either, not because it existed somewhere else but because I couldn't imagine it. That I might control my future and try to make it turn out the way I wanted was completely beyond my horizon. Everything was of the moment, I took everything as it came and acted on the basis of premises I didn't even know myself, and without realizing this is what I did. I tried to write, but it didn't work, everything went to pieces after a few sentences, I didn't have it in me. Espen, however, was a poet to the very core of his soul. There was no doubt that he would be accepted into the course at the Writing Academy, and rightly so, there was nothing false about what he did, I saw nothing other than entirely pure and genuine motives as far as literature was concerned.

After he moved in below we spent a lot of time together. If he wanted company or if he had made something he thought I ought to taste, which he often did, he was as experimental and ingredient-conscious in the kitchen as he was in poetry, he banged a broomstick on the ceiling and I went down. We played chess, listened sometimes to jazz and sometimes to bands I introduced because, when it came to pop and rock, our preferences were relatively similar, both influenced by having lived our early teenage years in the mid-1980s, which included a lot of post-punk but also more rhythmical stuff like Happy Mondays, Talking Heads, Beastie Boys, he liked dancing, which was not entirely apparent at first glance, however there was little that excited him as much as driving music, and most of all, and above all else, we talked. We both read a lot, each in our own area, and that was what we discussed or took as a springboard for discussion because our own experiences were also woven into the conversations, which were endless, we could sit late into the night and continue in the afternoon of the next day, there was nothing forced or constrained about it, both he and I were hungry for knowledge, beating in our hearts we both had a desire to learn, we both felt the pleasure of moving forward, for this was what was happening, we were pushing each other forward, one leading the other, suddenly I could hear myself talking about something I had never thought of before, and where did that come from?

We were nobodies, two young Lit students chatting away in a rickety old house in a small town at the edge of the world, a place where nothing of any significance had ever happened and presumably never would, we had barely started out on our lives and knew nothing about anything, but what we read was not nothing, it concerned matters of the utmost significance and was written by the greatest thinkers and writers in Western culture, and that was basically a miracle, all you had to do was fill in a library lending slip and you had access to what Plato, Sappho, or Aristophanes had written in the incomprehensibly distant mists of time, or Homer, Sophocles, Ovid, Lucullus, Lucretius or Dante, Vasari, da Vinci, Montaigne, Shakespeare, Cervantes or Kant, Hegel, Kierkegaard, Nietzsche, Heidegger, Lukács, Arendt, or those who wrote in the modern day, Foucault, Barthes, Lévi-Strauss, Deleuze, Serres. Not to mention the millions of novels, plays, and collections of poetry which were available. All one lending slip and a few days away. We didn't read any of these to be able to summarize the contents, as we did with the literature on the syllabus, but because they could give us something.

What was this "something"?

For my part, it was something being opened up. My whole world consisted of entities I took for granted and which were unshakable, like rocks and mountains of the mind. The Holocaust was one such entity, the Age of Enlightenment another. I could account for them, I had a clear image of them, as everyone did, but I had never thought about them, never asked myself what circumstances had made them possible, why they happened when they did, and definitely not whether there was any connection between them. As soon as I started to read Horkheimer and Adorno's book Dialectic of Enlightenment, of which I understood very little, something opened, in that things which could be viewed in one way could also be viewed in another, words lost their force, there was no such thing as the Holocaust, for what the term indicated was so incredibly complicated, right down to the comb in the pocket of the jacket in the pile of jackets in the warehouse, it had belonged to a little girl, the whole of her life exists in the term "the Holocaust," and up again to the big concepts like evil, indifference, guilt, collective guilt, individual responsibility, mass man, mass production, mass extinction. In this way the world was relativized, but also more real: lies or misunderstandings or deceit were inherent in notions of reality, not in reality, which was inaccessible to language.

Espen could read a passage aloud that Leonardo da Vinci had written about the movement of a hand, and the simplest of the simple, the most obvious of the obvious, was no longer simple and obvious, it appeared as the mystery it really was.

Yes, we read to each other. Mostly Espen, he could jump up in the middle of a conversation, return with a book and start reading from it, and me too, on rare occasions I found something I considered had value for him too. There was an imbalance in our relationship, Espen led, he was the dominant partner, I followed and was always happy when his face lit up at something I had said or he found interesting, that spurred me on, the ensuing conversation was always good because I was freer, but if he didn't respond, which also happened, I retreated, held back, forever controlled by his moods, while he, for his part, never placed much weight on what I thought or felt; if he didn't agree he said so at once, took it as a challenge, but he didn't draw any link with his own capacities, he never doubted his own abilities as I did.

This was the only thing we couldn't discuss, what went on between us. He never heard me say that I couldn't say any more about this matter, as his lack of response had made me too unsure about myself, that I was a mere Zeitblom while he was a Leverkühn, that I was doomed to become a literary critic or a cultural correspondent, he to become what he was: a poet, a writer, an author.

No two people in Bergen were farther apart than Espen and Gunvor. At any rate I couldn't think of any. Having them in the same room was an exercise in futility, they never got beyond hi, how are you, they had nothing to say to each other, weren't the slightest bit interested in each other. So I lived two completely separate lives, one with Gunvor, which was all about closeness, being and doing things together, such as making love, having breakfast, visiting her friends, watching films, going for a walk, chatting about whatever entered our heads, all closely related to our bodies, the smell of her hair, for example, the taste of her skin, the feeling of lying hip to hip in bed smoking, in other words, sharing life. We talked about brothers and sisters, parents and friends, never about theoreticians or theories, and if we moved on to the university in our conversations, it would be to talk about the guy who fell asleep in the reading room, which Gunvor also did once, he had woken up with a start and when he'd stood up to leave he'd collapsed in a heap. I'm paralyzed! I'm paralyzed! he had shouted, but then the feeling in his legs returned, they had gone to sleep too, and he got to his feet with a sheepish, ashamed expression while everyone around him was laughing, not least Gunvor, judging by her mirth as she told me the story.

Yngve and Espen had nothing to say to each other, they weren't types I wanted to bring together either, and this rift was harder to reconcile myself to because while the differences between Espen and Gunvor also had something to do with being man and woman, friend and girlfriend, and were therefore quite natural and acceptable, the differences between Yngve and Espen were based on something else. Sometimes I saw what Espen and I did through Yngve's eyes, then we were transformed into two nerds sitting alone and reading aloud and playing chess and listening to jazz, as far from the social, sociable world of bands and girls and nights out as it was possible to be. Yngve saw that it wasn't me, and I carried that view with me, I was the guy in the street who liked soccer and pop music, what was I doing with all this modernist elitist literature? However, it worked the other way too because what Yngve said didn't always sound as convincing in my ears anymore, but these were such painful thoughts that I suppressed them the instant they appeared.

I met Kjartan a couple of times that spring, and something had happened to him, I could see that. Although he spoke as he always had, the fire was gone, and in his eyes there was a dejection I hadn't seen in him before. One evening Mom phoned to say he had been admitted to the psychiatric ward at the hospital. He had become psychotic, it was serious, he had wrecked his whole apartment, smashed everything in it, thrown the TV out the window, and then he had been led away. Now he was in Førde, at the hospital there, where Mom, Ingunn, and Kjellaug, his three sisters, were moving heaven and earth for him to be given the best possible treatment. Mom was beside herself with worry. A psychosis could last a long time and he was still unapproachable.

In the May exam we got Dante. Several students turned around and looked at me as the papers were being distributed, I had marketed myself as a Dante fan, I had become a little Dante expert and you could hardly get luckier than this.

But I hadn't read anything about the canto in the question, so instead of writing about this specific passage, which was about two lovers moving back and forth in the mass of sinners drifting like a flock of birds in the wind and who can never come close to each other, I reconstructed the essay I had written about Dante as well as I could, almost verbatim, and referred vaguely to the passage at the start and the end. Espen had also chosen Dante, didn't think it went particularly well, but it hadn't been a catastrophe either.

When the results were pinned up on the board outside the Institute it turned out I had only a 2.4. It was a cum laude, and perfectly acceptable, but a far cry from what I had hoped for and expected. I wanted to be at least the best in the year. Espen, however, got a 2.2, one of the best grades that had been given this semester. I understood why: he had written about that particular canto, read it, and extracted something from it on the spot while I had sewn a finished product onto the text and rendered it invisible.

I got what I deserved, but it was hard to swallow; the sole reason for taking this subject, in my view, was to be the best. What was the point of being a mediocre Lit student? It was absolutely meaningless.

I decided to drop Philosophy and concentrate on Literature to make up for lost ground at once. Espen was going to start at the Writing Academy and wouldn't be a threat there, which pleased me. He wasn't competitive, but he won anyway, and there was no safeguard against that.

The summer lay before me and as usual I didn't know what to do or where to go. The only certainty was that I had to earn some money. Gunvor, who was working at an old people's home all summer, suggested I apply for a job at a mental health institution situated between Haugesund and her home, and known to students as a place where they always needed people. Two colleagues from her department would be working there all summer, she knew, and they weren't from the district either, they would be staying in some rooms the local council used in a school.

I called up, said I had worked at a similar institution before, I had also taught in a school for a year, and the woman I spoke to said I could have a temporary post for six weeks. So in the middle of June I packed a bag and took a bus south. Gunvor was leaning against her father's car and smiling as, a few hours later, I alighted in the town center. She took off her sunglasses and we hugged.

"I've missed you so much," she said in her local dialect, stretching up to kiss me.

"I've missed you too," I said.

The houses around us were white, the sea behind us was blue, the forest on all sides green and bathed in sun. We got into the car, it was the first time she had driven me and for a moment I suffered the subordination which that entailed, she had the skills, I didn't. I was the eternal passenger. Now I was also the passenger in my girlfriend's car.

"Is it far?" I said, pushing the seat back to make room for my legs.

"Three kilometers," she said. "They're waiting for you with dinner. Are you nervous?"

"No," I said. "It'll be fine, I'm sure."

She sent me a smile before looking straight ahead again. She had so much happiness in her, expressed not only by her lips and eyes but her whole body. Even when she was concentrating on her driving, it radiated from her.

On the way she described what we could see around us. There was the school, that was where her best friend lived, there was a ski slope over there, that was where she had her first kiss. . . After some minutes she slowed down and turned into a gravel road, we drove past some fields, some big old white houses, and at the bottom of the gentle slope, by the forest, with the fjord beneath, was their house.

"Here it is!" she said. "Isn't it lovely?"

"Beautiful," I said.

She parked, we got out, I followed her to the door, which was instantly opened by a woman who must have been her mother.

"Hi, and welcome to our house," she said with a smile. I shook her outstretched hand.

"Thank you," I said.

"How nice to have you here at last!"

"It's nice to be invited," I said. "I've heard so much about this place."

"Is Dad out?" Gunvor said.

"Yes," she said. "I was thinking we'd eat when he gets back."

"Then I'll show you where you'll be sleeping," she said, and grabbed my hand. "Come on!"

We went into the hall and through the house, dark and cool, to the farthest room, where I put down my bag and looked at her. She sat down on the tightly made bed and dragged me down toward her. Before coming here she had warned me there would be no chance of us sharing a room.

"Can't you come to my room during the night?" I said. "Just sneak in?"

She shook her head.

"Not when they're in the house. But they're going early tomorrow morning. I'll come then."

When we had sat down at the table her father folded his hands and said a short prayer. Gunvor and her mother did the same. Ill at ease, I laid my hands on my lap so that no one could see whether they were folded or not and lowered my eyes as they had done.

"Amen," they said, and as if with the wave of a magic wand we were somewhere else, hands helping themselves, questions being asked and answered, food being chewed and swallowed, laughter and merriment. As always when I was with people I didn't know, I was completely open to them. The mother, who was cheerful but still scrutinizing me, the father, who was more serious and somber, clean-cut and solid, Gunvor, halfway between them and me, as uneasy about what I might be thinking about them as what they might be thinking about me. I answered the questions they asked, tried to appear polite and friendly, to give them what I imagined they wanted. If the atmosphere flagged, with a sudden lull in conversation or a facial expression I interpreted as disapproval, for instance, I poured more of myself into their silences.

After the meal we walked down to the fjord for a swim.

"Well?" Gunvor said, grabbing my hand. "Did it give you a shock when grace was said?"

"Not at all," I said. "But it was a bit unexpected. I had the feeling they belong to an earlier generation than my parents."

"They probably do too," she said. "So what do you think of them?"

"They're nice," I said. "They have very different temperaments, it seems, but they seem to be on the same wavelength, if you know what I mean."

"I think so," she said, looking at me. "It's strange having you here."

"It's strange being here, too," I said.

We brushed our teeth together in the bathroom, kissed each other goodnight, and went to our separate rooms. Outside, it had begun to rain. I lay listening to the light pitter-patter, which ceased whenever the wind gusted through the forest. From inside the living room a clock ticked, every hour a mechanism was activated and it rang its delicate chime. This was a house where everything functioned as it should and where lives were lived in an orderly manner, I thought. I understood more about Gunvor when I saw her at home. She was a student, lived her life in Bergen, but was also a part of this, she was loyal to her parents, to whom she was both close and distant. I assumed the feeling I had while I was there, that I was false and bad, that I was duping them, was alien to her nature.

The clock chimed twelve. Someone was up and in the hallway, a door was opened and closed, the toilet flushed. I liked being in other people's homes so much, I thought, I always had, although what I saw there could seem unbearable to me, perhaps because I saw things I wasn't intended to see. The personal life that was peculiar to them. The love, the helplessness that resided in that, which was usually hidden from others' eyes. Oh, trifles, trivialities, a family's habits, their exchanged glances. The vulnerability in this was so immense. Not for them, they lived inside it, and then there was no vulnerability, but when it was seen by someone who didn't belong. When I saw it I felt like an intruder, I had no right to be there. At the same time I was filled with tenderness for them.

The clock readied itself to chime again. I opened my eyes, there was no question of me being able to sleep right away. The trees outside the window were black, the darkness between them pale. It wasn't raining anymore, but the wind was still rising and falling in the forest like billowing breakers of the air.

One o'clock.

I thought about the one time I had been to the hospital in my childhood. I had broken my collarbone, it hurt so much I was crying but didn't realize anything was wrong until I complained to Mom in the evening and she drove me to see the doctor in Kokkeplassen, where she worked, a red-haired freckled young man, who said the bone was probably broken and we would have to go to the hospital to have an X-ray. After it had been done the doctor there said I could sleep in the hospital that night. There was nothing I would rather have done, it was an adventure, something to tell the others, but if I said yes perhaps Mom might think I preferred to sleep in the hospital than at home, she would be sad about that, and so I shook my head to the doctor's suggestion, said I wanted to sleep at home if that was all right. Yes, of course, he understood, wound a bandage tightly around my shoulders in a figure eight and wished me all the best as we left.

Even then I had felt I was being false, someone who carried thoughts no one else had and which no one must ever know. What emerged from this was myself, this was what was me. In other words, that which in me knew something the others didn't, that which in me I could never share with anyone else. And the loneliness, which I still felt, was something I had clung to ever since, as it was all I had. So long as I had that no one could harm me, for what they harmed then was something else. No one could take loneliness away from me. The world was a space I moved in, where anything could happen, but in the space I had inside me, which was me, everything was always the same. All my strength lay there. The only person who could find his way in was Dad, and he did too, when I was dreaming and he seemed to be in my soul and shouting at me.

For everyone else I was unreachable. Well, in my thoughts they could reach me, anyone at all could stir them up, but what were thoughts worth? What was consciousness other than the surface of the soul's ocean? Other than small, brightly colored boats, floating plastic bottles, and driftwood, waves and currents, whatever the day might bring, over a depth of several thousand meters.

Or depth was the wrong word.

What was consciousness other than the cone of light from a torch in the middle of a dark forest?

I closed my eyes and rolled over onto my side. In six or seven hours she would come to me and I longed to feel her body against mine, after holding her in my arms. It was so long since we had been together I was aching for this. If only I could sleep now, I thought, then when I awoke she would be here. But I couldn't. I slipped into a kind of semiconscious state of desire and expectation, it was absolutely unbearable, I wanted her, and I kept registering the chimes of the clock, oh, it is only two, only three, only four . . . When the door finally did open and she crawled down to me, in the enthusiastic-tentative way that was so typical of her, the sleep I rose from was so deep that everything that happened was in a dream.

We had breakfast, she behaved like her mother, washed the dishes when the meal was over, I stood in the yard smoking with a cup of coffee in my hand, she came out, sat down on the step, squinted into the sun, which was already high.

"You haven't seen me ride yet," she said. "That's a scandal, if you ask me."

"I think I just did, didn't I?" I said.

She blushed and looked down. Then she eyed me and smiled.

"That was a cheap shot, Karl Ove," she said.

"Couldn't resist it," I said.

"In fact I was serious," she said. "Come up with me now. You can even have a ride yourself if you want."

"Not on your life. But I'm happy to watch."

Half an hour later we walked up the hill, Gunvor carrying a saddle. We stopped in front of an enclosure, a Fjord pony trotted down to us, she stretched out a hand and said something, it lowered its muzzle to her hand, she patted it, fitted the saddle, swung herself up, and soon she was riding back and forth across the green pasture in the full sunshine while I watched and took pictures. Sometimes I clapped to make her laugh, there was something forced about the situation, she actually wanted to show me this, her riding a horse, but at the same time she was uncomfortable, she wasn't the type to show off, but it went well, it was a happy moment, she was beaming when she had finished and jumped down in front of me.

"You should join a circus," I said, and took a picture of her with the reins in one hand and a carrot in the other.

"You should come with me to a gymkhana one day," she said. "With Icelandic ponies. Preferably in Iceland."

"Don't let it go to your head," I said. "Be happy I came here."

"It's just a start," she said. "When I've finished with you, you'll be a real hestamadur!"

"What's that? A horseman?"

"Yes, more or less. It's a term of distinction in Iceland."

"I don't doubt it."

"I had an idea some time ago," she said. "I was thinking of doing my year abroad at the university in Reykavik. If I did would you come with me?"

"Yes."

"Would you? Seriously?"

"Yes."

In the evening she drove me to the town where I would be living for the next six weeks. We went first to the institution, which was situated just outside the town center and picked up the key for my room, then we drove down to the hall of residence, if that was what it was, which stood on a slope a few hundred meters from the quay. A room with bare plaster, a shiny linoleum floor, a bed, a cupboard, and a pine table, a kitchenette, a small toilet with a shower.

"I think I'd better be getting back now," Gunvor said, standing in the doorway with the car keys in her hand.

"Of course," I said. "See you next weekend."

We kissed fleetingly, her car started up soon afterward, the sound reverberated against the wall, disappeared down the hill, and was gone.

After I had slipped the cover on the duvet I had borrowed from them, put the sheet on the bed, clothes in the cupboard, and books on the desk, I went out for a walk, drifted down to the quay area, which apart from some teenagers' cars parked by a snack bar and a little crowd sitting around the wooden tables was empty. They had long hair, jean jackets and vests, one of them even wore wooden clogs, and they stared at me as I walked by. I stopped at the edge of the quay and looked down into the water, which, close to the harbor wall, was cold and black. Music blared from one of the cars, the door was open, I saw. "Forever Young." I walked past them again, strolled down to the little town center, which apart from a large cooperative store and a Narvesen kiosk also had a small mall, a Chinese restaurant, and a handful of shops along the main street. There wasn't a soul around, but that wasn't so surprising, it was Sunday, ten o'clock in the evening.

On the hill up to the building where I was staying I turned and stared across at my workplace-to-be, which from here was visible as dots of light in the forest, beneath a steep mountainside. I could feel I was dreading starting, not so much because of the job itself as all the people I would meet, all the situations where the counter was on zero and I would have to make a good impression.

Freshly showered, I went out the door the next morning, down the hill, through the town center, out the other side, across a river and up toward the forest, where there were around ten buildings among the trees. The sky was overcast, the air warm and still. A bus passed me and stopped by the turnaround at the end of the road, a line of people got off and made for the buildings. I followed them. Two of the patients, clearly with disabilities, stood watching us, which I could imagine them doing every morning. No one spoke; the sound of footsteps and people on the move, slowly making their way forward, surrounded by the stillness of the forest on both sides.

A large brick building came first, this was the administration block where I had picked up the key the previous evening. No one went there. We fanned out heading for the other blocks in a circle around it. Lawns, dry and discolored, had been laid between the narrow paved paths. An asphalt handball court nestled in a hollow surrounded by embankments. Scattered here and there were islets of trees, once part of the forest around them, which now began a few meters behind the various buildings.

I had no idea what lay in store for me and was nervous as I entered. I had to report to Department E, the block to the left and it was, I soon established, like the other constructions, long, made of brick and painted white, two stories. I would be working on the top one. The entrance was at the back, by a small semifull parking lot. I opened the door and went down a corridor with stairs at the end. I recognized the smell, it was the same as at Eg Hospital when I had worked there three years before and the same as at the school I had attended in the 1970s, a mixture of green soap and a faint odor reminiscent of cellars and sewage, something dark and damp and subterranean in all the assiduously maintained hygiene.

There was a bench by the wall, above it a line of hooks from which hung jackets and overalls. Two wheelchairs stood by the wall opposite, beneath the small narrow windows that had been positioned at the top of the wall, 1950s-like.

I went up the stairs, opened the door, and came into a long corridor with doors on either side. By the wall sat a man in a chair staring at me with fierce eyes. His legs were stumps, cut short at the knee, from what I could see. Otherwise he looked normal. High forehead, red hair, white freckled skin, powerful upper body. He was wearing red jogging pants and a white T-shirt with a Dole bananas logo.

"Hi!" I said.

The look he sent me was full of contempt. He put his hands on the floor, swung his lower body down between them, fell forward with his hands, swung his lower body between them again, and in this unusual but deft way he moved down the corridor.

A woman stuck her head out of the nearest door. She was probably in her midthirties, had dark curly hair and a slight overbite.

"Karl Ove?" she said.

"Yes. Hello," I said.

"Marianne," she said. "Come in here. This is where we hang out!"

I went into the little room where a man with a mustache, a perm, colorful baggy pants and an undershirt was sitting with a cup of coffee in front of him, next to a slumped podgy woman with glasses and slightly messy blond hair, wearing jeans and a denim jacket, twenty-five, more or less, also with a cup of coffee in front of her.

"Hi," said the man. "My name's Ove. This is Ellen, and that's Marianne. Marianne's finished her shift now, so it'll be us three today."

The woman called Ellen lit a cigarette.

I took off my jacket, rummaged for my tobacco pouch, and sat down.

"Have you worked here before?" Ove said.

I shook my head.

"Just copy what we do and you won't go far wrong," he said. "Isn't that right, Marianne?"

He looked up at her – she was putting on her jacket – and winked. She smiled.

"Have a nice day," she said, and went out the door.

"When you've had a smoke we'll start," Ove said.

The man without any legs came into the room, sat up at the table like a dog, and stared at Ove.

"This is Ørnulf," he told me. "Would you like a cup of coffee, Ørnulf?"

Ørnulf didn't answer; he sucked in air through clenched teeth. His eyes glowed. He smelled awful. I lit a cigarette and leaned back against the sofa. Ove placed a cup under the thermos spout and filled it in two pumps, added milk, and set the cup in front of Ørnulf, who grabbed it with both hands and drained it in three long gulps. He then put it down on the table, gave a wheezy belch, picked it up again, and held it in front of Ove imploringly.

"No, no, you've already had two," Ove said. "Now you'll have to wait for breakfast."

Ørnulf put down the cup and swung out of the room, to the wall on the opposite side of the corridor, where he sat with his hands under his stumps, staring in at us.

Couldn't he talk? Or didn't he want to?

"Breakfast's at eight," Ove said. "Then four of the residents go to the workshop. Three are left here. One of them, Are, needs care. The other two manage fine, but you have to keep an eye on them. The crew in the workshop come back here for lunch. Anything else you need to know we'll deal with as it crops up. OK?"

"Sounds good," I said.

He took a green book from the table beside him, opened it, and from the lined pages and compact writing I assumed this was where they logged their reports.

"You can have a flip through this later," he said, looking at me.

I nodded.

He didn't like me, I had noticed at once. What he said was well-meaning enough, but the friendliness in his voice was somehow forced, and something about his attitude, I didn't know whether it was his eyes or his body language, told me he had already formed an opinion about me and it didn't do me any favors.

Ellen, for her part, was indifferent.

Could she be a lesbian?

"Well," Ove said, getting to his feet. "We'd better go and wake them up. Come along so that you can meet the residents."

I followed him along the corridor. At the end on the left was the kitchen, on the right a little dining room, and inside it, a door to an office where half the wall was glass.

Ørnulf, who had followed us, stopped outside the swing doors to the kitchen.

"He always sits there until the food comes," Ove said. "Don't you, Ørnulf?"

Ørnulf grimaced, bared his teeth, and sucked in deeply, and a kind of eerie hissing sound issued.

Was that a yes?

"Ørnulf sits in his wheelchair when we go out. But inside he can move around really well. Can't you, Ørnulf?" Ove said, without looking at him. "You see the swing door to the kitchen? It's important we keep it closed when we're not in there ourselves. Have you got that?"

"Yes," I said.

"So let's start with Hans Olav. He's got his own little ward to himself in here," he said, opening the door at the end of the corridor. "He can be a bit unruly at times, if I can put it like that, that's why he lives on his own. But he's a good boy."

Inside, there was a little hall with a dining table, and in the continuing corridor, three doors. The closest was open, and at the back of the room there was a man, in his forties maybe, lying in bed masturbating. His dick was fat and limp. Ove stopped in the doorway.

"Hi, Hans Olav," he said.

"Wan!" Hans Olav said.

"No, no playing with yourself now," Ove said. "You have to get up and put on your clothes for breakfast."

"Wan, wan," said Hans Olav. He had a big flattish nose, deep furrows down his cheeks, and he was almost completely bald. His head was round, his eyes were brown, and I gave a start when I saw him, he was the spitting image of pictures I had seen of Picasso in his later years.

"This is Karl Ove," Ove said. "He's going to be working here this summer."

"Hi," I said.

"Shall I help you up?" Ove said.

Without waiting for an answer, he went over to Hans Olav, grasped one arm with both hands and hauled him into a sitting position. Annoyed, Hans Olav struck out, not aggressively, more the way you swat a fly, slowly struggled to his feet, grabbed his trousers, and pulled them on. He was taller than me, almost two meters, but seemed weak and unable to stand.

"Hans Olav has breakfast here with a member of the staff," Ove said. "I'll do it today, but tomorrow it's your turn."

"That's fine," I said.

We went back into the main ward, Hans Olav moved quickly, stooped and with a swaying gait, his fingers constantly fidgeting beneath his chin, and three times I saw one arm shoot out and hit the wall as he laughed his low chuckle. He walked past Ørnulf, keeping well clear of him, and disappeared into the ward.

Ove opened the next door, inside was an elderly man sitting on his bed and getting dressed. He wore glasses, had a gentle face and full lips, a bald pate with hair growing all the way around the side, and from his appearance and style of clothing might have been a midrange accountant or perhaps a storeman in a building warehouse or even a woodwork teacher.

"You're up already!" Ove said. "Well done, Håkon!"

The man called Håkon looked down like a bashful girl. A fine blush spread across his aging cheeks.

"Thank you," he mumbled.

In the next room sat an elderly man on the edge of his bed, maybe sixty, sixty-five, with white hair in a wreath around his otherwise bald head, tearing out pictures from a pile of magazines. On his back he had a large hump, broad and so flat at the top you could have rested a tray on it.

"How's it going, Kåre?" Ove said.

"Hoo, hoo," Kåre said, pointing out of the room.

"Yes, the food will soon be here. I'll shout when it arrives."

The rooms looked more or less like those in old people's homes, a few things belonging to the institution such as blankets and tablecloths, IKEA pictures on the walls, some personal possessions, such as framed photographs on the tables, the occasional ornament, maybe a plastic flower in a vase on the windowsill.

We walked down the corridor until everyone was woken up. Some of them were still asleep, others were awake, one of them, Egil, gave us an earful because we woke him. They were all men between forty and sixty years old, apart from one needing special care, whom Ellen looked after, he couldn't have been more than twenty-five. He stood out in other ways too, he was completely paralyzed, lay back in an enormous wheelchair, used diapers and was fed, and his eyes were utterly vacant, no personality resided in them, they were only eyes. I froze with unease when I saw that. His facial features were clean-cut and would have been handsome had it not been for his permanently open mouth and the saliva running down from the corners. Sometimes hollow grunts came from him, but as far as I could see these had no particular meaning in this context, at any rate I didn't discover one or a system.

The last room was Ørnulf's. Even though he was awake and sitting in the corridor, Ove showed me in. The room was smaller than the others. Apart from a blue mattress, not dissimilar to the one we had in gym at school, the room was completely empty. No furniture, no ornaments, no pictures, nothing. Not even bed linen or a duvet.

"Why is there no furniture in his room?" I said.

Ove looked at me as if I were stupid.

"Well, what do you imagine? He smashes everything in his path, if he's in the mood, or else he tears it into pieces. Do you understand? He might not do anything for a few days but then it all wells up."

"OK," I said.

"One rule: we never talk about the residents when they're around. However little we think they understand. We have to be their pals. Are you with me? Of course, we're the ones who are in charge but we have to be open and chummy with them."

"I see," I said, following him back into the corridor.

"I'll help them to shower and get dressed," he said. "In the meantime, could you make breakfast?"

"Right," I said. "What do they have?"

"Bread and stuff, that's all. And coffee. They love coffee as you might have figured out."

"OK," I said, and went into the kitchen. It was a relief to do something specific and mechanical, which didn't involve the residents. Everything I had seen of them filled me with disgust.

I opened the fridge and took out anything you could put on bread. Cut up a few tomatoes, some slices of cucumber and strips of a pepper, and laid it all out on a dish, spread some salami and ham on another, put a mild white cheese and a brown cheese on a third. I kept myself busy, wanting to make a good impression for the others who worked there. Switched on the coffee machine, took out milk and juice, set the two tables. One of the residents came out of his room in just his underpants, he was athletic and had a serious, masculine face, at first glance he appeared to be a magnificent human specimen, but then there was something about the way he walked, balancing on the outer edge of the balls of his feet somehow, and you realized everything was not quite as it should be. He stopped by the doorsill to the bathroom, stepped over, stepped back, stepped over, stepped back, and I had a feeling he would have kept going all day if Ove hadn't come, put an arm around his shoulders, and taken him in. Håkon, the bashful one, waddled down the corridor, his back was crooked. Egil came with his head bent right back and his gaze directed at the ceiling the whole way to the table. Hans Olav stood still by the wall with his fingers formed into a quivering ball beneath his chin. Ørnulf sat as he had sat for the last half an hour, with his hands under his stumps. He kept drawing in air sharply between his teeth. Perhaps hyperventilating gave him a kick.

I poured coffee into a pump-action jug and stood it on the table. Sliced a loaf, searched for a toaster, but they didn't appear to have one. Cast a glance through the window, a group of residents was coming across the gray asphalt, most seemed to be in their forties, and among them were two caregivers in conversation, one with a lit cigarette in his hand. The sky above them was light but sunless.

Ove took a tray of food into Hans Olav's room, Ellen shouted that breakfast was ready, we sat down at our respective tables, and the residents made their way along the corridor. The athletic man, whose name was Alf, was now walking with some strange robotic jerks. Right behind him came Håkon, the girlish-looking older man, with an apologetic nervous smile on his lips. Kåre, the hair-wreath man with the magazines walked bent forward with the hump on his shoulders like a sack and he kept shaking one hand back and forth in the air, just under his face.

"And where are you from?" Egil said, leaning forward and staring right into my face.

"Arendal," I said.

"And how old are you?"

"Twenty-one."

"And what kind of car do you drive?"

"I'm afraid I don't have a car."

"And why not? Why don't you have a car? Eh?"

"Now don't pester him, Egil," Ellen said.

Egil sat back instantly.

"No," he said. "No, I won't. No, no, no."

He looked up at the ceiling for a while, then began to eat. The whole time he was breathing heavily and when he had food in his mouth it was like sitting next to a small steam engine. His shirt hung outside his trousers, on top he wore a red pullover, slightly stained, and his hair, which was thick and curly, stood up at the back. His cheeks were reddish, perhaps because of some burst blood vessels, and his eyes were bloodshot too. He made a confused absent-minded impression and reminded me of a scientist or a gymnas teacher who had lived alone for too long and perhaps thought he hadn't had all the success he felt was his due but actually enjoyed teaching and therefore couldn't give a damn about his appearance. Egil was like that. But added to this were the sudden lunges he made, a hand shot into the air and waved as though he had suddenly caught sight of a colleague down the corridor, or he might jerk forward so abruptly that everyone around him recoiled. Then there was this staring at the ceiling.

He could also burst into laughter for no apparent reason.

"Ha, ha, ha, ha!" he might go, as if he had heard a joke and wanted to reward whoever had told it.

"And do you have a girlfriend?" he said.

"Yes," I said.

"And what's her name?"

"Gunvor."

"And is she nice?"

"Egil," Ellen said.

"And are you going for a swim today?" he said, looking at her.

"No," she said.

"Why not?" he said.

"The weather's not so good today," she said.

"Why?" he said with a heavy sigh, and sank back into his chair. All his questions had been mechanical, without a trace of any curiosity in his voice. He was like a child who has learned something off by heart but without understanding what it meant.

"Was that good, Håkon?" Ellen said.

"Yes," Håkon mumbled from a lowered chin. "Thank you very much. Thank you very much."

Ellen was sitting beside Are, feeding him. He half lay in his chair with his mouth open. Porridge trickled down from the corners. Kåre often emitted tiny sounds, he obviously couldn't speak, but he communicated with sounds, gestures, and looks. Ørnulf sat rocking in his chair baring his teeth and staring at me.

"Are we friends?" Egil said. "Us two. Are we friends?"

What was I supposed to say to that? We obviously weren't friends. But to say no might create a terrible agitation in him.

"Yes, we are, aren't we?" I said.

"Then you can come and see my pictures of the king," he said.

"OK, I'd like that," I said.

"Good," he said. "That's a deal."

The door to the corridor opened and Hans Olav ran out. He looked behind him with a laugh, his hands under his chin, his mouth in constant motion, at full speed down the corridor, staggering beneath his heavy body. Ove set off after him with a tray in his hands. The similarity with Picasso was disturbing, it upset the whole balance of the world, I thought. But the others didn't seem bothered and I supposed I would probably get used to it, given time.

"If you clear up after us, Karl Ove, I'll take the boys to the workshop."

I nodded.

The four who were going to work got up and went to their rooms. Ørnulf swung down from his chair and occupied his customary position in the corridor. Ellen wiped Are's mouth and trundled him into his room. I put the food into the fridge, the plates and glasses into the dishwasher, wiped the tables clean with a cloth, and swept the floor with a dustpan and brush.

After finishing I went to see Ellen. She was washing Are, he was lying naked on the bed, rigid and white, she ran the cloth over him while making small talk. There we are, she said, it's important to wash down here, you know. Now I'll pour a bit more water over you, it's nice and warm.

He stared at the ceiling with vacant eyes.

"Is there anything I can do?" I said.

She peered at me through her thick lenses.

"Nope," she said. "Sit down and have a cup of coffee while you're waiting. He's had constipation for a few days now, so I was thinking of administering an enema later. You could give me a hand with that."

"OK," I said.

"Otherwise you could go for a walk with Ørnulf this morning. Just round and about."

I nodded, she wrung the cloth and continued washing Are.

On one thigh and buttock he had a large scarred area.

"What's that?" I said. "Is it a birthmark or what?"

She shook her head.

"It's a burn. Someone left him in front of a heater. Happened many years ago now."

"Is that true?"

"Unfortunately. He can't move, you know. And he never says anything. So he just lies there."

"How awful," I said.

"Yes," she said. "But it's a long time ago. His unit is closed down now. He's got his own apartment, the new reform, you know. But until it's fully finished he's here with us. Aren't you, Are?"

Not a single expression crossed his face as she talked. I hung around so as not to seem unsympathetic, then I went into the lounge and poured myself a coffee. From the corridor I heard the sound of hands smacking and clothes rubbing against the floor. It was Ørnulf, he stopped by the table and sent me an imploring look. It must have been the sound of the coffee jug that had spurred him into action.

"Do you want some coffee?" I said.

Without batting an eyelid, he took a cup and raised it toward me.

"You had a cup for breakfast," I said. "That'll have to do."

I started rolling a cigarette. For a long time he sat in exactly the same position with his cup held out. Then, as if a spell had been broken, as though the hundred-year sleep was over, he suddenly swung down and began to hyperventilate.

"I think it's best if you sit in the corridor," I said. "Then we two can go for a walk afterward."

Was that contempt in his eyes?

At any rate he didn't budge.

I ran my tongue over the glue, stuck the edge to the paper, put the cigarette in my mouth, and lit up. A protruding flake of tobacco burned up at once and fell glowing to the floor, the rest caught the next moment and I inhaled a cloud of smoke into my lungs as I looked out the window in the balcony door. A group of three caregivers, each pushing a wheelchair, was coming toward us. A car parked in front of the admin building at the other end. From the floor beneath came a protracted roar, a sound that was hard to associate with anything human, while Ørnulf sucked and hissed only half a meter away from me.

I turned back toward him.

He immediately took the cup and held it up to me, begging.

"No," I said.

He continued to hold it outstretched, another hundred-year sleep.

"Do you want some coffee, Ørnulf?" Ellen said as she came in the door. "Here, I'll give you some."

She took his cup, filled it with equal parts of coffee and milk, he gulped it down and then dragged himself out of the room and across the corridor. Ellen sighed and sat down on the sofa on the other side of the table, lit a cigarette, and closed her eyes.

I sorted through the residents in my head. There were seven in the ward. Four of them looked more or less normal, and of those two could speak. Two were badly deformed, but could move, one was a vegetable. By mentally handicapped I had imagined some Down syndrome residents and some vegetables. I hadn't known that every shade in between existed, but of course it was obvious and had been no surprise to me once I had seen them.

Hans Olav and Ove came walking along the road.

"Where's Are now?" I said.

"He's in bed in his room," Ellen said. "I'll get him up soon and we'll go for a walk."

"Is he asleep?"

"No, no. He just lounges around in bed."

The roars from the ground floor resounded again. From the corridor I could hear Ørnulf's hissing. Otherwise there was silence. I was dreading the walk with Ørnulf. It would be the first time I had been alone with one of them and I knew nothing about how to behave, what I would say to him, what might happen. What would I do if he wanted to go to the bathroom? Could he go himself or did he need help? Should I lift him into the wheelchair or could he manage by himself? Could he get dressed? Should I push the wheelchair? Where would we go? He couldn't talk, what if I didn't understand what he wanted?

On top of all that, I was afraid. The look he sent me was filled with hatred, and his room had no furniture or objects, only a mattress, because he either smashed everything that came into his path or tore it to pieces, as Ove had said.

What would I do if he had a similar fit when we were outside? Would I be able to stop him? And what if he attacked me? Of course he didn't have any legs, but his biceps were strong.

The door in the corridor banged open. The next moment Hans Olav trotted past, bent forward, his hands fidgeting under his chin. Ove, who was following, stopped in the doorway.

"I'll stay with him for a while," he said. "Then perhaps he'll sleep."

I got up, it was probably best to see to Ørnulf. I watched Ove walking down the corridor, quite small but so powerful that his arms couldn't quite rest against his body, they always stuck out, which meant he walked with a little wiggle. He must spend a lot of time training, I thought.

Ørnulf was squatting in his room, facing the wall.

"Hi, Ørnulf," I said. "Up for a walk?"

Without looking at me he turned and shot out to the door in the corridor, which he opened with a stretch. The steps he took one arm at a time, like a kind of large insect, also deftly and at speed. By the time I reached the end of the corridor he was sitting with his arms around his legs beside the wheelchair.

I hated this.

I looked for his name above the hooks, found it, took a jacket.

"You'll have to wear a jacket," I said. "Shall I help you?"

He didn't react, his face was blank, there was nothing to tell me what he was thinking.

I leaned down and carefully took his arm to insert it in the sleeve. He yanked it away.

"If we're going for a walk you'll have to wear a jacket," I said. "Otherwise there's no walk."

He didn't move.

"OK," I said. "Let's go back up."

I started to walk. I turned, he was sitting in the same position. Went up the stairs, stopped to listen whether he was following, nothing.

Ellen looked up at me from the sofa.

"I can't put his jacket on," I said. "He doesn't want it."

"Does he need to wear a jacket? It's quite warm outside."

"OK," I said. "Is there anything else I ought to know?"

She shook her head, I hurried back down, for all I knew he could have taken advantage of the short time I had left him alone to escape.

But he was sitting beside the wheelchair, arms around his short legs and chin resting on his chest.

"Shall we go then?" I said.

He clambered up onto the chair, turned the wheels with seasoned dexterity, rolled down to the door and glanced up at me. The moment I opened the door, he set off at a furious pace. I had to walk as fast as I could to stay with him. He had found a rhythm, moving along with quick regular thrusts, hands on the wheels, off, on, off. We passed the admin building. Farther ahead, a group was walking toward us, I saw at once it was two workers and four residents, their body movements were unmistakable.

The two workers looked at me.

"Hi," I said.

"Hi," they said. "Hi, Ørnulf."

He ignored them, and soon we had put them and all the buildings far behind us. His face had stiffened into a sort of grimace with bared teeth. It was red with the exertion. Deciduous trees lined the road, dense and green, occasional spruces towered up, heavier and darker. Ahead of us was the main road, alongside it ran a cycle path, which I had decided we would follow.

Ørnulf didn't want to. He pointed to the left, where the road looped around a little housing project. I couldn't let him rule me totally, I thought, and grabbed the handles of the wheelchair and began to push. He tried to brake me with his hands. His eyes were panic-stricken. What an idiot he was.

"It's no good protesting," I said. "We're going this way."

He jumped off and headed up toward the end of the road under his own steam. This was very dangerous, he was crossing the main road, not much taller than a dog, if a car came this could end really badly, I ran after him with the wheelchair, shouting for him to get back on.

He stopped on the other side and stared at me. Dragging his legs over asphalt didn't seem to affect him.

I placed the wheelchair in front of him. He swung himself up. I wasn't going to give in and pushed him down the slope. He jumped off again and went the other way, his palms on the asphalt, his lower torso swinging between his arms. I followed, but now he wouldn't get back onto the chair, now he was moving on his own, and that was how we entered the housing estate, him on the ground, which was dry and covered with sand and gravel, staring straight ahead, me walking behind pushing the wheelchair. This was no good, if anyone met us now I would be given the boot, but I was fuming with anger, couldn't he just sit on the chair and do as I wanted? What was it about this estate that was so incredibly important for him? It was just stupid, I was his caregiver, we were out on a morning walk, one route was as good as another, and if it wasn't, it definitely wasn't worth sacrificing the comfortable wheelchair for.

I ran a few steps, overtook him, and placed the chair in his path. He turned and tried to get past, I moved, he grabbed a wheel and tried to shove it away.

"We're going this way," I said. "I'm telling you. This way. Sit up on your wheelchair and then we can go."

He dragged himself up, and when he was in position his hands began to turn the wheels at a furious pace again. I walked beside him through the estate, which consisted of relatively new houses with gardens that were not yet established. A bus stopped in the road, a couple of passengers got out and started walking. We reached the crossroads and Ørnulf, who had been frenetically pumping his arms, suddenly stopped.

"Shall I push you?" I said.

He didn't react to my question, so it was impossible to read an answer from his face, but when I grabbed the handles and pushed he didn't object. I walked as quickly as I could and soon we were back near the institution.

As we passed the admin building he suddenly jumped down from the wheelchair and sat on the ground, a few meters from the steps to the main entrance.

"You can't sit here," I said. "Come on now. The unit's over there!"

He didn't look at me, he ignored me, his arms firmly planted on the ground, hyperventilating.

"Don't you want to go back to the ward, is that it?" I said.

No reaction.

I tried to lift him, but he held the chair so firmly that it was impossible.

"Do you want to sit here? While the others are having a nice time drinking coffee?"

No reaction.

"Fine by me," I said. "I get paid the same money anyway. I can stand here, no problem."

I took shelter under the projecting roof and lit a cigarette, but after a couple of minutes I realized this didn't look very good, a resident in the road, his caregiver ten meters away, smoking, so I stubbed out the cigarette and went back to him.

"Come on now," I said. "You've made your point. You don't need to be belligerent anymore. Jump up and we'll be off."

No reaction.

Hands around his knees, a grin on his lips, sucking through his teeth.

"Alright, alright," I said. "As you wish."

I folded my arms and scanned the area trying to find a way out of the situation I found myself in. He might be defiant and strong-willed, but he had met his match in me. I could stay there until darkness fell, I could stay there all night and into the next day if I had to. The trick was to think about something else. Not about him or time dragging.

But it was hard, there was something about him, the aggression I could feel in him, his presence cast a shadow over my thoughts. He couldn't have much in his head, almost all his movements were conditioned by reflex, such as when he rushed in after hearing the sound of the pump-action coffee jug and mechanically held out a cup. He didn't enjoy the taste of the coffee, drinking it was just something that had to be done, something that had to be expedited, something that had to happen. If it did he would want it to happen again. Outside, there was only one route that counted. Not the walk as such, because then he could equally well have taken the other route.

I looked down at him. I disliked him intensely, everything about him, but especially his doglike traits and his stupidity. He was the one losing out, not me. I was paid a wage, it made no difference to me whether we sat here or up a tree, I was ready for anything.

He met my eyes for an instant and when he looked back down he smiled.

It was the first time I had seen him smile.

He really thought he was punishing me. That it was him who had the whip hand.

I walked away and sat down on a curb in the parking lot. There was something crablike about the way he moved, the lightning-quick pendulum movement across the ground or floor. What I found confusing was that his face, if you could forget about the rest, was completely normal. A red-haired freckled man in his late forties. Had it been the case that he was only misshapen, that he was only deformed, I wouldn't have reacted in the same way. But the fact was his thoughts were obviously also deformed and misshapen. His soul was also crippled. What did that make him?

Oh, sweet Jesus.

Here he was, the lowest of the low, the weakest of the weak, and there I was, filled with contempt for him.

It was me who was the monster. But I couldn't help myself. His stupidity infuriated me, sitting there, not wanting to go anywhere, thinking he was punishing me, the sweat running down his forehead and breathing in and out through his clenched yellow teeth.

The cloud cover had slowly and, almost imperceptibly, cleared. The sun shining on us now came from a pale blue sky. Vehicles in the parking lot were opened and started, they drove down the road, others arrived, were parked, engines were switched off, doors opened. Everyone saw us sitting there, no one said anything. I had no idea whether this was normal or not, whether it was just me or it happened to Ørnulf's caregivers every day.

"Get up now and we'll go," I said every so often. He didn't react. If I walked toward him he would grab the wheelchair so tightly that I couldn't lift him into it.

He sat there for an hour and a half. Then Ellen came along, pushing Are, she had given him some sunglasses to wear. They stopped beside us.

"It's lunchtime," she said. "Come on, Ørnulf, up onto your chair!"

Ørnulf jumped up onto the chair, sat with his hands in his lap. Was I supposed to push him now?

Yes, apparently I was.

Walking alongside Ellen, I pushed the wheelchair back. The air was warm, the sunshine boiling hot. I hated myself and the whole of my being.

Sleep came that night, empty and meaningless, for a long time I was merely a body with a slow beating heart and slow respiration which, together with the blood circulating, kept it alive, no more than that, until the dreams began to emerge, these flickerings of atmosphere and images that rule the brain when we are asleep and which for me were always the same, I was alone, I had my back to the wall, I was terrified or humiliated. There were people laughing at me, there were people after me, and above them all, in his many and various forms and guises, loomed Dad. In my most common nightmares we were still living in Tybakken and he was in the house with me, but in the worst ones of all he came back while I was visiting Mom and it turned out he lived there, because at Mom's I took liberties, I did as I wanted, and if there was one thing that enraged him it was that.

Every morning a feeling of humiliation sat deep in my body, that was how I started the day, and if it gradually dissolved as routines anchored me in another world, the real world, the feeling of being humiliated and debased was a continuous presence, and it took nothing, nothing, for it to flare up again and burn through me, yes, burn up the whole of my miserable self.

That morning I woke up half an hour before the alarm clock went off, dreaming I was dead, and the relief when I came to and discovered I wasn't was so great that I let out a chuckle.

I got out of bed, ate a piece of bread, dressed, locked the door, and walked toward the institution again.

Ørnulf was sitting by the wall with his arms around his legs rocking back and forth when I opened the door. He sent me a fleeting glance, lowered his eyes again, utterly indifferent. In the lounge Ellen was with another girl my age. She stood up and shook my hand. Her name was Irene, she said. She was tall and slim, had short blond hair, blue eyes, high cheekbones. She was beautiful in that cool way I had always found myself drawn toward. Her presence there complicated everything, I knew that as soon as I sat down and poured myself a cup of coffee. I would be aware of her at all times, and therefore of myself, of how I appeared in her eyes.

She suggested that she attend to Ørnulf, Ellen attend to Are, and I attend to Hans Olav. That meant I would have breakfast with him, relax a little afterward, clean his "apartment," and then perhaps be with him in the ward until midday, unless he wanted to sleep instead. He seemed to sleep a lot.

I buttered some slices of bread for him, some for me, poured juice into two glasses and coffee into two cups, one of which was half milk, and carried everything in on a tray, placed it on his dining table, closed the door to the main ward, knocked on his bedroom door, and went in.

He was lying in bed and pulling at his dick, which was flaccid.

"Hi, Hans Olav," I said. "Time to get up. I've brought you some breakfast!"

He looked at me while continuing to jerk off.

"I'll wait a bit then," I said. "Get up when you're ready!"

I closed the door and sat down on the chair at the table, which was positioned next to the entrance to a little balcony. It was gray and worn and the paint was peeling, and beneath it was the handball court; behind it, beyond the embankment, were several buildings identical to the one I was sitting in. Behind and between them, pines and isolated deciduous trees.

Some residents came walking toward us and slightly behind them two women, both pushing a wheelchair. I got up and walked round. In the living room there was a Monet picture, the kind you can buy framed in big chain stores. The furniture was made of pine and consisted of a large red-patterned sofa, a low coffee table with turned feet, and a bookcase. The shelves of the bookcase were empty, apart from an ornamental dog, a small candlestick, and a glass tea light. The room was decorated to look like home, but of course it didn't.

I knocked on the bedroom door and opened it again. He was lying as before.

"You've got to come now," I said. "I've got breakfast for you. Your coffee's getting cold!"

I stood beside him.

"Come on now, Hans Olav. You can do that afterward."

He waved me away with one hand.

I put a hand on his shoulder.

He screamed, a loud rasping scream, I took fright and stepped back.

But I couldn't give in, I had to show him who was boss, if not I would have problems later, so I took his arm and tried to pull him up. While he tried to get rid of me with one hand he kept at it with the other.

"OK," I said. "Shall I take your breakfast back? Is that what you want?"

He screamed again, an equally hoarse rasping scream, but swung his legs down, supported himself with his hands on the mattress and slowly and stiffly pushed himself into a standing position. As he stood up his trousers fell down. He pulled them up and started to walk out of the room, holding them up with one hand. He sat down on his chair and drank his coffee in one swig. I ate my bread and tried to act as if nothing had happened while my heart was hammering behind my ribs and all my senses were focused on him. With one sweeping movement of his hand he sent the glass of juice, the empty coffee cup, and the plate of bread flying to the ground. It was all plastic, Irene had made sure of that, and didn't break.

"What are you doing?" I said. "You shouldn't do that!"

He stood up. Then he grabbed hold of the table, hoisted it onto the two far legs and pushed it over.

I didn't know what to do. I was terrified of him, perhaps he had noticed. Fortunately he left the room at once, into the adjacent toilet, and I put the table back and was picking up the food when the ward door opened and Irene poked her head around.

"Having problems?" she said.

"He tipped up the table," I said.

"Do you want me to take over?"

"No," I said, although that was exactly what I wanted. "It'll be fine. We just have to get used to each other. It probably takes a bit of time."

"OK," she said. "If you need anything we're here. He isn't dangerous, you know. Imagine he's really a one-year-old!"

She closed the door, I put the last slice of bread on his plate and went to find something to wipe up the pool of yellow juice.

He was standing by the little window in the bathroom peering out when I went in.

"I'll just have to get something to wipe up with," I said. Suddenly he wasn't aware of me, but I didn't care so long as he left me in peace.

I would have to wash the floors in the morning anyway, might as well do it now, I thought, ran water into the red bucket, added a dash of green soap, took a cloth and scrubbing brush, set about cleaning the living room, then the hall, the bedroom and the little kitchenette. While I was busy doing this he approached, stood a few meters away and watched me. After a while he came closer, carefully poked the bucket with his foot, as if to tell me he could kick it over if he wanted.

He laughed his gurgling laugh and was suddenly overcome with a sense of purpose, he quickly left the room laughing out loud as he fidgeted beneath his chin. When I went into his room with the bucket and brush he was lying on his bed playing with himself again, with an equally flaccid dick.

"Wan! Wan!" he said.

I ignored him, finished cleaning up, hung the cloth over the rim of the bucket, and slumped down in the living room. I was tired and closed my eyes, ready to jump to my feet if a door opened or a sound came from him.

I sat there for half an hour and slept. When I awoke the food was gone and Hans Olav was back in bed.

I stood in front of the window in the little room looking out. There was a small mountain crag, bare in some places, covered with grass and bushes and thicket in others. The forest stretched up high behind.

From inside the room, the bed creaked, I heard him mumbling something to himself and I went in. He was on the floor, still holding his trousers up with his hand, as he had done all morning.

"Shall we go for a walk, Hans Olav?" I said. "A bit of fresh air would be good, wouldn't it?"

He looked at me.

"Shall I do up your trousers?"

No reaction.

I walked over to him, leaned forward, and held the waistband of his trousers, he at once poked two fingers at my face, one went in my eye, it swelled with pain.

"Hey! Cut that out!" I shouted.

At first I couldn't see a thing, only darkness filled with luminous dots, but after a few seconds my eye started working again. I stood there blinking, he went into the hall and banged on the door to the main ward with both fists.

He obviously didn't like me and now he wanted to be with the others or have me changed. But it takes two to tango.

"Come on," I said. "Let's go outside. Get your jacket on and we can go."

He continued banging. Then he turned to me, but instead of going for me, which I had expected, and perhaps trying to poke out my eyes again, he walked around me and into his room.

"Now you come here!" I shouted. "Come on. Do you hear me!"

He lay down on the bed, but his eyes seemed nervous and I took his hand and pulled as hard as I could to get him on his feet. Although he didn't offer any resistance, in fact he tried to meet my attempts halfway, he slid off the bed to the floor, slowly, like a boat listing.

This was hell.

He lay on his side with tears in his eyes. He tried to push himself up with one hand, all I could do was watch, hoping no one would choose this precise moment to come in. Once he was in a sitting position I took his hands again and he, no longer struggling, pushed off with his legs and was finally upright.

He looked at me and hissed, not unlike a cat, and then he slunk into the hall. I went in and sat down on the chair in the living room. Listened to him shuffling around.

It was ten minutes to nine.

Something fell to the floor, I hurried out, it was the plate and cup. He was standing and pissing in the corner.

I said nothing, fetched the cloth and bucket, put on gloves and wiped it up. He seemed less stressed, paced back and forth around me as I worked.

"Shall we go for a walk?" I said.

He went over and took his jacket, stuffed his feet in his large shoes. He couldn't manage the zip, I moved toward him, he twisted away, opened the door to the corridor, and with small, cautious tripping movements he walked down the steps and waited for me by the front door. I opened it and we were outside. He stayed ten strides ahead of me as we walked. After a few minutes he turned, I tried to make him go on, but he said no! no! and we walked back, up to his room, he lay down on the bed and started jerking off. I sat down on the chair. Not even a third of the day had gone.

Life in the institution was not only different from outside, time was too. Standing by the window and looking into the forest, I knew that if I had been there, sitting under a tree and looking over at these buildings, time would have been barely noticeable, I would have drifted as lightly through the day as the clouds across the sky, whereas inside the institution and looking out, time was much heavier, almost claylike, as though here it met obstacles and was always being forced to take detours, like a river traversing a plain before joining the sea, one might imagine, winding its way in countless labyrinthine, meandering bends.

When my shift was finally over it always came as a surprise and was an experience I used to help me endure the strain: everything passes. On the way to work in the morning I dreaded it, but now it was over and at this point, free again, it was as though the interim didn't exist, had never existed, it was quite palpably gone.

It was no surprise that time went more slowly there, it was a place where nothing was supposed to happen, where no progress was possible, you noticed that as soon as you entered, this was storage, a warehouse for unwanted people, and the notion was so awful that you did whatever was in your power to act as if this were not the case. The residents had their own rooms with their own possessions, which were identical to the rooms and possessions of people outside, they had meals together with their wardmates and caregivers, which was supposed to represent their family, and every day they went to "work." What they created there had no intrinsic value, the value lay in the fact that the work gave their lives a semblance of the meaning lives outside had. And it was the same with everything in their world. What they were surrounded by looked like something, and it was in that outward semblance that its value lay. This became clearest to me on the first Friday when I was doing the afternoon shift and the whole ward was going to a "disco" after dinner. It was to take place in a function hall in the district, a large room with tables and chairs in one half and a dance floor in the other. The lighting was muted, the windows were covered with curtains. Pop music blared out of the speakers, some Down syndrome residents moved back and forth on the dance floor. The place was full of wheelchairs everywhere, gaping mouths, rolling eyes. The residents of my ward sat around a table by the windows, each with a Coke. I sat beside Ellen, who every so often sent me tired looks. Egil was wearing a creased white shirt with ketchup stains on the front. His hair stood on end. He stared up at the ceiling as his mouth moved. Håkon sipped cautiously at his soft drink. Alf stared somberly down at the table. Next to us a caregiver stood up and pushed a resident in a wheelchair onto the floor, jiggled him to and fro in time to the music. His mouth hung open and emitted hollow happy noises as he drooled. The other caregivers at the tables were smoking and chatting about their own lives, from what I could see. Now and then they shouted, no, don't do that, or, sit still, or, you know what we say about that. Hans Olav was standing in the corner with his Picasso face, screwing and unscrewing a wall lamp. This was deeply disturbing. Disturbing because all these misshapen bodies and crippled souls who had been trundled into the discotheque – the most important space for youth culture, created for dreams about romantic love, charged with the future and potential – didn't experience any dreams, any yearnings, any electric charges, all they saw was hot dogs and soft drinks. And the music, which was meant to fill the body with joy and happiness, was only noise. When they danced it was just movements and when they smiled it was because it was a charade, now they were doing what normal people did. Everything was like the world as it was, but all the meaning had been stripped from it, and what was left was a parody, a travesty, grotesque and painful.

"They've got coffee over there if you want some," Ellen said.

"Thanks," I said, and went to the table with the thermos, pumped myself a cup, watched the happy Down syndrome patients, who must have been in their forties. It was hard to watch them, their faces were always young, had a youthful shape, didn't seem to get older, except for the wrinkles that spread across them and made them look like children suffering from progeria.

I sat back down with the residents from my ward, lit a cigarette, glanced at Hans Olav, who had now started ripping down the curtains.

Alf looked up and stared into my eyes. My spine froze. It was as though he knew all about me, he knew my innermost thoughts and hated me from the bottom of his heart.

"Hans Olav!" Ellen shouted, and stood up. Alf stared back down at the table. Ellen stopped in front of Hans Olav, he lowered his eyes to the floor as she spoke to him. Suddenly he glanced to the side and walked off as though he hadn't noticed Ellen at all or that they were in conversation. Kåre, bent beneath his hump, which it was difficult to believe was part of him, moved to another table. The caregivers there welcomed him, he ignored them, lowered his head and shook his hand close to his ear, the way you do with a tin to hear if there is anything inside. Irene and Ørnulf came in through the door. I was relieved when I saw her, in some way or other she had an effect on me. We had chatted in the breaks during the past few days, she had asked me what had made me apply for a job here as I neither came from the area nor lived here, I had said my girlfriend lived nearby, she asked what her name was, I told her. Gunvor! she said. We went to gymnas together! This information made me feel uncomfortable, I had been looking at her and thinking about her, nothing she noticed, I hoped, but you never knew with such matters. It made me feel I had been unfaithful. I had betrayed Gunvor. I had glanced at her when she was putting on a clean sheet and a duvet cover in one of the rooms, the old ones were in a pile in the corridor, outside each and every door, all the way down. A fleeting glance was no crime, after all we worked in the same ward, but the thoughts were there, I liked her a little too much. Or when she pushed the food trolley to the tables and began to set them and met my gaze and sent me an ingenuous professional smile, absolutely uninterested in me as anything except a colleague. That was also humiliating. So there I was, caught between two minor humiliations: on the one hand, I liked her too much given the fact that I was going out with Gunvor, and on the other, she was completely uninterested in me or who I was. Of course, I kept all this hidden, I did nothing, said nothing, behaved appropriately in all ways, indeed I was discouraging rather than encouraging, whatever took place was unseen to anyone except myself, and so it didn't really exist, did it?

She went to get a Coke and hot dog for Ørnulf, who immediately leaned over and sucked at the yellow straw. When he thought there wasn't enough coming out he yanked it out and threw it on the floor, put the bottle to his mouth, and drained it in one long swig.

She looked at me and smiled sweetly.

"What are you doing this weekend?" she said.

"I'm going to Gunvor's, I imagine. She's picking me up after work."

"Say hi from me."

"I will. And you?"

"Well, I'll probably go to Stavanger. Or I'll stay here. Depends on the weather."

"Doesn't look too good," I said, because it was raining and had been all day.

"No," she said.

The Beach Boys' "Good Vibrations" came on. The Down syndrome residents waggled from side to side, some with a smile on their faces, others in deep concentration. Roars and groans from all sides. Ellen wiped Are's dribble, he sat with his mouth agape staring at the ceiling.

"Lovely summer music," Irene said.

"Mm," I said.

The mist hung over the trees, the rain was heavy and pummeled the ground, which glinted in the light from windows and lamps. I stood outside the admin building waiting for Gunvor, who was coming to pick me up. The evening sky was gray and shambling, seeming to sink into the countryside. It was beautiful. The pavement was damp, the grass was damp, the trees were damp, and their greenery muted the gray but was still strong and bright. The forest of twisted limbs and disordered minds. With the lights from the windows and the silence among the trees it was as disturbing a place as it was appealing. Everything aroused ambivalence, nothing was clear cut: if all the routines and the slow rhythm in which everything happened occasionally caused me to collapse into a semi-apathetic tedium, it was still always mentally agonizing to be there as well. It was as though I was running and sitting still at the same time, my breathing was accelerated and my heart hammered wildly while the rest of my body was motionless. I wanted to be a good person, full of empathy for those worse off than me, but if they came too close, what I felt for them was contempt or anger, as if their deficiencies touched something deeper inside me.

When Gunvor and I stepped out onto the driveway in front of their house after the long car journey I still had the institution in my body, standing in me like stagnant marsh water. Any feelings I had were colored by it, even when I filled my lungs with pure clean air. Her parents had gone to bed, we had supper alone in the kitchen, she made some tea, we sat in the sitting room and chatted for a long time, kissed each other goodnight and went to bed in separate rooms, though not without a few quips about it. I felt like I was in a fin-de-siècle novel when I was there, the young couple living in a morality different from their own, surrounded by prohibition, denial, nonlife, while we were in the midst of pulsating life, full of repressed desires which occasionally forced their way to the surface. I liked that feeling, it was the most romantic feeling I could imagine.

The next morning I borrowed some boots and waterproofs, went onto the slippery quay with Gunvor and her brother, got into a boat, which measured fourteen, perhaps sixteen, feet, and sat on the front thwart while Gunvor's brother pulled the starter rope of the outboard motor and slowly reversed until he could turn and accelerate. The rain was pelting down. The forest on the shore stood like a green wall to the completely flat light-gray surface of the water, the prow plowed through it, converting it into swirls of white, with some almost transparent, almost glasslike layers below, and I had a distinct sense of depth, of being on the surface of an immense depth, which was reinforced when we stopped by the fishing net and the boat was rolling on its own waves and the net was drawn closer and closer together, then the spine of a fish appeared far below. It swam round and round, came higher and higher, and it was enormous. It was as big as a child and as shiny as silver. It came higher and higher and when at last it lay in the boat and Gunvor's brother hit it repeatedly on the head with a wooden mallet, the resistance it put up was so great he had to sit astraddle it while we did what we could to hold it down. The power in its slender body was frightening.

On the way home, as it lay still between our feet, with only the occasional twitch running through it, inside my head I had the image of it rising through the water. It was as though it came from another era than ours, up and up it came from the depths of time, a beast, a monster, an ur-force, yet there was something so clear and simple about it. Just water, the glint of silver in the depths, the immense power it possessed, surging through it in its dying throes.

The rain beating down now on the dead fish and coursing down its scales and perfectly white belly.

Gunvor was on the evening shift that Sunday, so I caught the bus early in the afternoon and arrived at my accommodation block at about five. I had thought I might be able to do some writing in the hours before I went to bed, but gave up after thirty minutes, nothing new could be activated in such an alien place as this, it seemed to me. Instead I went for a walk down to the town center, followed a whim and entered a Chinese restaurant, had a meal there, alone in a room full of families eating their Sunday dinner. Afterward I lay on my bed reading a novel by V. S. Naipaul I had found on sale a few days earlier, it had been in a box outside the bookshop and was called The Enigma of Arrival. I liked it even though there was no plot, just a description of a man who has moved to a house in a remote village in England, everything is alien to him, but slowly he conquers the countryside, or the countryside conquers him. It struck me that you could find rest in the prose, the way you can rest under a tree or in a chair in the garden, and that had a value in itself. Why actually should you write about actions? X loves Y, Z kills W, F commits embezzlement and is caught by G. . . . His son A is deeply ashamed and moves to another town where he meets B, they live together and have two children, C and D . . . What was the description of a father compared with that of a tree in a meadow? The description of a childhood compared with that of a forest seen from above?

If only I were able to describe a forest seen from above! The openness and freedom of deciduous trees, the way their crowns rippled as one, seen from a distance, green and magnificent and alive, though not alive in our way, no, alive in their own simple, secretive way. The sheerness and verticality of spruces, the frugality and loftiness of pines, the paleness and greed of birches and the aspen, the trembling of aspens as the wind whistles up the mountainside!

Green, gray, black. Forest lakes and fields, fallen trees and bogs, clearings and copses, stone walls so old they seem to have grown into the landscape. Meres with water lilies and muddy bottoms full of tree carcasses. Meadows and pastures, crevices and cliffs, pine moors and heaths, rivers and streams, waterfalls and deep pools. Ash, aspen, beech, oak, rowan, birch, willow, alder, elm, pine, spruce. All with their own characteristic individual shapes, yet representative of the same.

But I couldn't write about that, it was completely beyond me, both because my language was insufficient, that is, I didn't know how to approach the subject, how to express it, and because I lacked the knowledge. The last time I found myself in the heart of a forest I was in the ninth grade. I couldn't tell the difference between an elder tree and an ash, barely knew the names of any flowers apart from a wood anemone and a blue anemone and what we called a buttercup, but it probably had a completely different name.

I couldn't describe a forest, neither seen from above nor from within.

No, the composure he possessed I didn't have in me, and the self-assurance and serenity, which all great prose writers had, I couldn't even achieve as a pastiche.

Such was my experience of reading Naipaul, like reading almost all the other good writers, enjoyment and jealousy, happiness and despair, in equal portions.

But it took my mind off the institution at any rate, and on the eve of a new working week, that was all I really wanted. The thought of the place, that is, all the days that stood before me was worse and more unbearable than the days themselves, which of course always passed in the end. Tramping around in there, back and forth between the kitchen and the lounge, the washroom and the ward, it was as though nothing else existed, the whole unit with its harsh light and linoleum floor, its rank odors and heaps of frustration and compulsions was an existence all of its own, which I descended into, it engulfed me, crossing the threshold to the corridor was like stepping into a zone. It wasn't without problems, but the problems were bound to the life there, the people there, both the caregivers and the residents. It had something to do with the fact that we were locked in, that we moved in such restricted space, where every little displacement in one direction or another had an immeasurable effect, while the slow advance of time and the lack of anything to distract us lulled life there into a kind of calm, a kind of standstill.

Most weekends I was at Gunvor's, we went swimming and relaxed, walked in the forest, watched TV, drove somewhere in the car when she wanted to smoke, as she couldn't do that at home. I loved her, but without life in Bergen, where there was so much happening, it became clear to me that this was not enough, that just her was not enough, and this was a painful thought, not least when we were having lunch with her parents, who loved her so much, or when we were watching TV or playing Trivial Pursuit in the evening, because if Gunvor couldn't or didn't want to see it, her mother did, of that I was very sure. So who was I?

One evening we went for a swim down by the rocks in the sea. The air was warm and full of insects, the blazing sun hung just above the treetops. Afterward we sat next to each other gazing at the water. Gunvor got up, went behind me, and covered my eyes with her hands.

"What color are my eyes?" she said.

I went cold.

"What is this? Are you testing me?" I said.

"Yes," she said. "Tell me. What color?"

"Stop that," I said. "You don't need to test me. Of course I know what color your eyes are!"

"Tell me then!"

"No. I won't. I don't want to be tested."

"You don't know."

"Of course I know."

"Then tell me. It's simple."

"No."

She removed her hands and began to walk back up. I rose and followed her. I said I loved her, she told me to stop saying that, I said it was true, it came from the bottom of my heart. And added that I was self-centered and inattentive, distant and absent, but that had nothing to do with her.

The weekends I spent with her I took lots of photographs, which I would develop in a photo shop on Monday. I sent some of them in a letter to Dad. Here is my new girlfriend, Gunvor, I wrote, and this is me standing beside her horse on the farm where she lives. As you can see, I haven't changed much. I was thinking of visiting you this summer, if I do, I'll call first, take care, Karl Ove.

When the six weeks at the institution were over, I caught the boat to Stavanger and the train from there to Kristiansand. For the first few days

I stayed with Jan Vidar, who had moved into a terraced house on one of the estates outside town with his girlfriend, Ellen. We sat in the garden drinking beer and talking about the old days, about what we were all doing now. He'd gotten his diving certificate, my old dream, and he did quite a bit of diving, he told me, otherwise it was mostly work. It had always been like that with him, right from his time at vocational school when he had got up in the middle of the night to start work as a confectioner and baker. Going with him to the movies had been hopeless, I remembered, after a couple of minutes in the darkness his eyelids closed, irrespective of what was showing on the screen.

The house was on a hill, from his backyard there was a view of the fjord, the sky was blue and the wind whispered through the trees on the slope beneath us, as always in the afternoon. They had a cat and he told me about the time she had given birth to kittens. She had been much too small, or there was something else wrong, because one afternoon Ellen had come home and the young mother had killed all her young. There had been nothing short of a bloodbath in the house. Jan Vidar laughed as he told me, I was shaken, I imagined how it must have been, all the squeaking and snarling and crawling on the carpet.

The next day I woke to an empty house and caught the bus down to Kristiansand, filled with the old feeling of panic, it was such a fantastic day, not a cloud to be seen anywhere, and I didn't leave town, I stayed in the hot, narrow streets sweating while everyone else was sailing their boats around the islands, swimming and drinking beer and having a good time. I had never managed that, I had never been invited, and you don't do that kind of thing on your own. What was a record shop on a baking hot day in Kristiansand? What was the library, who was that sitting there gawping?

I visited Grandma and Grandpa, they were surprised to see me, I told them a little about life in Bergen, that I had a girlfriend and I saw a lot of Yngve and he was doing very well. Nothing had changed with them, everything was as before, it was as though they had reached their final age, I thought, as I caught the bus back up to Jan Vidar's, and from now on they wouldn't be a day older.

I had no connection with Kristiansand, it was no longer my "home." Bergen wasn't either, the thought of returning there and starting a new semester was not a happy one, but what alternative did I have?

On the last day of my short Sørland holiday I visited Dad and Unni. I was in a good mood as I left the bus stop on the E18 and walked through the streets of the estate where they lived, although a slight stab of fear with regard to Dad always made itself felt as I approached him. He was sitting on the sofa when I came up the stairs and I didn't know where to look, he had become so fat. He sat there like a barrel, staring at me. As brown as a berry, wearing shorts and a voluminous shirt, his eyes black.

"Ah, there you are," he said. "It's been a while."

"Thanks for your letter!" Unni said. "How exciting to hear about Gunvor. We were kind of hoping you'd bring her with you!"

"But what a name!" Dad said.

"She's working all summer," I said. "She'd like to meet you though, of course."

"Is it History she's studying?" Unni said.

"Yes," I said.

"And she rides horses, does she? Or was that any old horse you took the photo of?"

"No, she's a big horseback-riding fan. She went to Iceland for a year just because of the ponies," I said.

Dad and Unni exchanged long glances.

"Actually, we're thinking of going there for a little while. Next year maybe."

"That sounds good, Karl Ove," Unni said.

I sat down on the chair across the table from Dad. He took a sip of the beer he had in front of him. Unni went into the kitchen. I said nothing, he said nothing.

"How's it going up north then?" I said after a while, and started to roll a cigarette.

"It's going pretty well," he said.

He looked at me.

"Would you like a beer?"

"Yes, maybe," I said.

"You'll find one in the kitchen."

I got up, went in, Unni was sitting at the table reading a newspaper, opened the fridge and took out a beer. She smiled at me.

"Gunvor's pretty," she said.

"Yes, she is," I said, and smiled back, then went back in to Dad.

"There you go," he said.

"Skål," I said.

He didn't answer, though he raised his bottle and drank.

"How's your scribbling going?" he said eventually.

"It's mostly my studies now," I said.

"You should find yourself a course with better prospects than Literature," he said.

"Yes," I said. "I will eventually."

"What course is Yngve doing?"

"Media Studies."

"Well, that's not such a stupid idea," he said, looking at me. "Are you hungry?"

"A bit maybe."

"I'll make something soon. But it's so hot. It's not so good to eat now. I don't have much of an appetite in the heat, you know. That's why they eat so late in Southern Europe."

There was a confidentiality in his reasoning that made me happy. I finished the bottle, went to get another, felt a desire to get drunk creep up on me. It had been a long time.

And I did get drunk. Dad fried chops and boiled potatoes, we ate, Unni went to bed early, we sat drinking in the twilight. He couldn't be bothered to turn on any lights and so I didn't either. He said he and Unni were always together, they couldn't be apart, after only a few hours they began to miss each other, that was what had happened that day he'd been an external examiner in Kristiansand and we were supposed to visit him, he hadn't been able to cope with being away from Unni and had drunk on his own and fallen asleep, do you remember that time, Karl Ove? Hotel Caledonien burned down two days later, that could have been me, I could have been there. Yes, I did remember, I'd thought the same thing, I said.

He withdrew into himself, I fetched another beer, went for a pee, came back, he got up and went to the toilet, drank more. I told him Grandma had died in the autumn, yes, he said, she had been ill. I finished my bottle, he finished his, I fetched two more, thinking this was fine, it was perfectly all right being together with him. I felt strong. If he had a go at me now I would be able to defend myself. But he didn't have have a go at me, why would he, he was too deep inside himself, and at length he stood up in front of me in the semidarkness, the fat, bearded drunken man who was my father and had once been the very symbol of correctness – well dressed, slim and good-looking, a young respected teacher and politician – and he said well, that's it for me for tonight, there'll be another day tomorrow, you know.

Unni had made a bed for me in the room downstairs, and with my head buzzing with thoughts and feelings I got into bed and enjoyed the feeling of cool clean linen and lying in an unfamiliar room, one which wasn't mine but where I still belonged, at least in a way. The wind soughed in the trees, the floorboards creaked upstairs, and outside, the flaxen summer darkness became paler and paler as I lay in bed asleep, until the first blue patch in the sky slowly broke through and a new day dawned.

I spent the last weeks of the summer at Mom's. It was like my refuge, where everything I usually struggled with didn't exist. Kjartan, whom Mom had visited almost every day since he had been admitted, had finally been discharged, and I met him at her place. He seemed tired and low on energy, a touch stiffer in his demeanor, but otherwise healthy. He showed me some new poems, which were fantastic. He said he was going to move back to Bergen and resume his studies. I didn't ask him any questions about what had happened, that belonged to those topics you couldn't mention directly, but after some time had elapsed he told me unbidden. After he had trashed the apartment, he started shouting. I'm forty years old, he'd shouted, and destroyed everything around him. By the time he arrived at the hospital in Førde he had deluded himself into thinking he was in Japan, that those receiving him were Japanese, and made a deep bow to them, as was the custom in Japan. When he had psychosis he also heard voices, he received constant directives from a god, and to me it seemed as if there was some good in that, being taken care of by something else, while it was also extremely scary as this something else was him, a part of him.

Back home in Bergen I started on a new novel. The plot took place in a fjord landscape, it was the 1920s, the main protagonist in the first chapter was playing cards in a cabin up in the mountains, he was about to get married and didn't want to spend money he had won gambling on the wedding, so he put everything in the kitty and leaned back in bed and watched with immense pleasure as the others got very excited about the large sum of money that might come their way. The main protagonist in the second chapter was a young man in Bergen, it was the 1980s, he stood browsing through the titles on his bookshelf waiting for his girlfriend, in the kitchen the cafetière was chugging way, he thought about his grandparents on the farm by the fjord, they were old, she was ill, their lives would soon be over. That was as far as I got when the semester started again because every sentence had been written and crossed out and rewritten countless times, everything had been laboriously worked through, it was a time-consuming process, and since I had to hand in an important assignment in only a few months I put it to one side.

"Intertextuality in James Joyce's Ulysses" was the working title of the assignment. It was ambitious, I knew that, but I had an aim and an intention with it, I wanted a sensationally good grade and so I had to go for it.

As Julia Kristeva had coined the term "intertextuality," at first I concentrated on her and read Revolution in Poetic Language, but I was unable to understand, it was simply too hard. She wrote a lot about Lacan, I wanted to go to the source and I read a book by him in a Swedish translation, which if this were possible was equally difficult, especially because both his and her ideas originated from a kind of basic structuralist stance, which was new to me. In some ways it made me feel proud, as I was dealing with material at such a high level, in some ways it made me feel desperate and angry, as I could never quite grasp it. Almost but not quite. Farthermore, it was problematic that so many of their references were unfamiliar; if any were familiar at all they were always vague, and that was no good, accuracy was the very premise of this activity at literature's particle level. The novel itself, Ulysses, was, however, not difficult to understand, it was about one day in three people's lives, told in chapters with widely varying styles. I got hold of a book that went through all the references to Dante in Ulysses, I doubted any of the lecturers had it, so I could use it freely, perhaps let Dante's presence in Joyce be the principal example of the book's intertextuality.

I bought a secondhand computer when my study loan came, an Olivetti, from one of Yngve's friends, Borghild, whom I had met the first time I went to Café Opera, she had become an editor at Syn og Segn and hung around with Asbjørn for a short period. She wanted five thousand kroner for it, a quarter of my study loan, but this was my future we were talking about, so I agreed and for the first time in my life I wrote letters on a screen and not a sheet of paper. Green luminous futuristic letters, which were stored on one of those tiny floppy disks, as they were called, and could be summoned up whenever I wished. There was also a game of Yahtzee on the computer, I could sit throwing dice for hours on end, they were green and luminous as well. Sometimes this was how I started the day, an hour's Yahtzee before breakfast. Yngve and Asbjørn did the same, and if I set a new record I always told them when we met.

Gunvor had also bought a computer, occasionally I took my floppy disks with me and wrote on hers, either after she had gone to bed, only a few meters away, and lay asleep, breathing, tossing and turning, the way sleepers do, in a completely different world from the one I was in, or after she had gone to the reading room for the day. I didn't show my face at the university, everything was about the assignment this semester, so I might as well read and write at home, I had thought. In practice, I often ended up doing nothing, the days passed doing shopping, having breakfast, and reading a newspaper, looking out the window, perhaps going to some record shops or secondhand bookshops in town, returning home for lunch, spending the evening with Espen or Gunvor, unless I went out drinking with my fast-dwindling money. If I went with Espen or Gunvor and her friends things always turned out fine, I got back home without having lost control, but if it was anyone else, that is, Yngve and his friends, it was a much riskier venture. Once, at five in the morning, I came home without a key and rang the bell, fortunately Gunvor had been sleeping at my place, she opened the door, in her eyes I could read fear, I walked past her, wanting only to sleep, remembered nothing of the way home or any of the night, only the moment I stood at the door unable to find my key remained.

"Whose jacket's this?" Gunvor said.

"It's mine of course," I said.

"No, it isn't," she said. "You've never had a jacket like this. And what's this? There's blood on it! What happened?"

I examined it. It was a blue denim jacket. There was blood on the lapel.

"It's my jacket. I've had it for years. I don't know what you're going on about. I'm off to bed. I've had it."

When I woke it was one o'clock and the bed was empty, she had gone to her lecture at nine as always.

I remembered nothing from when I was at Garage until I was standing outside the door.

Freezing cold and frightened, I went into the hallway and reexamined the jacket hanging there. I had never seen it before.

It didn't have to mean much. I had probably been to a party and picked up the wrong jacket from the heap, I had been drunk and that wasn't so strange.

But the blood?

I went into the bathroom to look at my face. Nothing, not so much as a nosebleed.

So the jacket must have been bloodstained from before.

I rinsed my face in cold water and went into the kitchen. I could hear Jone's radio, I knocked on his door and poked my head in. He was sitting in his armchair with a record cover between his hands.

"Want some coffee? I'm making some now."

He laughed.

"What a sight! Did you go out last night?"

I nodded.

"Yes, I'd like some coffee," he said.

"I don't remember a thing," I said.

"Have you got the shakes?"

"Yes."

"It'll go. I'm sure nothing happened. Can you smell any perfume?"

"No."

He laughed.

"That's alright then. I don't suppose you killed anyone, either."

But that was precisely what was worrying me.

I put on the cafetière and heated a little saucepan of milk. Jone came in when it had finished hissing, took a cup from the cupboard, poured some coffee, placed a foot on the chair, and blew at the steam coming from the top.

"The police were here when I was leaving this morning," he said.

"Ha ha," I said.

"It's true! I was on my way downstairs, and there, you know, by the mailboxes, were two policemen. They were opening the door with a crowbar. They didn't say anything, they were silent, didn't even look at me. Just yanked open the door. Surreal."

"Was it a raid or what?"

He shrugged.

Some immigrants lived on the ground floor, it was always packed with people there, Espen thought they might have been selling dope, and the fact the police were there suggested he was right. On the other hand, they might not have had a residence permit. Jone, who chatted to everyone, had also tried to chat to these neighbors of ours, but without much luck.

"How's it going with the band? Kafkatrakterne?"

He laughed again. The name was too studenty for his taste.

"It's going well," I said. "We're playing tonight."

"By the way, found a few bargains up north," he said. "Do you want to see them?"

He had taken the bus all the way up to Trondheim and back again over the weekend just to go to a record fair.

Anything that could make me forget the night was good and I followed him into his room. He dug up a few singles, all furnished with a plastic cover, mostly Norwegian punk and new wave.

"Do you remember this one?" he said, passing me Blaupunkt, "Let Me Be Young."

"Yes, I do!"

Betong Hysteria, Kjøtt, Wannskrækk, Lumbago, The Cut, and some De Press singles followed.

"This is one for you," he said, and took out a completely round XTC cover, it was The Big Express in the shape of a train wheel.

"How much do you want for it?"

"Not that much. A hundred and fifty? Two hundred?"

"Why not two hundred and fifty?" I said.

He laughed.

"I'll give it a miss," I said. "I've got it."

I smacked my forehead.

"I used to have it." I had forgotten my stupid stand at the fair.

At the end of last semester I had been so hard up and had borrowed so much money that I'd succumbed to the temptation and bought a few meters of sales space at a record fair Jone was going to in Bergen and I'd sold all my records. Every single one. I got a few thousand for them, which I had drunk my way through a week later, that had been the days when Bergen was really buzzing and everyone was out – and that had been that. Six years' worth of collecting out the window. My whole soul had been in those records. And that was partly why I had done it, I wanted to purge myself of everything, it was shit, all of it, anyway.

"If you're interested in collecting, it's CDs that count now," Jone said. "It was wise to sell them off! Don't give it another thought!"

He laughed again.

"There was some blood on my jacket when I came home this morning," I said. "It wasn't my jacket either. And I can't remember a thing. Nothing."

"You're as decent as the day is long, Karl Ove. Calm down. You didn't do anything wrong."

"I feel as if I've killed someone."

"It's always like that. I'm sure you just went around saying how fantastic everyone was."

"Yes."

"I'm off to class. I've got a late lecture today."

"OK. I have to go too. See you."

We didn't practice at Verftet anymore, Pål had found us a place in the basement of the HIB, the technology center, which was on the other side of the bridge to my apartment, a gray building with blue lines and a blue logo, it looked more like a gray plastic bottle of shower gel than anything else, with grooves and a blue cap. Pål's laboratory was in the building, I had been up there once, walked wonder-struck through the small rooms with all the instruments, I loved "science," that is, the aura that surrounds this work, not science in itself, which I despised, it was technical, instrument-based, nonhuman, restrictively rational. But "'science," that was everything from Captain Nemo's submarine to Darwin's Beagle diary, Bruno, who was burned at the stake, and Galileo, who gave the church all the concessions they wanted, Marie Curie's frightening, in retrospect, experiments with radiation, Oppenheimer and his circle's splitting of the atom, there was the man who had an iron rod blown through his head in the 1880s and underwent a complete personality change, before: nice/after: evil, allowing medical science to take a step forward because now they knew that certain functions were housed in certain parts of the brain and, thanks to this accident, they had localized one of them to develop theories that made lobotomy possible. Was there anything more desperate or crazier than a lobotomy? If so, it must have been the same people who strapped down their patients and sent enormous electric shocks through them to shake them out of their depressions. It did help though, they were on the right track, and that was what I liked, that someone learned how to control, in this case, electricity, tame and store it, thus enabling something new to enter the world. At the same time there was something crazy about it, all this speed that was being released or all this light being transmitted everywhere. Human bodies being viewed as an arena, being treated with electric shocks, to see how they would react, or cutting into, for instance, connections in the brain, to produce a more harmonious type of personality, you wouldn't believe this could be true or you thought it was something they did in prebiblical times, but it was true, this was what we were doing, and the aura of total insanity existed here too, in these small rooms, with their microscopes and all manner of underwater specimens, collected at the bottom of the sea by their research ship. Not that I understood what they were doing, or that I cared, all I saw was "science," the romance of blue rubber gloves.

I could never see Pål fitting in there, he was the most unscientific person I had ever met, but that was perhaps exactly why he was so successful at what he was doing.

I met Yngve and Hans down at reception, Pål was late as always, we took the elevator up and went to his department, he was standing over his desk, his long hair covering his face like a minicurtain.

"Oh, that's right!" he said. "It's music time."

His bass was in the corner, he grabbed it and we took the lift down to the basement, where Pål unlocked the door and let us in. The room was big, the concrete floor covered with a yellow felt carpet, a drum set was already there, plus some amplifiers and a sound system.

The mere sight of it, the three musicians immediately unpacking their cases and taking out their instruments, the cables, the straps, the picks, the speakers, plugging in and switching on their amps, tuning their guitars, adjusting the sound, excited me, this was what I had always dreamed of, being in a band, doing band things. I gave the snare drum a few exploratory taps and tightened it, although I had no idea how to tune it, I couldn't hear when it sounded good, banged the bass drum, tightened the screw on the crash cymbal and pulled it closer in a – for me – reasonable imitation of a genuine drummer.

"I've spoken to someone planning a big party for New Year's Eve today," Yngve said.

I looked at him, he was sporting that secretive expression of his, he was holding something back, like a child, and he smiled.

"Someone's been pulling your leg," Pål said. "It's not New Year's Eve today."

"Did they give you some money to stay away?" Hans said.

"Ha ha," Yngve said. "They wanted us to play."

"Are we going to play at a New Year's dance then?" I said.

"Absolutely," Yngve said. "It's at Ricks and there'll be tons of people, so we've got to practice."

"What shall we play then?" Hans said.

"I don't know," Yngve said. "Can't we just do all the songs we've got?"

We had been playing together for almost a year, we were getting better and better, especially me, because although I was still a lousy drummer, and always would be, I had with the others' help managed to produce a variety of beats for a variety of songs, a fixed pattern for each, which I clung to when we played. At home I went through every single song in meticulous detail several times a day, I knew them inside out, right down to every last touch of the cymbals, I sat drumming on my thighs and tapping my feet on the floor, all to sustain the minimum of rhythm and drive the band needed. Half a rehearsal had been spent getting me to achieve syncopation. A full hour, the same theme again and again, me unable to find the beat in one place, more and more embarrassing, it was eating away at everyone's patience, was I a complete idiot or what, it was so bloody easy, until it clicked. The whole time I was scared I would be thrown out because Yngve, Pål, and Hans were competent musicians and they would, in one fell swoop, be so much better if they got rid of me, which I told them often enough, but no, stop talking nonsense, you're the drummer, that's it.

After the rehearsal Yngve, Hans, and I went into town while Pål caught the bus home. I was still haunted by that night's drinking, the most terrible thoughts and imaginings constantly lay beneath the surface, and my stomach ached with fear, for which in fact there was only one remedy and cure, Gunvor, an evening with her. But when Yngve suggested going out and celebrating there still wasn't a suggestion of a "no" on my lips.

"I just have to run back home first," Hans said. "I'll come out later. Are you going to Garage?"

"Yes, aren't we?" Yngve said, looking at me.

"Sure," I nodded.

It started to rain, not much, just a few drops on my face, but the sky above us darkened quickly, an entire wall of black was on its way across the mountains.

"Well, think I'd better get going," Hans said. "See you later."

He disappeared up the hill to the left and we continued on our way to Garage. Hans lived on the other side of the Dragefjellet District, in a place he shared with Tone, his girlfriend. Before that he had lived in a little collective in Sandviken with Ingar and Kjetil, two of his best friends, both active in Student Radio and Studvest, as he was. I had been there once, to a party with Yngve, that was the night he got together with Gunnhild, with whom he had moved into an apartment in Marken only a few weeks ago. She was good-looking in a gentle retiring way, studied Biology, came from a farm in Hardanger and was everything Yngve, or for that matter any other young man, could dream about. I was there that night, the place had been packed, and then I was there a few days later, alone, I'd been walking around town not knowing what to do, and I had thought, I'll go and visit Hans. I didn't know him, but we played in a band together, so it wouldn't seem that strange. Uphill from Bryggen, along the main Sandviken road, down the narrow passages to the crooked old house, where they rented the first floor. I rang the bell, no one answered. I rang again, but they obviously weren't at home, so I turned and was about to go back up. At the end of the alleyway I saw Ingar. He had seen me because our eyes met, but he pretended he hadn't and kept going.

Why did he keep going?

Wasn't he going home?

He was probably going shopping, I thought, walking up the hill. At the same time I had a nagging suspicion it was me he was avoiding, me he didn't want to meet, perhaps feel obliged to invite in. So instead of walking down to the town center I went up the next street and waited for him.

He appeared only a few seconds later, scanned both sides of the street before walking the last bit to the entrance of the house, took out his keys and, after glancing up the hill, unlocked the door.

My heart was heavy as I left, it was me he had been avoiding, there was no doubt about it, but why, what was it about me?

Oh, I knew of course, I felt it all the time, there was something about me people didn't want to know, something they tried to avoid if they could. Something I had, something about the way I behaved.

But what was it?

I didn't know.

I didn't say a lot, of course, I could safely assume that this was noticed and commented on unfavorably. Perhaps also that what I did say tended to be about inappropriate topics. What I said was often heartfelt, at least as soon as I was alone with someone, and people shied away from that like the plague. The alternative was to say nothing at all. These were my only modi vivendi, it was my entire register.

Well, not with Gunvor. She knew who I was.

The rain increased as Yngve and I hurried down Nygårdsgaten.

"I'll just have to call Gunvor," I said. "She might be waiting for me at her place."

"That's OK," Yngve said. "I'd better tell Gunnhild."

"Is there a phone booth anywhere near here?"

"There's definitely one in Festplassen. On the corner, down from Garage."

"Want to go there first then?"

"Yes."

"What about swapping?" Yngve said, when we stopped by the phone booth rummaging through our pockets for coins. "You call Gunnhild and I'll call Gunvor? See if they notice the difference?"

We were alike, Yngve and I, but only at first glance, we shared a kind of general resemblance, which meant that I could be mistaken for Yngve by people who didn't know him that well. But our voices were almost identical. Often when I had rung up Yngve's old collective they had thought it was Yngve messing with them.

"OK," I said. "Shall I ring Gunnhild first?"

"Yes, tell her I'm going to Garage with you and I don't know when I'll be back."

I lifted the receiver and dialed the number.

"Hello?" Gunnhild said at the other end.

"Hi, it's me," I said.

"Hi!" she said.

"Gunnhild, I'm going to Garage for a bit with Karl Ove," I said. "I don't know when I'll be home, so don't wait up!"

"Maybe I will anyway," she said. "But have a good time! And say hello to Karl Ove."

"Will do," I said. "Bye."

"Bye."

Yngve laughed.

"You've only been together a few months," I said. "Gunvor and I have been together for more than a year. She'll notice."

"Want to bet?"

"No, I don't dare."

Yngve picked up the receiver, inserted the money, and dialed the number.

"Hi, it's Karl Ove," he said.

Silence.

"I'm going out with Yngve and Hans. But I'll come back to your place afterward, is that alright? I don't know how long we'll be, but . . . Yes . . . Yes . . . I love you too. Bye!"

He hung up and turned to me with a smile.

"Did you say you loved her?" I said.

"Yes, she said she loved me!"

"Shit. You shouldn't have done that," I said.

He laughed.

"We don't have to say anything. Then she'll never know."

"But I know."

He snorted.

"You're so sensitive," he said. "It's just a joke!"

"Yeah, yeah," I said, and set off toward Garage.

Six hours later I was at a party in Fosswinckels Gate, thinking how talented I was, writing actually wasn't a problem, I was full of energy, I really did own the world. That wasn't how things were, as I would have been the first to admit, but really they were. A couple of girls had given me the once-over in the basement of Garage, they had been long, hungry looks, but of course I did nothing, I had a girlfriend, didn't I, Gunvor, asleep at home waiting for me. But this felt like a missed opportunity, a regret, and while Bendik, who owned the flat, put on "Happy Mondays" and people around me were shouting and laughing excitedly, I sat staring at the ceiling thinking, it was fine, all

I had to do was finish the relationship, then I would be free, and there would be nothing to stop me from doing anything I wanted.

It was close to half past four, people were starting to leave, again there was only the hard core left, Bendik, Arvid, Erling, Atle, and when all hope of any more fun had gone I drained my glass, got up and went downstairs without saying good-bye, made a beeline for the backyard next door, where I went round pulling at the bikes, but they were all locked, I would have to walk, unless there was one left unlocked in the adjacent yard.

No, there wasn't.

The rain was teeming down as I trudged down the hills. In front of Garage, which now lay dark and empty, with raindrops running slowly and ornately down the windows and one taxi after another racing out of the tunnel beneath Høyden, I stood wondering what to do. I didn't want to go home, no question about that. I went down toward Slakteriet, but that was closed too. I lit a cigarette, cupped my hand over it against the rain, walked up the gentle incline ending at the theater. What I wanted was to sleep with someone, a girl I hadn't slept with before, one of the two who had been looking at me. Why hadn't I grasped the opportunity, how could I have been so incredibly stupid? Gunvor would never find out, and I wasn't doing it to spite her, I just wanted it so much I hadn't thought about anything else all evening. A woman's soft body, downcast eyes, new breasts, a new backside, she bends forward for me, on all fours for me, doggie position and I, and I, well, I ram it in. That was basically all I wanted, but it was impossible here, in a town where the rain fell remorselessly, deserted apart from the occasional darkened taxi, at half past four in the morning, how could it happen?

There was someone in Nøstet, she might have been in love with me once, she would probably receive me with open arms.

I went there. My hair plastered flat against my skull, jacket and trousers soaked, the streets empty, the only sound the squelch of my shoes.

I felt the front door. Locked.

She lived on the first floor, and I knelt down to gather some pebbles, threw them at the three windows of her room.

No reaction.

I stood around wondering what to do. Shout? That wouldn't work, the whole neighborhood would hear.

I grabbed the door frame, got a foot on it, and swung myself up. There were narrow ledges and projections at various places on the wall, windows with protruding sills, and it should have been easily possible to do it, climb up to her floor and knock on the windows or if I had the unimaginable good luck to find one of them unlocked, simply open it and step inside and give her a real surprise.

I was perhaps three meters up when I lost my grip and slipped down, fortunately in a relatively controlled manner, I didn't hit myself very hard, just a bit on one knee, which throbbed with unabated pain as I began to climb back. But I fell once again, this time badly, I landed on my chest and the fall knocked the wind out of me. It was as though I was drowning, I couldn't breathe, and the pain radiated up into my brain from a thousand different places. The pain was incandescent, like a star.

OOOOOHHHHH, I said.

OOOOOHHHHH.

OOOOOHHHH.

I lay still, breathing. Feeling the water in the puddle soaking into my clothes. My legs and arms and chest were freezing cold. Nevertheless it struck me that I could close my eyes and sleep there. Just for a moment. . .

The very next, Christ how it hurt!

I struggled into a kneeling position, lifted my head to the sky, from where all the rain was falling. I stood up straight and slowly began to walk, stiffly at first, then more and more easily. For some reason I walked uphill to the Klosteret Square, and on the way a police car glided alongside and stopped and the window slid down and a policeman asked me what I was doing.

"I've been to a party," I said. "And I saw a guy down there as I was passing. He was trying to climb up the front of a house. Don't know what the hell he was after, but it didn't look good."

I must have appeared lucid enough for them to let me continue, not only that, they turned down the hill to follow up on my tip-off.

Ha ha ha, I laughed as I walked down to Torgalmenningen.

Ha ha ha.

Ha ha ha.

I couldn't go to Gunvor's, not after all this mess, so I turned right and walked to the taxi stand instead. Five or six minutes later I got out of the car and went through the entrance, saw that the door to the immigrants had been nailed up and sealed with a strip of plastic, rested my shoulder against the row of mailboxes, struggled up the next two floors, unlocked the door, and stopped.

There was a scratching noise coming from the cabinet in the kitchen.

Was I finally going to see them? I was sick of finding evidence of their activities but not them, and as nimbly as a cat I ran into the kitchen and tore open the cabinet door. Nothing. Empty.

But the plastic rubbish bag had bite marks on it and coffee grounds and eggshells had spilled out.

It had to be rats, couldn't be anything else, no mouse would behave like this, would it? The following day I would buy a rattrap or poison, I thought, and pulled off my clothes and a moment later I was asleep in bed.

I woke up to the telephone ringing. It's Gunvor, I thought, I'd better not answer it, I'll have to think of an excuse first, but the ringing wouldn't stop and in the end I answered it, with a pounding heart in an aching body.

"Yngve here."

"Hi."

"Heard you lost it after the party."

"Heard? Who from? Who said that?"

"Bendik. They'd seen you from the window. You ran into the backyard looking for a bike. Then you came out and went straight into the next one. 'He's trouble, your brother,' Bendik said. How was it? Did you do anything else?"

"No. It was fine. I went home. But I'm a little worried."

"You can't take your drink. That's what's wrong. It's not good for you. You can't take it."

"No."

"Well, I don't want to moralize. You have to live your own life."

"Yes, exactly."

"You can come over if you want. It's only us. Then we can watch TV or something."

"No, I don't think so. I have to work. It's only a short semester, isn't it?"

"OK. Talk to you later then."

"Yes, alright. Bye."

"Bye."

Usually it took a day or so for the fear to subside after a night out; if something special had happened, two, maybe three. But it always did. I didn't understand why it came, why the shame and fear were so great, actually they got worse and worse each time, and it wasn't that I had killed someone or hurt anyone. Nor had I been unfaithful. I had felt like sex, and I had done some stupid things to get it, but nothing had happened, I had climbed up a brick wall, for Christ's sake, should I be afraid for three days because of that? Should I pace the flat and start at every tiny noise, jump every time a siren sounded in the streets, my insides aching all the while with an intensity that was unbearable, except that I did bear it, every time, all the time.

I was a cheat, a traitor, I was a bad person. And I could deal with that, it wasn't a problem, so long as it was only me involved. But now I was with Gunvor, and it affected her because she became someone who was going out with a cheat, a traitor, a bad person. She didn't think that, on the contrary, in her eyes I was a lovely person, someone who meant well, who showed her consideration and love, but that was exactly where the pain lay because I wasn't like that.

I switched on my computer and while I was waiting for it to warm up I skimmed through what I had written so far. I didn't give a shit about the assignment, I couldn't read about proto-language in the state I was in, my priority was the novel, which was now approaching fifty pages and had spread in so many directions, some of them promising, at the very least. But

I couldn't get a grip on the 1920s, which I wrote a good deal about, there was so much I didn't know about the era, and this ignorance hindered me, I could barely write a sentence for fear it wouldn't be accurate. Farthermore, the 1920s were much too far away for me to pump full with my own life, with what was coursing through my veins now. So the writing became wooden and lifeless, I could see that, but at the same time it was all I had, I was clutching at my last straw.

There was a thump on the living-room floor. I saved my work, put on my shoes, and went down to Espen. He met me at the door, placed a finger on his lips and beckoned me to follow him into the kitchen. There was a stool in the middle of the floor, he pointed up at the ceiling, where there was a crack he wanted me to look through.

I clambered onto the stool, leaned back, and peered in.

A big black rat met my gaze.

"Can you see it? Is it still there?" Espen said in a low voice.

"Ugh, Jesus," I said, and got down. "How revolting!"

"Now at least we know what it is," he said.

"We'll have to buy poison tomorrow then."

"Or traps. They can lie rotting between the walls, I've heard, impossible to get rid of."

"What I've heard," I said, "is that there's something in the poison that makes them want water and so they run out of the house."

I could hear how odd that sounded and smiled tentatively and shrugged. "The problem with traps is that the rats lie there and you have to physically throw them away. I don't feel like doing that."

"Me neither," Espen said. "But if we have to, we have to."

"A rat is a rat is a rat is a rat is a rat," I said.

"Eh?" Espen said, looking at me. "A cup of coffee?"

I nodded.

"I can hear you when you're working upstairs. The noise comes right down here. For a while I thought you were drumming your fingers. Then it suddenly hit me, aha, he's writing!"

"I've done fifty pages now," I said. "So you'll have to read it soon. If it's crap I don't want to waste a whole year on it."

"I'd love to read it right away," Espen said.

"What? Now, do you mean?"

"Why not?"

"A cup of coffee first, then I'll go and print it. OK?"

Espen nodded, and we went in and sat down in the sitting room.

"I was sure it was rats," Espen said. "I could hear them scrabbling along the ceiling boards. And then there was your garbage bag. It couldn't have been anything else."

"In which case, they're some smart rats. When Gunvor slept here a few days ago she made a packed lunch in the evening to avoid having to do it in the morning. She had to get up early . . . "

"And?" Espen said.

I looked at him. Was he getting impatient?

Seemed like it.

"Well, she put her lunch in her bag. Then when she was about to eat it later in the day it was empty. But the waxed paper was intact. So they'd snuck into her bag, unpacked the paper, taken the food, and scampered off. Well, there were a few bites left, but nevertheless. Sounds to me more like a whole army of them had been at work. It must have required comprehensive planning. Perhaps the one we saw was the brains behind it? In the hole?"

"The demiurge itself?"

"Yes, what do I know? But anyway we've got to flush them out. Gunvor can't stay here if the place is crawling with rats."

"Is she so pampered?"

"Ha ha."

"Is that your phone ringing?" he said.

I sat still for a few seconds, listening. Yes, it was.

"I'll run up and get it. And do the printing while I'm at it!" I said, hurrying out and up.

"Hello?"

"Hi, it's me," Gunvor said. "You are at home then? I was just about to give up."

"I was downstairs with Espen."

"I thought you were coming to my place last night?"

"Yes, I was. But it got late and I was so drunk I thought I would spare you."

"I like you coming here. It doesn't matter if you're drunk."

"Sometimes it does," I said. "I'm really frightened now. That's two nights in a row. Can't you come over? Then we can make waffles or something? I'm dying for something ordinary and normal."

"OK. Now or what?"

"Yes, that'd be good. Will you buy some milk on the way?"

"Yes. See you. I'll bring some dirty laundry as well. Is that alright?"

"Of course."

I attached the holes at the side of the roll of paper to the wheels on the printer, quickly read the last sentences I had written, I knew the first part almost by heart, checked the codes on the note I'd stuck to the desk, and pressed print. Immediately the printer head began to buzz back and forth and I, still unused to this invention, watched with fascination as my words, sentences, and pages appeared as if from a secret source somewhere inside the machine.

What the connection between the floppy disk and the screen was I had no idea; something had to "tell" the machine that an "n" on the keyboard would become an "n" on the screen, but how do you get dead matter to "tell" anything? Not to mention what went on when the same letters on the screen were saved onto the thin little disk and could be brought back to life with one tap of a finger, like the seeds that had been trapped in ice for hundreds of years and then, under certain conditions, could suddenly reveal what they had contained all this time, and germinate and blossom. Surely the letters I saved would be reawakened as easily in a hundred years' time as they could be now?

I tore off the perforated edges, stacked the sheets in order, and went down to Espen.

"Gunvor's coming," I said. "So I'll be upstairs tonight. Here's the manuscript. When do you think you can read it by?"

"Day after tomorrow maybe? I'll tell you when I've finished!"

I went back upstairs, and when Gunvor arrived I made the waffle mixture while she sat on the kitchen chair and watched, cooked them in the iron, brewed up some tea, and took everything into the sitting room. Perhaps it was the homeliness of the waffle aroma that did it, but anyhow we started talking about having children. It was an outlandish notion for us and everyone we knew, but when I was in Kristiansand Jan Vidar had told me about a couple of the girls from the ungdomsskole where we went, they had children now, one didn't even know who the father was.

The idea that we could have children and thus determine our entire future was both a thrilling and a terrible thought.

"It has such enormous repercussions," I said. "It molds the rest of your life. It's not the same with anything else we do. For example, whether you study History or Social Anthropology doesn't really matter."

"No, that's not true, is it?"

"It is, given a little perspective. Whether we get a cum laude or not makes little difference. But, Christ, how we strive for those little differences. There are so few things that are truly all-decisive, that make a difference."

"I see what you mean."

"When I write, you know, for me it has to be life or death. But of course it isn't! It's just me sitting down and puttering around."

"Yes," she said. "But not everything can be like that. Not everything can be either-or. We've got to have fun as well."

She laughed.

"Can I quote you on that?" I said.

"Yes, but that's how it is, isn't it? Let's say we had a child now. That would be a major event. It would determine the rest of our lives, as you said. But our lives would be much the same nevertheless. We'd have to change diapers and push a baby carriage and so on, and we'd do that, but that's not exactly momentous, is it?"

"No, you're right there."

She opened her mouth and bit off a piece of the waffle.

"Is it good?" I said.

She had her mouth full, and nodded.

I sprinkled sugar over mine, folded it and took a big bite.

"Yes, they're pretty good," I said after swallowing.

"Fantastic," she said. "Have you made tea as well?"

I poured some in her cup.

"Tell me about yesterday!" she said. "Who was there?"

I laid my head on her chest. She ran her hand through my hair, I could hear her heart beating. There was something so girlish about her, a huge innocence that moved me, while I, from the way I was lying, was as submissive as a dog, I seemed to be relinquishing something, not unknowingly, I both liked and disliked being comforted like this, it was nice and degrading at the same time.

After a while we got up and had a smoke in the sitting room, Gunvor with the duvet wrapped around her. We talked about Robert, her sister's husband, he was five or six years older than me and exuded masculinity, at a party where I had met him a few weeks earlier he had told me about an incident when a whole gang of men had been after him. He had grabbed a pole and shouted and gone ballistic, in the end they had cleared off, he had dropped the pole and continued on his way. If you want something, he said, you've just got to go for it. There's nothing to be scared of. You have to cross a kind of threshold where nothing matters, get into a zone where you're not afraid. Then you can do whatever you want. He had been a painter before, but stopped, he said he'd been frightened of going mad.

"Did he say that to you?" Gunvor said.

"Yes, those were his precise words. I don't know if I believe him. It sounds a bit arch. I stopped painting because I was scared of going mad. At the same time it didn't seem completely unbelievable when you met him. It's like you know where he's coming from."

"What do you mean?"

"Well, he's not exactly the student type. University isn't where it starts for him, as it does for us. It's more like the end of something, a place of calm after the storm."

"It's funny with you and Robert, how we've ended up with you two. You have something in common, don't you?"

"No."

"No?"

"No. I'm a boy, he's a man."

"He's older than you, that's all."

"There's more to it than that."

Robert was proud of the girl he was with, Gunvor's sister, and he knew what he was doing with her. He was always respectful toward her and seemed to cultivate the differences between them. I wasn't proud of Gunvor, not in that way, I didn't know exactly what I was doing with her, and I didn't always behave respectfully toward her. He was clear in his language, in an unambiguous, plain masculine way; I was unclear, vague, cowardly in mine. Not when it was just us two, but as soon as others joined us. Then it was a question of listening to where they were going and playing up to their collective will.

We looked at each other and smiled.

"Shall we put the washing machine on?" I said. "You brought some dirty laundry with you, didn't you?"

She nodded and got up.

"I can do it," I said.

She shook her head and smiled.

"No way. I have to do it."

"I see," I said.

I searched until I found a shop that stocked rattraps. I bought a few, as well as rat poison, and wandered home with everything in a little bag. There was only a couple of hundred kroner in my account, so I worried about it as I walked, the problem returned every autumn and spring, the study loan was spent, it would be several months before the next, in spring sometimes six months. The first spring I worked for Kjartan, the next one I sold all my records, while in the autumn I borrowed money from people here and there or went home and lived off Mom. But in the long term that was no good, it was an endemic problem, ad hoc solutions only postponed finding a real solution. In other words, I had to get a job. Which you did either through contacts or qualifications. I had neither. That is, I had worked for a year as a teacher, which might conceivably make temping at a primary school a possibility, but not in the town center, I doubted that very much, applications would be flooding in there, so it would have to be out of town. Another option was the health service. I had no desire to do what I had done before, but if it came to that, it came to that. There were two big institutions in town, one for the crazies, Sandviken Hospital, and one for the mentally handicapped, Vestlandsheim, and both had a high turnover of untrained staff, I had heard. If I had to choose, it would be Sandviken: better mentally ill than mentally handicapped.

I made some calls when I got home. I started with the schools, was given some phone numbers by a woman at the local council, most had supply staff already in place, and I was a bit too young, as someone said, but a couple of them did take my name and telephone number, without promising anything, their list of temps was long. At Sandviken they probably needed someone, but they wanted to talk to me first, could I drop by during the week and bring my qualifications with me?

Yes, of course I could.

Was Thursday convenient?

Thursday was fine.

Before I went to bed I put two rattraps in the cabinet under the sink, knocked on Jone's door, he went to bed late, and told him what I had done so that he wouldn't touch anything. He laughed in his cheery way and said he thought the rats were in my head and nowhere else. But he would keep away from the cabinet.

I couldn't take responsibility for the rats on Jone's behalf, I thought, lying in bed trying to sleep, my pulse thumping in my ears, but I did anyway, I thought about them all the time, I couldn't help myself, that was just how I was made.

Rats, we had rats.

I put off checking the traps the following morning, made some coffee first and drank it in the sitting room while smoking a cigarette and flicking through a collection of Swedish essays about Jacques Lacan, gazed out the window, the queue of cars that formed so quickly after the lights had turned red, dwindled and reformed. The cars were in constant flux, and the people in them, but the patterns they were part of remained the same. Death also made patterns. The raindrops running down windshields, the sand blown into heaps, the waves beating against the shore and retreating. If you took a closer look, inside a grain of sand, for example, patterns were there too. Electrons moving round atomic nuclei. If you went outside there were planets orbiting round suns. Everything was in flux, everything was inside and outside everything. What we didn't know, and never would, was what size really was. Think of the universe, how we considered the universe, infinity, imagine if it were small. Teeny-weeny. Imagine if, in fact, it was inside a grain of sand in another world. And that this world was also small and inside another grain of sand.

This was my great idea. And actually it could be right, at least, there was nothing to disprove it. But if it was, then everything was meaningless. We were completely dependent on there not being another world, on this being the only one, for what we were doing here to be meaningful. So it was important therefore to keep making literature. But if there was another world, a greater context, literature was simply nonsense, babble in the universe.

I went into the kitchen, put down my cup and opened the cabinet door, crouched down and looked straight at a rat caught in one of the traps. The metal bar had hit it in the back. I felt sick. I pulled out the lowest drawer, took a plastic bag and carefully pulled the trap toward me holding the little wooden base between my thumb and first finger. The plan was to put it in the plastic bag and chuck out the whole thing, rat and trap and everything, instead of fiddling around trying to release the rat.

Its rear part twitched.

I dropped the trap and withdrew my arm like a shot. Stood up.

Was it alive?

No, it had to be a convulsion. A muscle spasm.

I crouched down again, nudged the trap with my finger so that it was facing me.

It was as though the rat was looking at me with its little black eyes.

Another spasm went through one apparently bare leg.

Was it alive?

Oh no.

It was.

I slammed the door and paced up and down the kitchen floor.

It was important to act quickly, get rid of it, not to think any more about it.

I opened the door, grabbed the trap, slung it into the plastic bag, dashed downstairs, hurried over to the garbage cans, opened one and threw the bag in, jogged back up, washed my hands in the bathroom, sat down in the sitting room, and smoked a cigarette.

Job done.

At around seven Mom phoned, she reminded me that Grandpa was coming to town on Monday, he was going to the hospital and would be there a few weeks. Mom asked if I would mind meeting him off the ferry and taking a taxi up to the hospital with him. I said that was fine. Then we, the grandchildren in Bergen, would have to agree on visiting times so that we could spread out the duty. She might come over herself too, in which case it would be the last weekend he was there.

I had hardly hung up the phone and turned to go into the sitting room when there was a knock at the door. It was Espen.

"Come in," I said. "Like some coffee?"

"Please," he said. "If you've got any brewing."

"Oh yes."

I grabbed cups and we sat down. He wasn't quite himself, perhaps lost in his own thoughts.

"I've read your manuscript," he said.

"That's good," I said. "Have you got time to talk about it now?"

He nodded.

"But perhaps we should go out for a walk? It's easier to talk then. Sitting still soon gets a bit claustrophobic."

"Yes, I've been indoors all day, that sounds good."

Espen stood up.

"And the coffee?"

"We can have it when we're back."

I put on my raincoat and boots, waited for a moment in the hall below for Espen, who appeared shortly afterward in his thick old waterproof jacket and locked up.

"The toilet paper disappeared again last night," he said, turning to me as he stuffed his bundle of keys into his pocket. His toilet was in the hallway. Anyone could use it.

"I know who it is. I heard him and so I looked out the window afterward. You know that little Sunnmøre guy who lives across the yard?"

I shook my head, started to walk downstairs.

"Well, anyway, it was him. He ran down the road with a toilet roll in each hand. Imagine sinking so low as to steal toilet paper!"

"Yes," I said.

"It's very irritating. What do you think I should do? Take the matter up with him? Tell him I know it's him?"

"No, are you out of your mind? Just drop it."

"But it's so unbelievably rude!" Espen said.

"He's a criminal," I said. "If you start messing with him you know what can happen."

"You're probably right," Espen said. "But he's so loathsome. I think he's a pervert. He doesn't flush after he's been either, you know. His shit's in the bowl when I go in there."

"Ooh, Jesus," I said.

We arrived at the lowest hallway and emerged onto the worn, cracked brick steps. Rain was falling and had been for a long time. Both the building we exited and the one rising before us, three meters away, were dark and gleamed with moisture in the street lighting, and all the protruding sills, ledges, and gutters dripped. The narrow passage in front of us was overgrown and full of old refuse; the path between the two buildings was covered over and looked more like a tunnel or a grotto with its green stains and cracks.

When I saw the trash cans I remembered the rat, a memory I had succeeded in repressing, because I hadn't thought about it all day.

Perhaps it was still alive. Crawling around and gorging on all the delicious garbage. What did it matter that it was caught in a trap? If it used its rear feet it could paddle alongside the bulging plastic bags, gnaw at them and they would open and all sorts of splendors would fall out, straight into its mouth. If there was nothing? Well, keep paddling.

We walked up, alongside the other brick buildings, where our sister apartments were, all identical, and down the underpass to the left. Water ran and dripped everywhere, graffiti and unintelligible symbols covered the walls, some of the lamps on the ceiling were smashed, and no one ever stopped here unless they wanted something from the Narvesen kiosk, which was in the middle, where I used to buy newspapers every morning. We walked past and up the other side, following the road to town.

"Shall we turn right here and walk to the center? It's a nice area," Espen said.

"Why not," I said.

The road came out by the hospital, which now towered over the mist, like a fully illuminated castle, under the mountains. One of the town's big cemeteries lay just below, strategically placed, to ensure the sick would not be allowed to forget they wouldn't be living forever.

We walked side by side into town. Espen said nothing, I said nothing.

"I don't know how to start," Espen said at length. "I was wondering at first whether this was a young adult novel you'd written."

Everything inside me sank.

"A young adult novel?" I said. "What makes you think that?"

"Something about the tone," he said. "The way they speak. Young adult novels are good!"

I said nothing, studied the ground in front of us, the light gleamed on the wet asphalt.

"There's a lot of wonderful material in it, really," he continued. "I loved some of the descriptions of nature."

"But?" I said.

Espen glanced at me.

"In my opinion, it doesn't work as a whole," he said. "Somehow, it's not enough. It's difficult to understand why this story of all stories is being told. There's no spark in it, to be blunt."

"What about the language?" I said.

"Sorry," he said. "But it's a bit bland. A bit impersonal. It hurts me to say this. I'd have loved to say something else. But I can't. I have to be honest."

"I'm really glad you've been honest," I said. "Not many people would have been. Most would have played along and said they liked it. You're very brave to say what you think. Thank you."

"But it isn't bad," Espen said. "I mean, that's not what we're talking about. I just don't think you make the most of the material you have."

"Do you think I could? That I could keep working on it and raise it somehow?"

"Maybe," he said. "But it'd be a major job. It might be better if you started afresh."

"That difficult?" I said.

"I'm afraid so," he said. "I don't like saying this, believe me. I've been on edge all day."

"But it's good you did. I'm pleased you did. I know you're right. I've known it deep down the entire time. In fact, it's a relief to have this feeling confirmed. It doesn't matter."

"I'm happy you're taking it like this," he said.

"Not at all. Why shoot the messenger," I said.

"It's one thing to say that and another to mean it. Most people take it very personally. It's perceived as an insult. Well, you know that, you were at the Academy for a year."

"Yes," I said. "But we're friends. If you can be so sincere I know there's nothing behind it."

We walked on in silence.

I really meant what I had said. He was courageous and I could trust him. But it didn't prevent me from being upset. That had been my last hope and now it was over. I couldn't write any better than that.

Back home, I threw the copy Espen had read into the wastepaper basket and wiped the document on the disk. Now there was just the assignment left to do. "The Concept of Intertextuality with Special Reference to James Joyce's Ulysses," as it was now called.

Sandviken Hospital wasn't far from the town center, set back beneath the mountain. The buildings were massive, like a monument, as all the institutions from that time were. I jumped off the bus and walked up the hill. Above me, the windows shone in the mist. After having wandered around for a few minutes between the blocks I eventually found the right one and went in.

The interview consisted largely of a woman entering my details into the system, checking which department was in the most urgent need of help, phoning them and giving them my name, putting the receiver down and looking at me, could you do a shift tomorrow? Afternoon?

"Yes, I can manage that," I said.

"If everything goes alright, and I'm sure it will, you'll get more shifts. If you want them, that is."

"Thank you very much," I said, and stood up.

"Not at all," she said, and turned her attention to the pile of papers she had lying in front of her.

The next day, in the afternoon, I got off the bus at the same stop and walked with a palpitating heart up the stairs to the ward I had been assigned. A thin woman with red hair and a slightly childlike expression, thirty-five or so, said hello and shook my hand as I stepped into the duty room. Her name was Eva. Another woman, blond-haired, blue-eyed, with a Mediterranean complexion and gentle curves, maybe thirty, stood up behind her. Fantastic breasts, as far as I could judge from the corner of my eye. A fresh personality, and presumably fresh in the other sense, for what was she not saying as she regarded me through the narrow glasses on the tip of her nose?

"My goodness, they've sent us an attractive man this time."

I blushed and tried to hide it in my subsequent actions, take off raincoat, put cup under the big thermos, a couple of creaking pumps, raise it to my mouth, sip the coffee, full of bubbles and froth, sit down, little smile.

"Did I embarrass you?" she said. "I didn't mean to. It's just the way I am. Straight to the point. My name's Mary, by the way."

She looked at me without smiling.

"Poor thing. Now he's all flummoxed," Eva said.

"Not at all," I said. "I'm used to whatever comes my way."

"That's good," she said. "We need all the temps we can get. I'm the ward manager, you see. And we've had quite a turnover here. Well, we have a strong core, but weekend staff have a tendency to be thin on the ground."

"Really," I said, and took another sip. A bearded man came in, he must have been in his late twenties, thin arms and legs, glasses, leftie type. His name was Åge and he sat down next to me.

"Student?" he said.

I nodded.

"What are you studying?"

"Literature," I said.

"Well, you won't need that here," Mary said.

"We've had geologists, architects, historians, social scientists, artists, sociologists, social anthropologists here, yep, the whole kit and caboodle. Most stop when they find something better. But some hang around. Isn't that right, Åge?"

"Yes," Åge said.

"When you've had a smoke come with me and I'll show you around and take you through the routines," Eva said. "I'll go and get the medicines ready in the meantime."

It didn't look good, I supposed, that the first thing I had done was to light up. On the other hand, there were still ten minutes to go before my shift started.

Mary made an entry in the logbook. Åge got up and went out. I followed him, I didn't dare sit on my own with Mary, her presence was electric.

I recognized a great deal in the ward from my summer job, the only real difference was the residents, who were patients here and closer to the caregivers than they had been there. But the atmosphere was more pressurized, the silence more threatening. People stood rocking backward and forward by the windows, sat chain-smoking on the sofas, and lay apathetically in their beds. Most had been here a long time. Hardly anyone noticed me, or noticed that I was new, they were probably used to change. I kept a low profile, did as many practical jobs as I could, tried to take the initiative but not with the patients, hoping that this would be seen and appreciated, I knew my place. I washed floors, served food, cleared up, and put cups and plates in the dishwasher, kept asking the others if there was anything I could do. Time passed infinitely slowly, but it did pass. At the end of the day, when Åge and Eva had gone off duty and the patients were in their rooms, I was alone with Mary in the lounge. She lit a cigarette with little tense movements that I couldn't make tally with what she had already revealed of herself, but then, as she inhaled the smoke deep into her lungs and blew it out, waving it away from her eyes, her self-assured expression returned.

I asked her where she lived, she answered that she had a flat not very far away, near the Business School. The flirtatious tone she had used at first was completely gone. But there was something about her, the way she didn't look at me, her sudden smiles, which were charged to a much greater degree, presumably because the flirtatious tone had been so open and self-assured, while this only existed as something that was being avoided and left unsaid.

She told me she was a psychiatric nurse and had worked there for five years. Her words fell like confidences.

"Well," she said eventually, and got up. "I'll have to make my rounds. You can go if you like."

"But there's half an hour left."

"Just go. I can manage on my own. And you'll have some time for your girlfriend this evening."

I turned and put on my jacket, my cheeks lightly flushed.

"How did you know I had a girlfriend?"

She paused in the doorway.

"Hard to imagine such a handsome man as you being on his own," she said, and continued up the corridor.

I sat at the back of the bus and put on my Walkman, played Sonic Youth, a band I had tried to like for ages, without any success, until that autumn when Goo came out. One night I had been listening to it, downstairs with Espen, we had been smoking hash, and I was lost in the music, literally, I saw it as rooms and corridors, floors and walls, ditches and slopes, small forests between apartment blocks and railway lines, and didn't emerge from it until the song stopped, it was like drawing breath because the next minute a new song started and I was caught again. The exception was the second song, "Tunic," it just kept moving forward, I sat with my eyes closed and drifted with it. Strange, I thought now as it started in my headset, because the lyrics, or at least the chorus, explicitly stated the opposite.

You aren't never going anywhere
You aren't never going anywhere
I ain't never going anywhere
I ain't never going anywhere

As Gunvor lived so close to the bus station and the next shift started at seven in the morning, I slept at her place that night. I told her a little of what it was like up there, but halfheartedly, the essence of the job was atmospheres, the despair locked in these people's bodies, and it was impossible to communicate that. Her eyes suddenly serious, she snuggled up to me, fixed them on me, and then, for a few minutes, it was just us two, there in the room with the sloping windows, the rain running down their length, high above the streets where people walked up and down, but then, as we extricated ourselves and lay on our own sides to sleep, I was alone again until sleep came and released me from everything.

I woke up before the alarm clock, almost ripped asunder by what I had been dreaming, which disappeared the instant I opened my eyes. But the mood lasted. I got up, ate a slice of bread in her cold kitchen, dressed as quietly as I could, closed the door carefully behind me, and went out into the darkness and rain.

"Sit yourself down and have a smoke," Mary said when I arrived. "Sunday is a long day here. We don't need to exert ourselves before we have to."

"Sounds good," I said. "I was a little lost yesterday. I didn't really know what to do. So could you give me a few tasks, basically?"

She smiled.

"You can always wash some clothes. But first tell me a little about yourself."

"There's nothing to tell," I said. "At least not this early in the morning."

"Do you know what Eva said about you yesterday?"

"No."

"'Still waters run deep.'"

"That was a charitable interpretation," I said with a blush.

"If there's one thing we learn here, it's to be judges of character." She winked at me. "Go and put a load in the wash. Then you can start on the breakfast afterward."

I did as she said. The first patients were already up and sitting around the tables in the "communal area," smoking with nicotine-stained fingers. Some of them were mumbling to themselves. They were the chronically ill, Eva had told me the night before, they had been here for many years and were outwardly calm, but if something were to happen and the alarm went off, I had to drop everything and run to the action. This was the sole instruction I had been given with regard to the patients. No one had said anything at the previous institution either, but here it seemed more striking because it was possible to talk to these patients in a very different way. What should I do if they approached me and wanted to discuss something important? Play along? Say what I thought? Contact someone who had been trained to deal with this?

I emptied the fridge of all the cheese, milk, and juice, took out a pile of plates, butter knives, glasses, and cups, put everything on the trolley and started to set the tables. As it was Sunday, I boiled some eggs and lit a tea light on every table. A lean dark-haired man with trembling hands who resembled Ludwig Wittgenstein had already sat down. He looked straight ahead as though praying.

I put a plate in front of him.

"I'm no fucking homo!" he said.

I put out a cheese board and cartons of milk and juice. He didn't say anything else; he didn't seem to have noticed me at all. Mary came in and gave him a small cylinder of pills, poured juice into his glass, stood there until he had swallowed them, continued through the room. I took out the eggs, rinsed them in cold water, switched on the coffee machine, dampened a cloth, and wiped the counter and cutting board. There was an empty car outside in the parking lot with its lights on. Åge came into the hall, he raised a hand in greeting, I waved back.

"Well?" he said, standing next to me after leaving his jacket and bag in the lounge. "Did you have a good Saturday night?"

"Yes," I said. "Nice and quiet. Went to bed early."

"You seem like a responsible guy," he said.

"Maybe," I said.

"I thought we could take a trip with them this morning," he said. "What do you say to that?"

"OK with me," I said. "But I don't have a driver's license. Do you?"

"Yes. Then we can get away from the biddies for a bit."

This was an idiotic comment, but I didn't want him to know I thought that and feel rejected, so I hung around before I went in to fetch the eggs and egg cups.

He requisitioned a car after breakfast, gathered four of the patients, then we got in and drove off. Through the center of Bergen and up the other side, where he stopped on a large gravel parking area under the mountain, this was Lake Svartediket, he said, and it lived up to its name, the black dyke, at any rate now in late autumn, because there was barely any color in the countryside. We piled out of the car and walked up a gentle mountain ridge, he talked nonstop, his voice was a whine and he rolled out a whole litany of complaints about the conditions at Sandviken Hospital. He was particularly dissatisfied with the atmosphere among the nurses in the ward, they were conspiratorial, he said, talked behind one another's backs, he said, and I nodded and nodded while thinking, what an idiot this man is, won't he shut up soon, what the hell has this got to do with me?

We stopped, looked around us, at a lake some distance away, as black as the blackest asphalt, and at the mountain that rose almost vertically behind it, and then we walked back to the car. He drove on, turned off by Nesttun and went back. The whole time he played Bob Dylan on the stereo, and I thought, that fits, they're crabby, both of them.

"Ta-da, three hours gone," he said as we drove uphill on the Sandviken side of town.

"That's true," I said.

"It was nice talking to you," he said. "I can see you understand what it's all about."

"Thanks, and the same to you," I said.

What a jerk.

Mary, on the other hand, I thought, was a different kettle of fish, and a tingle spread through my stomach. Yes, she was thirty years old, yes, she was a nurse, yes, I had only spoken five sentences to her, tops, but none of that was important because nothing else was going to happen. Did it matter that I was full of tension when I was in the same room as her?

As I was about to leave some hours later, Eva asked me if I was interested in any more work. I nodded, she put my name on the internal temporary staff list. At the bus stop, in the pouring rain, I tallied up the monthly salaries in my head. I went to bed as soon as I got home, slept deeply, was woken by the telephone, everything was pitch black around me and at first I thought I had slept through the night, but it was no more than half past five. It was Yngve, he was working at the hotel and wondered if I felt like going out when he had finished. I said yes, of course, and we agreed to meet at Café Opera just after ten.

I had promised him a song, I had one started, and after eating I put on the music and got down to work. Jone was in Stavanger and Espen must have been out, judging by the silence from below, so I cranked up the volume and enjoyed myself; when I composed lyrics for Yngve, I felt no restrictions, I just wrote.

An hour later it was done.

Love Her, Love Her Dog

She stops the car,
she gets out,
the dog sniffs out a corpse,
your eyes see what happens,

an eye for detail,
the movement between two words,
a little farther every time

He lies at her feet
pretending to sleep,
the dog runs round in rings,
she gets up, puts on her things,
walks out without a word

She stops the car,
she gets out,
the dog sniffs out a corpse
that's not been eaten yet

The first word, little man,
A little farther away every time
A little farther from your control

The first word, little man,
A little closer every time
A little closer than you think is right

He lies at her feet
pretending to sleep,
the dog runs round in rings,
she gets up, puts on her things,
walks out without a word

Out in the streets, walks,
the lights go off and on, walks,
down the streets, walks,

off and on, walks down the streets, walks, off and on, walks down the streets, walks

I took a shower, and because I was going out I masturbated, it was a way of reducing the risk of being unfaithful, I really didn't want to end up where I had been before, at the mercy of my desires. I couldn't trust myself, I could drink one beer, but if I had two I wanted more, and if I had more anything could happen.

Standing there in the shower, dick in hand, the image of Hans Olav sprang to mind at regular intervals, him lying there jerking off in bed, it was as if I had been contaminated, and it removed all my desire. But I managed anyway. I stood in the shower for almost half an hour afterward. Had the water not been cold I would have been there for another half an hour, there was no energy in me, no willpower, I wanted to stand there with the water pouring down me for all eternity.

I barely had the energy to dry myself and get dressed, I had to pull myself together and mobilize all the strength I had. After I had finished I felt better. It would be good to have a drink, relax, have something completely different to think about.

With the darkness outside the windows like an ocean and the rooms sparsely illuminated, I saw them as I had when I was a small boy. Everything in them was somehow turned away from me, into itself. It was alien, essentially alien. Everything was, I thought, and stood by the window in an attempt to extend this perception and see if everything out there was also essentially alien, turned away from me, from us, the humans who wandered the earth.

Oh, this was a scary perception. We were surrounded by death, we wandered in death, but we didn't see it, on the contrary we adapted it to our own advantage and used death for our own purposes. We were islands of life. The trees and the vegetation were related to us, and the animals, but that was all. The rest was, if not hostile, then turned away.

I got dressed and went downstairs, death, out of the door, death, up the hill, death, through the underpass, death, down the road, death, along the fjord, death, and into the park, which wrapped itself around me with its living yet sleeping darkness.

I had a couple of beers on my own while waiting for Yngve, it felt good, both because there were so few people around, there was a very special atmosphere with the darkness outside, the light inside, and all the space between people, and because the alcohol was slowly having an effect on me, it was promising, I was on the way up and when I reached the top of the arc that was waiting, anything could happen.

Besides I had earned some money recently and my prospects for earning more were good.

"Hello," said Yngve from behind me.

"Hello," I said. "How's it going?"

"Great. Have you been here long?"

"Half an hour. I've been enjoying the feeling of not working."

"That's the best thing about working," he said. "It's great when you stop."

He stowed his umbrella and small backpack, went for a beer, and sat down.

"How is it? At Sandviken, I mean?"

"Pretty awful really. But it brings in something."

"I've worked there," he said, wiping the froth from his top lip.

"Oh, that's right."

"It's different when you've done a few shifts and you're used to everything."

"I'm sure it is," I said.

"Have you thought about the Kafkatrakterne at all?"

"Yes, I've written some lyrics. The song's called 'Love Her, Love Her Dog.'"

"Have you got it with you?"

"As it happens I have," I said, and took it from my back pocket. Yngve unfolded and read it.

"Very good," he said. "Two more songs and we've got a whole set for New Year's Eve."

We chatted about it for a while, then there was silence. Yngve glanced around, a few more people had trickled in since he came, but there were still big empty spaces.

"Want to go to Christian?" he said. "There might be a few more people there."

"We could," I said.

As we walked he said that Sunday was the day everyone who worked in bars and restaurants hit the town and that Christian was the place where most of them hung out. We paid, sat at a table close to the dance floor, he brought back a couple of gin and tonics, I drank it as if it were juice. One more, and one more.

We got into conversation with two women, one was nice with crooked teeth and reddish hair, maybe thirty, she worked at the post office, she told me, and she laughed every time I said anything to her. I was much too young, she said, besides she had a boyfriend, he was big and strong and jealous, she added, although that didn't frighten me, I was attracted by her laughter. But they eventually got up to go, and Yngve held me back when I wanted to follow them.

Death was in there too, the whole room we were sitting in was dead, and everything in it, apart from those dancing. They were dancing in the realm of death, I thought. They were dancing in the realm of death, they were dancing in the realm of death.

We drank more, we even got on the dance floor for some songs, otherwise we talked about the band, how exciting it was becoming and what the chances were if we made a go of it. I said I would rather play in a band than write. Yngve sent me a look of surprise, he hadn't expected this. But it was true. Writing was a defeat, it was a humiliation, it was coming face-to-face with yourself and seeing you weren't good enough. Playing in a band was very different, that was giving yourself utterly, together with a few other people, and letting things develop from there. I was a lousy drummer, yet despite that something had developed around us a few times, suddenly we were in midstream, it swung, we weren't controlling it, we went with the flow, and that feeling of finding yourself in the middle of this was a high.

I had a tingling sensation running down my spine and I was smiling. The moment soared and soared, and then it was over. In the next song we were back to where none of the instruments and riffs and drumbeats blended in.

"We've just got to go for it," I said to Yngve that night. "That's what we need to do. No safety net. Give up our studies and play music full-time. Practice every day for two years. Shit, how great would that be!"

"Yes, but we'll never get Hans and Pål on board."

"No, but that's what we have to do. That's the only way!"

At that point I was seriously drunk, but as always there were few outer signs, I didn't stagger when I walked, I didn't slur my words when I spoke. But inside me there was no doubt, I had started following every impulse I felt and scorned any objections that arose. So when they closed Christian and we went down to Slakteriet to squeeze the last seconds out of the evening there was only one goal I had in mind: a girl I could go home with or who would come home with me.

We sat down at a table, some girls looked at us, I caught sight of them in the corner of my eye and turned, met the gaze of a girl with big lips and shining eyes, she smiled when our eyes met, and I got a hard-on. She was plump and no one would have called her beautiful, but what did it matter, all I wanted was a roll around on a bed with her somewhere.

I looked at her a couple more times, always brief glances, just to check if she was up for it, and she was. After a while she came over and asked if they could sit at our table. I let Yngve answer, he said yes, of course, have a seat. We're on our way home now but . . .

"Are you?" she said.

"Yes, soon," he said.

She sent me a teasing glance.

"You too?"

"It depends," I said. My voice was almost choking with excitement.

"Depends on what?" she said.

"Well, if anything special was going to happen."

"Special?" she said.

My heart was pounding wildly because her eyes were begging me, she wanted it too.

"Yes," I said.

"Like what?"

"Like, a party. Where do you live?"

"In Nøstet. But there's no party."

"Oh," I said.

"And where do you live?"

"In Danmarksplass," I said, lighting a cigarette.

"Oh, right over there," she said. "Do you live alone?"

"Yes."

"Are you going to have a party there?" she said.

Yngve eyed me.

"No, I don't think so," I said.

"You've got to take Grandpa to the hospital tomorrow, remember," Yngve said.

"Of course," I said. "I'll be on my way soon."

Then Yngve got up to go to the bathroom.

"Can I have a little chat with you?" I said. "Outside? I'm going now. I want to say something to you in private."

"What could that be?" she said, and smiled. Looked at her friend, who was chatting to a guy crouching down in front of her chair.

I stood up, she stood up.

"Come home with me," I said. "Would you like to?"

"Yes, it might be interesting," she said.

"Let's take a taxi," I said. "Now."

She nodded, put on her jacket, hung her bag over her shoulder.

"I'm off," she said to her friend. "Talk tomorrow, OK?"

Her friend nodded, we left, a taxi came down the cobbled street, I waved a hand and thirty seconds later we were on our way through the town.

"What about your brother?" she said.

"He'll be alright," I said, putting my hand on her thigh.

Jesus.

I swallowed, ran my hand up her thigh, as far as it could go, she smiled, I leaned over and kissed her. She put her arms around me. She smelled of perfume and her body was heavy against mine. I wanted her so much I didn't know what to do in the taxi, minutes away from my apartment now, and the bed.

I wriggled my hand in under her jacket, stroked one breast. She kissed my ear. Her breathing was heavy.

Across Danmarksplass.

"Left here," I said to the driver. "And then left again. Second door."

I pulled out a hundred-krone note from my pocket, gave it to him when he stopped, scrambled out, grabbed her hand and dragged her to the front entrance. She laughed. We stumbled up the stairs with our arms around each other, I clung to her as hard as I could, unlocked the door, and in the bedroom, where we were only seconds later, I first pulled off her sweater, then undid her bra, unbuttoned her trousers, slipped down the zip and pulled them off. She was wearing black panties, I pressed my face against them as I wrapped my arms around her legs. She fell back, I pulled down her panties as well and pressed my face against her again and then, yes, then we did what I had pictured we would do when our eyes met.

The instant I woke I knew what I had done and was filled with horror.

She was sleeping peacefully at my side.

I had to save whatever could be saved. I couldn't take any account of her.

I woke her up.

"You've got to go," I said. "And you can't say anything about this to anyone. If I meet you in town you must act as if nothing happened. I actually have a girlfriend. What happened should never have happened."

She sat up.

"You said nothing about that," she said, raising her arms to do her bra up at the back.

"I was drunk," I said.

"The old, old story," she said. "And there was me thinking I had met my knight in shining armor."

We stood side by side dressing in silence. I said good-bye when she left, she said nothing. But I didn't care about that.

It was ten o'clock, soon Grandpa would be arriving on the boat. I put the bed linen in the washing machine and showered at full speed. I was still drunk and so drained that I had to summon every ounce of willpower to do what was awaiting me.

As I was about to leave Jone came out of his apartment.

"Did you have company last night?" he said.

"No," I said. "Why?"

He laughed.

"We heard you, Karl Ove," he said. "Your voice and a girl's voice. And it wasn't Gunvor, was it?"

"No, it wasn't. I've been a fool. I don't understand what got into me."

I met his eyes.

"Please do me a favor and don't mention this to Gunvor. Or to anyone."

"Naturally," he said. "I've neither heard nor seen anything. You didn't either, did you, Siren?"

The last part he shouted into his apartment.

"Is Siren here too?"

"Yes, but it's OK. This'll stay between us. No worries."

"Thank you, Jone," I said. "Now I need to get going though."

I dragged myself down the stairs, sped up when I was outside, nauseous and with an aching head, but that wasn't a problem, what was a problem was that I was so tired I didn't really have the energy for this. I just caught a bus at the Forum stop and jumped off at Fisketorget ten minutes later as the express boat from Sogn was slowly entering the harbor.

There was radiant sunshine, not a cloud in the sky, all the colors around me shone bright and clear.

I had to act as if nothing had happened. Whenever I thought about it I had to tell myself it hadn't.

That actually it hadn't happened.

It hadn't happened.

I stood outside the ferry terminal with a throbbing head and watched the Sogn boat docking, thinking what happened last night hadn't happened.

The gangway was lowered, a few passengers stood in the doorway impatiently waiting for the signal to disembark.

There it was, at the dockside.

They were starting to come ashore.

Nothing had happened.

I was innocent.

I hadn't been unfaithful.

I hadn't.

Passenger after passenger came down the gangway, most carrying a suitcase or two. Grandpa was nowhere to be seen.

The wind made the flags flutter, the water ripple. The drone of the engine resounded against the rocks in the harbor, the exhaust fumes fluttered upward the length of the white hull.

There he was. Small, wearing a dark suit and a black hat, walking slowly toward the gangway. He was holding a suitcase in one hand. The other was on the railing, and he shuffled ashore. I took a few steps forward.

"Hi, Grandpa," I said.

He stopped and looked up at me.

"There you are," he said. "Do you think we can take a taxi?"

"We certainly can," I said. "I'll ask them to radio one."

I walked over to a taxi driver putting some luggage in the trunk. He said there would be lots of taxis along any minute and closed the trunk.

"We'll have to wait a bit," I told Grandpa. "There'll be more taxis coming soon."

"Well, we've got plenty of time," he said.

Grandpa didn't say a word in the taxi. That was unlike him, but it must have had something to do with the unfamiliar surroundings, I supposed. I didn't say anything either. As we passed Danmarksplass I avoided looking at the apartment so as not to be reminded of what had happened, so as not to see how we had run for the door when the taxi stopped. It hadn't happened, it didn't exist, I thought, and we turned left, uphill toward Haukeland Hospital, Grandpa and me. Slowly, he took his wallet out of his inside pocket and began to flick through the notes in it. I should have paid for him, but I had very little money and I let him pay.

The sun was reflected in all the windows above us as we got out of the taxi and crossed the area in front of the main entrance. It was dark inside after all the sunshine outside. We walked to the elevator, I pressed a button, we rose up the building. The elevator stopped, a woman came in, she had a tube attached to her arm, it led to a bag on a kind of stand with wheels. When she stood still and grabbed the rail with her other hand a cloud of blood appeared in the lower part of the tube.

I felt like vomiting and turned my back. Grandpa stared down at the floor.

Was he afraid?

It was impossible to say. But all his authority had ebbed away. I had seen that once before, when he visited us in Tybakken many, many years ago. It must have been something to do with not being on home territory. In his own house he was a changed man, he radiated calm and security in a very different way.

"Here we are," I said, as the door opened.

We went out, I read the signs, we had to go left. There was a bell, I rang it, a nurse came and opened the door.

I stated his name, she nodded, shook hands with him, I said good-bye to him, promised I would visit him as soon as possible, he answered, good, and then he walked in side by side with her as the door in front of me slid shut.

I was deeply ashamed. My life was unworthy, I was unworthy and that became so evident when I met Grandpa, in his situation, ill, at the hospital, getting toward the end of his life. He was more than eighty years old and, if he was lucky, had ten years left, maybe fifteen, but also maybe only two or three, it was impossible to say.

He had a little tumor in his throat, for the moment it wasn't life threatening, but it had to be removed, that was why he was here.

Grandma was dead and soon Grandpa would die. They had toiled and striven all their lives, in the same way that their parents had toiled and striven all their lives. To eat, to keep their heads above water. It was the great struggle, they had fought it and now it was over or approaching the end. What I was doing, what I had done, it was unworthy, an evil deed, abject and utterly wretched. I had a girlfriend, she was wonderful, indeed fantastic, and then I had done this to her.

Why?

Oh, there was no reason. I didn't want to do it. Not now, not when I knew what I was doing, now I didn't want to do it.

I emerged in front of the hospital, stood on the gray asphalt looking around while I smoked. Nothing had happened, that was the point, nothing, absolutely nothing, I had been out with Yngve, gone home alone, slept, picked up Grandpa.

If I was going to meet Gunvor, if I was going to be able to look her in the eye, I had to stick to this version of events.

Nothing had happened.

An hour later I was sitting in the third-floor café in the Sundt Department Store drinking coffee while watching the people in Torgalmenningen. This was where I usually sat when I was alone in town, here, surrounded by older Bergen men and women, no one wanted anything from me, I was completely at peace and even though there was a vaguely cloying odor in the air, which the aroma of the cakes and pastries could not dull, in a strange way I liked being there. Sitting and reading, writing in my notebook if I had an idea, every now and then looking down at all the people moving to and fro, the pigeons living their lives in their shadow, with similar movements, just on an enormously smaller scale, always after food that had been dropped or thrown into a garbage can. An ice cream, a bit of a hot dog, half a roll. Often they were chased by children, then they strutted off in the jerky way they did, in a semicircle, and if that wasn't enough they took to the air and glided for five or six meters before landing and resuming their search for food.

I didn't want to go back to the apartment, but I couldn't sit here forever either, particularly not in my present state of torment. The best option would be to go to the reading room, take the bull by the horns, meet Gunvor and get it over with. If the first few minutes went well, if she didn't notice anything, the rest would go well too, I knew that. I just had to take the plunge.

I went out, put on my sunglasses, and set off on the heavy road up to Høyden.

She was reading, one arm resting on the desk by the book, the other supporting her head.

I came to a halt in front of her.

She looked up and smiled, beamed with her whole body.

"Hi!" she said.

"Hi," I said. "Feel like a coffee?"

She nodded, got up, and followed me.

"Why don't we sit outside?" she said. "It's such fantastic weather!"

"We could," I said. "I need a coffee anyway. Can I get you one too? Will you be sitting here?"

"Yes, please," she said, and sat down on the brick wall, her eyes squinting into the sun.

"I went out last night, you know," I said when I returned, passed her a coffee, and took off my sunglasses so that she wouldn't get the impression I was hiding.

"I can see that," she said. "You look a bit the worse for wear."

"Yes, we stayed out late."

"Who was we?"

"Yngve and me."

I sat down beside her. I hated myself for it, but the danger had passed, she didn't suspect anything.

"You don't feel like taking the rest of the day off, do you?" I said. "We can walk into town. I feel like an ice cream!"

"Yes, what the heck, let's do that."

Three days later we caught the bus to the hospital together to visit Grandpa. We got off at the little flower shop, which was in a kind of shack by the road, just below the hospital, and was so macabre, it sold funeral wreaths as well as the bunches of flowers many hospital visitors would probably buy. It was raining and the wind was blowing, we walked up the hill hand in hand, I was black inside, the thought of my hypocrisy was like an abyss, but I had no choice, she mustn't find out, and sooner or later the memory of the dreadful deed I had committed would pale and become like all other memories, something that had happened in another world.

Grandpa was in the TV lounge when we arrived. He brightened up, struggled to his feet, and shook hands with Gunvor, said we could go to his room, where he had chairs and a table. He sat up on his bed. In the bed beside him lay an emaciated, sallow old man with his eyes closed.

Grandpa stared at us.

"You two should be in a movie," he said. "You're so attractive you should be in a film. That's where your future lies."

Gunvor smiled and looked at me. Her eyes were gleaming.

"It was nice of you to come all this way to visit me," he said.

"Our pleasure," I said.

In the nearby bed the thin man sat up and coughed, at first a bark, then a clearing of the throat, finally a rattle.

He can't have long left, I thought.

Against the darkness and the window he looked like someone from a horror film. Eventually he lay down and closed his eyes.

"He keeps me awake at night," Grandpa said in a low voice. "He wants to talk. He's sure he's going to die. But I don't want to be drawn in."

He chuckled. Then he told us a string of stories. One after the other, and both Gunvor and I were spellbound, there was something about the surroundings that endowed what he said with a special intensity, or else it was just that his storytelling was better than it used to be. But it was hypnotic. He talked about pioneers in America who had been close to Indians and had also lived through a raid by them. He talked about his youth, when he had traveled around to dances in the district and when he had met Grandma, on a farm in Dike, not far from Sørbøvåg, where she worked with her sister Johanna. He went there with a friend one night. Grandma and Johanna slept in a loft, Grandpa climbed up the ladder, felt something pulling at his trousers, it was his friend, he had got the heebie-jeebies and wanted to go home. The following night he had gone on his own and climbed to the top. His friend had become an organist, he told us. He wasn't too good at playing, to put it mildly, and remained a bachelor. Grandpa laughed at the memory, tears rolled down his cheeks. But it was also as though he had forgotten his own situation, as though he no longer knew where he was or who he was talking to but had disappeared into his stories, because out of the blue he said he didn't get her at first, then it had just been a no, but the second time he had got her, he said, and can't have realized he was telling this to their grandchild and his girlfriend. Or perhaps he did. At any rate, I didn't want to know about any of this and asked him a question about something quite different to get his mind on another track. He listened to what I said and answered with a new story. And it wasn't just him who was forgetting his present situation, I was too, everything was beginning to merge, what I had done a few nights ago, unknown to Gunvor, her sitting there now, attentive, rapt, there was the darkness and the wind, there was the thin man with the wild eyes and his death-rattle coughs, there was Grandpa telling us about house building in the 1920s when he traveled around with his father erecting houses for people, about the time he wandered around with a rucksack full of books that he sold in the district, about herring fishing in the 1930s, when they had lain off the Bulandet Archipelago the whole winter, about building roads in the mountains in the 1940s, when he had been a blaster, about the war, about the plane crash on Mount Lihesten, about his brother's life in America. Back and forth in his life he went, and it felt like an event, as if we were listening to something unique. Happy and excited, we left the hospital, went past the cemetery and through the residential area, down to Danmarksplass, into the building and up to my apartment where all the horrors returned, but I didn't let them affect me, nothing had happened that evening, I had been out with Yngve and caught a taxi home, alone, if anyone said anything to the contrary, he was a liar.

When I woke up the next morning Gunvor had gone to her lectures. I started work on my assignment, there were just a few weeks left to the deadline and I had only written a couple of pages. What was worse was that I had no idea how to do it. Everything grew and expanded, but not in a coherent way, the threads ran in all directions and the certain knowledge that I not only had to keep a perspective on them but also gather them into one single strand made me panic. At twelve the phone rang, it was Sandviken, they wondered whether I could do an extra shift that night. I said yes, I needed the money and getting away from everything to do with intertextuality seemed like a good idea. I had a nap in the early evening and caught the bus there at half past ten. The shift was in a different ward from the one I had worked on over the weekend, but although the building may have been different, the atmosphere was the same. A man of around fifty received me and told me what I had to do. It was simple, I was to "mark," in soccer parlance, a patient, he was suicidal and had to be kept under surveillance twenty-four hours a day. Now he was asleep, heavily medicated, and would probably continue sleeping all night.

He was lying on his back in bed, by the wall. The only light came from a wall lamp at the other end of the room. The supervisor closed the door behind him and I sat down on a chair a couple of meters from the bed. The patient was young, perhaps eighteen or nineteen. He lay there motionless and it was impossible to see from his face that he was so tormented he wanted to take his own life. His complexion was wan, his features delicate. There was a little stubble on his chin.

I knew nothing about him, not even his name.

But there I sat and I was his guard.

At long last, that night passed too and I was able to walk downhill to the bus in the black morning murk, sit with all the others going to work in town, get off at Danmarksplass, trudge through the dripping underpass, down past the dilapidated brick buildings, in through the crooked grottolike passageway, and up to the apartment. It felt wrong to go to bed now that the darkness was lifting and the day beginning, but I slept like a log and didn't wake until four in the afternoon, when the light had almost gone.

I fried some fish cakes and ate them with onions and slices of bread. Studied the assignment, decided to open with a description of Ulysses and then introduce the concept of intertextuality and discuss that, and not vice versa, which had been my plan. Pleased that I was beginning to shape my material, I got dressed and went up to the hospital again. Grandpa was all alone there and, being the sociable person he was, he would probably welcome a little visit.

As I approached the brow of the hill and could see the hospital ahead of me, a helicopter slowly descended and landed on one of the roofs. I saw a team standing at the ready, waiting, perhaps for an organ in a box, a heart that had just been removed from a body in another town, perhaps a patient who'd had a stroke or been seriously injured in a car accident, and it would now be inserted into a waiting chest.

In the spacious entrance hall, where there was a Narvesen kiosk as well as a bank and a hairdresser's, the reception area had none of the frenetic activity of the roof or of the garage, where ambulances were continually arriving with the sick, open to view, naturally, nor did any of the activity spread to the large operating rooms on the floors above, but the knowledge of it left its mark on these rooms nevertheless. The atmosphere in them was curiously somber.

I took the elevator up to the floor where his ward was, walked through the gleaming corridor, past the metal beds where patients, half hidden behind temporary screens, still subject to prying gazes, lay staring at the ceiling and at the door, where I stopped and rang the bell. A nurse opened, I said who I was visiting, she said this wasn't visiting time but I could have a word anyway now that I had made it this far.

He was sitting in the TV lounge.

"Hi, Grandpa," I said.

The state of mind he had been in was still on his face a moment after he had turned to me, and what I saw then, a hard, almost hostile, expression, made me think he actually despised me. Then he brightened up and I dismissed the thought.

"We can go into my room," he said. "Feel like a cup of coffee? I can order it, you know. They're nice to me here."

"No, thanks," I said, and followed him in.

The thin man was lying in bed as on the previous occasion, darkness pressed against the windows as on the previous occasion, and Grandpa's face was as rosy and childlike as it had been when Gunvor and I were here two days ago, but the atmosphere had changed, I was alone, I felt uncomfortable, I asked a few mechanical questions and actually just wanted to get out.

I stayed for half an hour before leaving. He spoke about the millennium, and from the way he was talking I had the impression he thought there would come a time when humans would live for a thousand years. Medical science was advancing so fast, people were living for longer, nearly all the illnesses people died from when he was young there were cures for now. His optimism about progress was immense, but not without reason; once I had gone with Mom and him up to Ålesund to visit Ingunn, his youngest daughter, and he had told us what it had been like when he was young. There had been enormous poverty, living conditions were tough, but look now, he said, extending his arms, it's incomprehensible how affluence has spread. Then I saw it through his eyes, everyone had a car, a big showy house, a nice garden, and the shopping centers outside the towns and villages we passed were crammed to bursting with goods and wealth.

With his talk of people living for a thousand years, it was hard to imagine anything else than that he was afraid to die. I decided to visit him again in the not too distant future, it was important he had something else to think about. He thanked me for coming, struggled up and made his way into the TV lounge while I took the elevator back down. I bought some Stimorol in the kiosk, glanced at the headlines in Verdens Gang and Dagbladet, stopped in the middle of the floor to open the packet of chewing gum, put two pieces into my mouth, and the sharp fresh taste gave me a sort of relief.

Some men in taxi driver uniforms were sitting in chairs below the row of windows at the other end. TV monitors behind the reception desk flickered. Beside it there was a stand with a sign. Clinical Biochemistry Laboratory, Neurosurgery Ward, Pathology Ward, I read. The words filled me with unease, there was something unpleasant about all of this. Everything I saw reminded me of one thing, my own body, and how little power I had over it. Perhaps it was as simple as that. The network of veins spread so delicately across my body, these tiny vessels, if the blood pressure surging through them became too high one day, would a wall burst and blood seep into the brain fluid? The beating heart, would it just stop?

I left the parking lot. Exhaust fumes floated on the air under the protruding roof. Heavy rain was falling in the glow of the street lamps, like tiny flashes of light. The black trees beyond extended like fingers, the darkness above them was dense. I walked down the hill, crossed the heavy traffic, passed the cemetery, and came into the residential area, the rain a constant patter on the hood of my raincoat.

Hospitals were strange. It was first and foremost a strange idea: why collect all physical suffering in one place? Not just for a few years, as an experiment, no, here there were no time limits, the gathering of the sick and ill was a continuous process. If someone was cured and discharged, or they died and were buried, the ambulance was sent out to bring in another patient. They had called Grandpa right from the mouth of the fjord, and it was like that throughout the region, patients were brought in from islands and small communities, from towns and villages, as part of a system that had already lasted three generations. Hospitals existed to make us well, that was how it seemed from an individual's standpoint, but if you flipped the coin and looked at it from the hospital's angle, it was as though they were feeding on us. Take, for example, the idea that they had allocated the floors according to organs. Lungs on the sixth, hearts on the fifth, heads on the fourth, legs and arms on the third, ears, nose, and throat on the second. There was some criticism of this, those who said that specialization meant that the whole person was forgotten and it was only as a whole person that we could be cured. They hadn't understood that hospitals were organized on the same principle as a body. Did the kidney know its neighbor, the spleen? Did the heart know in whose chest it was beating? Did the blood know in whose veins it flowed? Oh, no, no. For the blood, we were just a system of channels. And for us, blood was just something that appeared the few times there was an accident and the body was cut open. The call goes out, a helicopter takes off and thwumps above the town to pick you up, it lands like a bird of prey on the road by the scene of the accident, you are taken on board and whisked away, placed on an operating table and anesthetized, to wake up several hours later to the thought that those gloved fingers have been inside you, those eyes had shamelessly stared at your naked organs glittering under the surgical lights without once thinking they belonged to you.

For hospitals all hearts are the same.

Toward the end of Grandpa's time in the hospital Mom came to Bergen. She stayed one night with me, one night with Yngve, and the day after she left, Gunvor came over. We were sitting on the sofa, chatting about everything under the sun, when she suddenly got up and walked across the floor.

"What's this?" she said.

"What's what?" I said.

"There's a hair on the floor."

She took it and lifted it up. I watched her, my cheeks getting warm.

"This isn't yours," she said. "And it's definitely not mine."

She eyed me.

"Whose is it? Has anyone been here?"

"I have no idea," I said. "Are you insinuating I've been unfaithful or something?"

She didn't say a word, just stared at me.

"Let me have a look," I said, unusually conscious of my own movements.

She passed me the hair. It was gray. Of course. Oh, thank God!

"That's Mom's," I said as calmly as I could. "She was brushing her hair here. It's gray, see."

"Sorry," Gunvor said. "I thought it was someone else's. I promise not to be so suspicious from now on."

"OK," I said. "That's the second time. You opened my letter in the autumn as well."

"I did apologize," she said.

She had come by one evening and confessed she had read a letter I received from Cecilie, my girlfriend in my second year at gymnas. She was so jealous, she said.

She suspected that something had been going on, that was certain. If not, it wouldn't have occurred to her that there could be anything suspicious about the hair. Mom had been here, that would have been her first reaction. But it wasn't.

"I'm sorry, Karl Ove," she repeated, and put her arms around me. "Can you forgive me? I don't mean to be so suspicious."

"That's alright," I said. "Just remember for another time."

The night before the assignment was due to be handed in I was only halfway through. I had worked the entire weekend at Sandviken Hospital and when I sat down at my desk to start on it I was tempted to give up. Go to bed and sleep, not give a damn. But then I noticed how easily it flowed, it was as if the pressure was sharpening my focus, all I had to do was write, and I did, all night and into the morning, but then I touched a key by mistake and everything I had written was gone. I ran up to the university, explained my plight to Buvik, who accompanied me to a special computer data section, they took the diskette and would see if they could retrieve what I had lost. They asked me for the password, I hesitated, for some reason it was "pineapple," and I found it unbearably embarrassing to have a smidgen of my private life revealed here, in front of what was presumably one of the country's foremost computer experts, with one of the country's leading literary academics at my side.

"Pineapple," I said, feeling my cheeks flush.

"Pineapple?" he said.

I nodded, he opened the document, but failed to find the missing pages, and I, weary with despair, this had been my last chance, now the whole semester had been spoiled, walked beside Buvik into the institute, where he asked me to take a seat, he would just have to discuss the matter with some colleagues. On his return he informed me I had been granted a twenty-four hour extension. I thanked him with shiny eyes, hurried home, slept for a couple of hours and embarked on another hellish night with Joyce and intertextuality. Morning dawned, I hadn't finished, everything in the assignment was leading up to a major discussion, which never came, I was forced to write a conclusion in two lines, run downstairs and knock on Espen's door to borrow his bike, pedal like a maniac to the university, and hand in my assignment on the dot of nine o'clock.

When the grades were pinned on the board outside the institute a few weeks later and I saw that once again I had a 2.4, I wasn't disappointed, I had expected worse, and it was still possible to bluff your way up two-tenths at the oral exam. That is, if I had done the reading. But I hadn't and was forced to improvise, in front of Kittang of all people. He was kind to me, whenever he noticed I was struggling, he gave me a pointer, but not even he could extricate me from the mess I was in when he asked what Kittang wrote about this problem. I had several articles by him on the reading list, and hadn't read them, but with him present in the room it wasn't possible to wriggle our way out of these situations, clear unambiguous answers were required, which I didn't have.

But it didn't matter. It had never been my intention to become an academic. I wanted to write, that was all I wanted, and I couldn't understand those who didn't, how they could be happy with an ordinary job, whatever it was, whether teacher, camera operator, bureaucrat, academic, farmer, TV host, journalist, designer, publicist, fisherman, truck driver, gardener, nurse, or astronomer. How could that be enough? I understood it was the norm, most people had ordinary jobs, some put all their energy into them, others didn't, but to me it seemed pointless. If I were to take such a job my life would feel meaningless however good I was at it and however high I rose. It would never be enough. I mentioned this to Gunvor a couple of times, and she was in total agreement, only in reverse: she understood how I felt but was unable to identify with it herself.

What was this feeling?

I didn't know. It was beyond investigation, beyond explanation or justification, there was no rationality in it at all, yet it was self-evident, all-eclipsing: anything other than writing was meaningless for me. Nothing else would be enough, would quench my thirst.

But thirst for what?

How could it be so strong? Writing a few words on paper? And, yes, that wasn't a dissertation, research, a report, or that sort of thing, but literary?

It was madness, for this was precisely what I couldn't do. I was good at academic assignments, and I was good at articles, reviews, and interviews. But as soon as I sat down to write literature, which was the only way I wanted to spend my life, the sole occupation I perceived as meaningful enough, then I fell short.

I wrote letters, they just flowed, sentence after sentence, page after page. Often they consisted of stories about my life, what I'd experienced and what I'd thought. Had I only been able to transfer that feeling, that state of mind, that flow into literary prose, everything would have been fine. But I couldn't. I sat at my desk, wrote a line, then stop. I wrote another line, stop.

I wondered whether I should go to a hypnotist who could hypnotize me, transport me into a state where sentences and words poured out of me, the same as when I wrote letters, that should work, I had heard about people who gave up smoking thanks to hypnosis, so why couldn't you be hypnotized into writing light, flowing Norwegian?

I looked up hypnotists in the Yellow Pages, this professional category wasn't there, and I didn't dare ask anyone else, it would spread like wildfire, Yngve's brother wants to use hypnosis to become a writer, I dismissed the idea.

On the afternoon of New Year's Eve we carried our instruments and amplifiers up to the music venue, which was the top floor of Ricks. While the organizers were decorating and arranging the place, we did our sound check. This wasn't going to be a real concert, we didn't have a PA, the drums weren't miked up, and we had to perform on the floor, there was no stage, but I was still queasy with nerves.

Hans stood at the other end of the room and listened to us playing, he said it was good, we all went home to change.

Had I not been playing in the band, I would never have been invited to this. It was a fiftieth birthday party, in the sense that two twenty-fifth birthdays had been rolled into one, and everyone present had a connection with what I considered to be the Vestland mafia, students with links to the periodical Syn og Segn, the magazine Dag og Tid, Mållaget, an organization to promote nynorsk, and No to the EU. Even though they were only a few years older than me, they had already made it. Ragnar Hovland was also going to attend, it was rumored, as the conclusive seal of approval, this is the place to be, these are the people to know.

I returned to Ricks alone, walked up the broad majestic stairs, entered the room, which was now full of young women in their party frocks and young men in dark suits, urbane and worldly and self-assured Vestlanders. The buzz of conversation, peals of laughter, the expectant atmosphere that only precedes a celebration. I stepped back and searched for Yngve.

Yngve, Yngve, where are you when I need you?

There was Hans anyway. But he was also one of them, urbane and worldly and self-assured, always with an ironic riposte on his tongue. I was proud of being in the same band as him, but not of being in the same band as Yngve, because everyone realized it was thanks to him that I had the chance to play and be here.

I slowly mingled in the crowd. Many of the faces were familiar, I had seen them at Høyden and Café Opera, Garage and Hulen, I could put a name to less than a handful.

I caught sight of Ragnar Hovland and wondered whether to approach him. Being seen in conversation with him would do wonders for my status.

I moved toward him. He was talking to a woman in her midthirties and didn't see me until I was next to them.

"Hi," he said. "It's the man himself!"

"Yes," I said. "We're going to play later."

"You're in a band! Well, I'm pleased to hear that."

His eyes were smiling but also shifty.

"How's it going at the Academy?"

"It's good. We had to introduce compulsory attendance after you left. But they're behaving well."

"I know Espen," I said. "He's a good friend of mine."

"Is that right?" he said.

There was a silence. Both he and I scanned the room.

"Any books in progress?" I said at length.

"There's one I'm messing about with," he said.

The natural response would have been to ask me how my writing was going, if I was working on anything, but he didn't. I could understand why, and I didn't blame him, but it still rankled with me.

"Perhaps we can talk later," I said. "I'm just going for a walk."

He smiled and turned back to the woman. I noticed Yngve arrive, moved toward the entrance area, where he was standing and looking around. I raised my hand and went over to him.

"Butterflies?" he said.

"Yes, terrible," I said. "And you?"

"Not so bad. They'll come soon enough."

I lit a cigarette, we joined Hans, chatted for a bit until a girl clapped her hands and silence spread like a flock of pigeons startled into the air. She welcomed everyone. There was a dinner, there were speeches, there was entertainment, and last of all a gig with the Kafkatrakterne.

My stomach knotted so hard it hurt.

We went to the table, there were name cards, I found mine and sat down, a long way from Yngve and Hans unfortunately.

Each card bore a sentence about the bearer, a personal characteristic. Mine said, Twenty years on the outside, a thousand on the inside.

Was that how they saw me? Was that how I was seen?

In the last year I had spoken less and less, become more and more reticent, that was probably what the card was alluding to.

The girl beside me, who was wearing a short black skirt with some net trimming below, dark stockings, and red high-heeled shoes, unfolded her napkin and laid it on her lap. I followed suit.

She looked at me.

"Who do you know here? I mean, of those who organized the party."

"No one," I said with a blush. "I'm playing in the band."

"Oh," she said. "What do you play?"

"The drums," I said.

"Oh," she said.

I looked the other way for a while and that was the end of her questions.

I ate without saying a word to anyone, occasionally casting a glance at Yngve or Hans, who were both chatting away with their neighbors.

The dinner lasted an eternity.

There was a storm outside. The wind was so strong that trash cans were sent rolling through the streets, I could hear the clatter below, and now and then windowpanes tinkled.

The moment the dinner was over I joined Yngve and Hans and stayed at the front until we were due to play.

We were introduced, I could barely stand up straight, people clapped, we went over to our instruments, I sat down on the little drum stool, put on the NFK cap I had brought along as a little gesture to the audience, NFK was an agricultural co-op, they might be on their way to glittering academic success, but they had grown up with tractors, combine harvesters, and cans of formic acid, the whole bunch of them, wiped my hands on the towel, grabbed the sticks. People stood watching us. It was my job to count, but I didn't dare in case Pål or Yngve weren't ready.

"Are you ready?" I asked.

Yngve nodded.

"You ready, Pål?"

"Count, Karl Ove," he said.

I hummed the first riff of "Over My Head" sotto voce.

OK.

I counted and we started to play. To my horror, I discovered that the bass drum was sliding away with every beat. Not much, but enough for me to be sitting with my leg fully outstretched by the end of the song, and as I had to hit the hi-hat and the snare drum at the same time I must have looked like some kind of elongated monster spider.

They clapped, I pulled the bass drum back, counted for the next song and slipped back into my spider pose. People started dancing, it was going well, especially Hans made sure of that, he was the showman, undaunted, and, luckily, uncritical.

When I got home, after crossing the windblown deserted town in the early hours, I cried. For no reason, everything was great, the concert had been a success, at least as far as we could judge, but it didn't help, the moment my head touched the bed the tears came.

In the New Year I was offered a regular weekend temporary post, which I accepted. In addition, I put my name on the temping list, and so gradually that I hardly noticed, I found myself working there full-time. I put my studies on hold and said yes to everything, I had an appetite for it, almost an urge, I wanted to work as much as possible and did so all the following year. Some days I did double shifts, started in one ward in the morning, transferred to another in the evening and in this way worked sixteen hours in succession. Some weeks I took shifts in the hardest ward, those who worked there were to a large degree bouncers, and I was ill at ease, in fact I was scared the whole time, a couple of the residents I considered extremely dangerous, although the bouncers just laughed at them and sometimes even put them on their laps and patted them while they watched TV, as if they were cats.

One in particular was terrifying. His name was Knut, he was in his late thirties but had the physique of a teenager. Slim, muscular body, an attractive shaven head. He'd had his head shaved because otherwise he would pull out his hair and eat it. He also ate dust balls if he found any, and one afternoon I saw him open the fridge and take out an onion. He sank his teeth in, tears began to roll, but he took another bite and another and soon he had eaten the whole onion, the outer layer and everything, still crying. He could be aggressive. More often than not he hurt himself, once he had rammed his head against the wall so hard that he cracked his skull. What he liked best was walking. If no one had been there to stop him he would have walked to Siberia, he was like a machine, he just walked and walked and walked. When he came toward me in the ward with those dark eyes of his, which expressed exactly that, darkness, I was always afraid. Once I was supposed to shave him while he was in the bathtub, he must have sensed my fear because he grabbed my hand, I couldn't move it, and then he bit. I had to have a tetanus shot afterward. They told me I could go home, but I went back to work, I was afraid of course, but I didn't want anyone to know that.

I was often on suicide watch with patients, many of them were more communicative than those in the difficult wards for chronic patients, many had drug problems, some of them were seriously psychotic or paranoid, others manic or depressed, most were young.

In the ward where I worked normally I got to know the other staff well and gradually began to go out with them. Some lived close by or next to Åsane Shopping Center, there would often be drinks on a Friday or Saturday night, I went, got drunk with all of them, these women who were all between twenty-five and forty, and later caught the bus into town to go out. Whereas students went to places south of the center, near Høyden, the hospital crowd went to places in the north, around Bryggen, where students, at least the Arts students, never set foot unless they were being ironic. There were piano bars, sing-a-long bars, Bergensians and Striler – people from the coastal region north of Bergen – of all shades and hues. They liked me, I didn't shirk on my shifts, and the fact that I didn't say much was interpreted charitably by them, from what I gathered. They were friendly and nice, and I was too when I drank, I met them halfway, once I carried one of them up the stairs to shouting and cheering and laughter, another time I expressed my admiration for them and said exactly what I thought, my eyes moist and shining with affection. I got on especially well with one called Vibeke, she and I could sit and talk for a whole morning if the ward was quiet, and she often confided in me, for some reason she trusted me. Then there were others who were more challenging. Åge in particular was wearing. He was one of the students who had abandoned his studies and now worked at Sandviken full-time. He tried to get close to me, clung to me like a rash, he got involved in countless arguments, now he wanted me, first, to listen to his complaints and backbiting and, second, to support him, and I nodded and said yes, you're right, to this, and, oh really, to that, in a way that made him think he was actually my friend. We were often out with patients, he moaned and groaned and stared at me with those insanely intense eyes of his, he was also bearded and pale, a wimp, a poor wretch, a loser, who in his own mind was a student, someone far better than the housewifely assistant nurses in the hospital or the superior psychiatric nurses who were after him, always after him, and then all of a sudden he wanted me to visit him, we were supposed to go out together, and then, for the first time since I was a boy, I answered someone who wanted something from me with a clear and resounding no.

"No, I don't think so," I said.

He withdrew and began to avoid me.

Then he turned and began to accuse me of betraying him.

What sort of a creep was this?

A terrible thought occurred to me as I was on my way home that night: Was he actually me? Would I become like him? An ex-student drifting around for years taking shifts until it is too late, all the options are gone and this becomes life?

Would I be stuck there, forty years old, telling the young students who come and go on temp contracts, actually I was going to be a writer? Would you like to read a short story? It was rejected, but that's only because the publishers are so damned conventional and don't dare take a risk with someone who takes risks. They wouldn't recognize a genius if they had one stuffed up their backside. Look, by pure chance, I happen to have a copy in my bag. Yes, it's about my life and you'll probably recognize the odd detail about the institution I describe, but it's not this one, actually. What was it you were studying again? Philosophy? Yes, I had a sniff at that, too. But then I went for Literature. I wrote about Joyce, you know. Something about intertextuality and the like. I was told it was brilliant. But I don't know. Feels a bit dated in some ways, yet there's something universal about literature which . . . well, shines through its epoch. But take it and tell me what you think during the shift tomorrow. OK?

I wasn't forty but twenty-two, otherwise the image fitted pretty well. I was working there for money to live on, and I lived to write, which I couldn't do, I just talked about it. But if I couldn't write at least I could read. For that reason I took quite a few night shifts, then I could read until four, usually undisturbed, and then clean the ward for the two last hours when I was so sleepy anyway that it was hard to concentrate. I read Stig Larsson's The Autists and The Comedy 1, and admired the realism that was so natural, while there was always an underlying sense of menace. This menace was the capriciousness of futile existence. I read Flaubert, his Three Tales, they were by far the best thing I had read, the stories hit the bull's-eye, they touched on the essential core, particularly the one about bloodlust, the hunter who slaughters all the animals that cross his path, I understood it, it resonated with something I felt inside and knew was important, but not in a way that could be explained in rational terms, for there was nothing to explain, the narrative was everything. I read his historical novel Salammbô, it failed totally, though in a creditable way, he had invested everything into that book, used all his skill and the whole gamut of his talent, but to no avail, there was no life in it, everything was dead, the characters were wooden, the setting felt theatrical, although this artifice also had an appeal, it also brought something, not only in the way that the time it portrayed was in fact dead, forever, but also in the way the novel in its own right, as an artifact, as an artistic product, made its mark. And then I read his novel about stupidity, Bouvard and Pécuchet, which was brilliant because he didn't find stupidity at the bottom of society, in the lower classes, but in the middle class, and showed it off in all its complacent splendor. I read Tor Ulven and relished every sentence he wrote, the unprecedented, almost inhuman, precision to them, the way he managed to make everything equally important. I talked a lot to Espen about it, about what it was that made Tor Ulven's prose so good, what actually made it tick. There was a kind of parity between material and man, where psychology had no place, and that meant the existential drama was being played out the whole time, not only during a crisis, such as people separating or losing their father or mother or falling in love or having children, but all the time, while they drank a glass of water or cycled with a flickering light along a road in the darkness or you simply weren't even there, in the empty room he described with such mastery. And this wasn't something that was said or written, it didn't exist in the text, it was the text. The language brought it out, as we liked to say, through its modulation and figures of speech, not through direct expression but in its form. I read Jon Fosse, and it was as though a door had been opened into his books when The Boat House came out, because of its simplicity, its dynamism. I read The Georgics by Claude Simon and, with Espen, admired the complexity of his style and the absence of any overriding perspective, everything was somehow at the same level, and chaotic, echoing the confusion that the world really was. But the best writing I read during this period was still Borges, I was attracted by both the adventure in it, which I knew from my childhood and didn't know I had been longing for until I had read him, and the way the images, all simple, carried significances almost endless in their complexity.

I wrote next to nothing. I played around with a story about a man who was tied to a chair in an apartment in Danmarksplass, he was tortured and in the end shot through the head, and when that happened I tried to slow time down to almost nothing, describe how the bullet penetrated the skin and bone, cartilage and fluid, into the brain and the various parts there because I loved the Latin terms, they sounded like names in the countryside, valleys and plains, but it was just nonsense, there was no point to any of it, and I deleted it. Two pages, six months' work. We went with the band to Gjøvik and recorded a demo, two of the songs were played on NRK, and we got a warm-up spot at Hulen during the Bergen International Festival. It went well, Studvest wrote that even though we weren't on the poster, we were the hit of the evening and were given another gig there, this time a whole evening on our own. It was packed, we were too nervous, little or nothing went right, on our recording a voice from the crowd yelled: This is bloody awful! But Studvest gave us a nice write-up again. This time I wasn't as flattered on the band's behalf as before because the journalist who wrote it came from the same place as Hans and had even played in several bands with him. When we started talking about taking on another guitarist, his name was suggested, no one had any objections and so he turned up at a practice session, he was withdrawn but not unassuming, and immediately got into the songs. His name was Knut Olav, he had long reddish hair, an open face, a clearly defined austere, almost connoisseur-like taste in music. He played the drums much better than me, probably the bass better than Pål, and it wouldn't have surprised me if he sang better than Hans. With him in the band we made a little more progress and I had someone new to test my mettle on. He said very little about himself, would never have dreamed of describing himself in rosy terms, not even indirectly, in the way that everyone pushes themselves forward, without wishing to give the impression that that is what they are doing. His face was open, his eyes were open, and although he wasn't considered introverted in social contexts, there was still something closed and secretive about him. He was one of the few who would drink through until day broke, one of those who would never go home if something was happening, a quality I shared with him, and so we often found ourselves sitting in an apartment somewhere in Bergen drinking coffee at eight o'clock in the morning, good and drunk, chatting about things we had both forgotten all about the next day. One of the conversations, however, did stick in my mind, I was rambling on about the universe, how it might open in the future, how we were getting to know more and more about it, and hence about ourselves, we were made of stardust, I said, I was well into the shiny, glittering, festive mode the combination of alcohol and the sight of stars in the sky could transport me to, when he said, it was quite the opposite, new discoveries would be inward, our future lay inward. Nanotechnology. Genetic engineering. Atomic power. All the power and all the explosiveness was to be found in the tiny, in the microscopic, not in the great, the macroscopic. I looked at him, of course he was right, we were on our way inward. Inward, that was the new outward.

I wrote a short story about a man who died, I told it in the first person singular, he was stretchered into the ambulance just below the underpass by Danmarksplass, his heart had stopped but his story went on, to the pathologist, in the coffin, in the cemetery, in the ground. Three months' work, two and a half pages, meaningless, deleted. One evening the police raided the apartment next door, their kitchen window faced my wall, two meters away, the following day it was in Bergensavisen, they had found a stash of weapons and fifty thousand kroner in cash. I took the newspaper down to Espen, we laughed, in shock; only a few nights ago we had come home drunk, gone into my kitchen to get a cup of coffee, shadows were moving behind the curtain on the other side, I opened the window and threw a liver-paste can in their direction, it hit the glass pane with a clatter, we shrank out of sight, nothing happened except that the curtain was pulled aside and a guy peered out. So they were bank robbers!

Mostly though I worked at Sandviken Hospital. Sometimes it felt as if my whole life was being lived there. The people I worked with were low-level, I needed that. The money I earned, I needed. And perhaps doing something else, something practical, something outside the university, gave me a different self-image, which I needed to keep myself going: the real purpose of what I was doing was writing. Everything converged on that fact, or was supposed to.

One Saturday evening I was alone at work, Mary phoned, not long before the night shift was about to begin.

"Hi," I said. "Did you forget something?"

"No," she said. "I'm here all alone and I thought you might like to pop by after work. We could share a bottle of wine or something."

I could feel the heat rising. What was she saying?

"I don't think so," I said. "I'm afraid I have to go home."

"I'll be frank with you, Karl Ove," she said. "I want to sleep with you. I know you have a girlfriend. But no one will find out. It's absolutely safe. I promise. Once. Then never again."

"But I can't," I said. "It's impossible. I'm sorry."

"You're absolutely sure? This is absolutely definite?"

Oh, how I wanted to shout YES, PLEASE! and run down to her.

"Yes, I can't. It's impossible."

"I see," she said. "I hope you don't think I'm stupid for asking so directly. I don't want you to think I'm stupid."

"No, no, no, are you crazy?" I said. "That's the last thing I would think."

"You promise me?"

"Yes."

"See you tomorrow then. Bye."

"Bye."

The morning came, I was nervous about meeting her again, but there wasn't any indication in her behavior that anything special had happened, she was exactly as she had always been, perhaps a touch more reserved toward me, that was all.

I thought about her offer every single day for several weeks. In a way I was glad I hadn't succumbed to the temptation, I didn't want to cheat on Gunvor, and provided I was sober, that wasn't difficult. In another way, when I thought about it, I burned with regret, because if I had been totally free I would have taken her up on it. But I couldn't. Next year I would be moving to Iceland with Gunvor, she would take her History exam at the university there, I would write full-time. Until then I would work as much as I could at Sandviken. Would wipe excrement off the walls, restrain residents with psychotic fits, would be hit in the face by one, go for endless walks inside the hospital limits or just outside, when we weren't driving around the district in one of their minivans.

Hans, who had become the editor of Studvest, asked if I was interested in reviewing books for him. I was, and I did. I slaughtered Atle Næss's novel about Dante and wrote a whole page about American Psycho, which also had a connection with Dante in that the protagonist reads some graffiti on a wall traveling through the town in a taxi: Lasciate ogni speranza, voi ch'entrate. The gates of hell here, now, Jesus, that was good. What a novel it was. What a novel. Hans asked if I would like to write a Christmas short story for them. I said yes, but I didn't manage it, I got no farther than a few lines about a guy on his way home in a bus for Christmas. I had been planning a kidnapping, someone being bound and tortured on Christmas Eve, but it was just a waste of time, like everything else I did. I read Paul Auster, The New York Trilogy, and thought, I could never do that. I made pizza for the patients one Saturday evening, it felt as though I was demeaning them as I did so. I went home to Mom's for Christmas, found a tenant for my place while I was away, one of Yngve's Arendal friends, went into Bergen and packed two full suitcases, said good-bye to Espen, caught the plane to Fornebu, then to Kastrup and from there to Keflavik, where the plane landed in the late evening. The darkness was dense and impenetrable, I saw nothing of the countryside I passed through an hour later in the airport bus, and I got no impression of the city I entered, which was Reykjavik. I jumped into a taxi, showed the driver the note Gunvor had given me with the street name, Gardastræti it was, we went past a lake, up a hill, the houses were big, like monuments, we stopped in front of one of them.

So this was where we were going to live. In an elegant townhouse in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean.

I paid, he took out the suitcases and passed them to me, I walked through the gates and up the path to the house. The door to the basement apartment opened, there was Gunvor, beaming. We embraced, I could feel how I had missed her. She had been here a week and showed me around our apartment, it was large and impersonally furnished, but it was ours, this is where we would live for the next six months. We went to bed and afterward we wanted to take a shower, but the water smelled like rotten eggs, I couldn't stand it, she said all the water smelled like this, it came from the volcanic soil, the terrible smell was sulfur.

A few weeks later I loved the smell, as I loved everything about Reykjavik and our life there. After she went to university in the morning, I would have a long breakfast alone before either walking into town and sitting in a café with my notebook or a novel, struck every day by the beauty of the people here, the girls were unbelievably beautiful, I had never seen girls like them, or I would take my swimming things and walk up to the local outdoor pool, where I would swim a thousand meters under the open sky, in rain as well as snow or sleet, before slowly lowering myself into a heitapottur, as it was called, the Icelanders' small hot pools. Afterward I went home to write. In the evenings we watched TV, I loved that, too, the language was so similar to Norwegian, it was so close in tone and sound, but completely incomprehensible. Gunvor made friends at the university, mostly other foreign students, and she acquired an Icelandic family friend, Einar, who was not only at our service twenty-four hours a day but also popped in at least four evenings a week. He had big black bags under his eyes, an incipient paunch, he worked and drank too much, but not so much that he didn't have time to drop by and ask if there was anything he could do for us. I never understood what he wanted, he never got anything back for all his exertions, at least not as far as I could see, and I wasn't too happy about that, he was like a leech, yet he was the only person I could drink with, beggars can't be choosers, I thought, and hung out in Icelandic bars with him, drunk and silent.

Through one of Gunvor's foreign friends I got to know an American about my age, he was interested in music, said he penned his own songs, was enthusiastic and naïve, we talked about forming a band, he knew an Icelander who played, one evening we went out to see him, he lived in a damp cellar, there was something nineteenth century about it, he coughed like a miner and was just as thin, and his wife smoked and carried around a baby and shouted at him, he just shrugged and took us into an even smaller room, crammed with all sorts of useless junk, where we could play, but first of all, he said in English, first we have to smoke. The joint made the rounds, he took out his guitar, Eric, as my American friend was called, took out his, and I was given a bucket to use as drums. It was a very ordinary bucket, red with a white handle, I turned it upside down, put it between my legs and started tapping and thumping on the bucket while the other two picked out a bluesy tune on their guitars and the baby screamed its lungs out next door.

Gunvor laughed so much she cried when I told her.

We visited the farm where she'd worked, they received her warmly, were shy with me, they spoke very little English, they said, but later that evening, driving to the community center to take part in a big do with all the others in the district, they thawed. I ate ram's testicles, buried shark, and other oddities, all washed down with their schnapps, and their reticence and shyness, which I had found so liberating as I was the same myself, disappeared in a heartbeat, suddenly, on all sides, the atmosphere soared to the rafters, soon I was sitting there arm in arm with my neighbors swinging from side to side belting out something similar to what they were singing. Everyone was drunk, everyone was happy, it was like me a hundred times over, and when the party was over, in the early hours, everyone drove home drunk. In our case, the cows had to be seen to, so after a whiskey in the kitchen with the farmer I followed him into the cowshed. While he staggered around with the muckrake groping for the cow fodder and straw bales, he told me to brush their teeth, a suggestion he found so amusing that he had to sit down so as not to topple over with laughter.

The wind was blowing outside. In Iceland the wind always blew, it gusted off the sea day and night. Once I was on my way to Nordens Hus to read some Norwegian newspapers when I saw an old lady blown over. I wrote three short stories and filled a whole notebook with comments on them and what I wanted to achieve in my writing. At night I dreamed about Dad, more frightened asleep than ever I was awake. Gunvor's girlfriends were boring, I avoided them as much as I could. A Swedish student, maybe ten years older than Gunvor and me, invited Einar and us to dinner, he was friendly, shy, had a big heart, lived in a fantastic apartment and served a gourmet dinner he must have spent all day preparing. We invited him back to our place, I found a recipe for lamb which looked delicious and we had lamb, Gunvor's farm had given us a bag of lamb and a bag of horsemeat. They looked the same, I took a risk, I made a mistake, and I didn't even get close to the picture of the meal the recipe showed with the bone of meat elegantly arranged with mushrooms, onions, and carrots, the meat slid off the bones, so what they got, our guests that Saturday evening, gathered around the table in our little kitchen, was horsemeat soup. Oh, it tasted absolutely dreadful, salty and horrible. But the Swede, Carl, nodded and smiled and said what I had made was very good. Einar, who was Icelandic enough to know this was horsemeat, said nothing, just smiled his inscrutable though not unfriendly smile. I began to get the picture, he had no friends. We were his friends.

We got drunk and went out. I had wondered about Carl all evening, there was something refined about him, even though he looked like a farmer, refined and perhaps a little feminine, and then there was the way he referred to his partner back home in Sweden, never by name, nevertheless something about the way he did this made me think the partner might have been a man.

I explained this to Gunvor and Einar, we were standing in a packed bar, the music was loud, I had to raise my voice to be heard.

"I think Carl might be a homo!" I shouted.

Einar stared at me with frenetic eyes. Then past me.

I turned. Oh my God, there was Carl.

He was crying.

And then he dashed out.

"Karl Ove," Gunvor said. "Run after him and apologize."

I did as she said. Out into the street into the hellish wind, a look up, nothing, a look down, there was Kallemann hurrying home.

I ran after him and caught up.

"Listen, Carl. I'm sorry," I said. "But that was what was on my mind and it just came out. I'm pretty drunk, you see. But I didn't mean to hurt you. I think you're a great guy anyway. I like you a lot. Gunvor also likes you a lot."

He looked at me and sniffled.

"I wanted to keep it a secret here," he said. "I didn't want anyone to know."

"But what does it matter!" I said. "Come on, let's go back to the others. We won't ever need to talk about it again. Come on. Let's have another gin and tonic!"

He dried his tears and joined me. This was the first gay man I had known. Afterward he began to mention his partner by name, some weeks later he came to Reykjavik, they invited us to dinner and it turned out he was fully informed about us and our lives there. Carl had talked us up, in his partner's eyes we were people of importance and I – so I understood – was a bit of an enigma. I had never told him what I was doing in Iceland, not even when Einar or Carl had asked me directly. I lazed around, swam, read, and at night, I had said once, I sat in front of the oven watching the bread I was baking slowly go golden brown and crispy. For me it was the other way around, for me Carl and his partner were the enigma, in their similarity, because how was it possible to look for the same? To want the same? To love the same?

For some reason, not long after, I ended up in a gay club. I had been boozing with Einar and, as so often, I wandered around town after we had said good-bye searching for places that were still open, wanting something to happen, anything actually, and that night I came across a cellar club, I went down, at first I didn't notice anything unusual, bought a drink and scanned the room, they were playing Bronski Beat, lots of people were dancing, I went to the toilet for a pee, and there, on the cubicle wall, was a poster of an enormous dick. I was so drunk it felt as if I was in the middle of a dream, went out, and yes, there were only men. Back on the street, my head bowed into the wind, someone called to me. I turned. A man of around thirty came running toward me.

"Sean!" he said. "Is it really you?"

"My name's not Sean," I said.

"Stop messing around," he said. "Where have you been? I never thought I'd see you again!"

"My name's Karl," I said.

"Why would you say that?" he said.

"Look," I said, taking my passport from my inside pocket. "Karl. Do you see?"

"You're Sean," he said. "You're Sean. You're Sean."

He took a few steps back as he scrutinized me, then turned on his heel and disappeared down a side street.

I shook my head, continued through the lifeless windblown streets, let myself in, got into bed beside Gunvor, who would soon have to get up, and crashed out as if I had been shot in the head.

From the first moment we decided to move to Iceland, I'd thought about writing articles there and selling them to newspapers. When it transpired that Einar knew Bragi, the bass player in the Sugarcubes, I didn't hesitate, I managed to get an interview arranged and went to his house. He'd just had a child, whom he showed me, we sat down at the kitchen table, I asked my questions, he answered, and as they had just released a new record, which perhaps wasn't as good as their debut album, although better than the follow-up, and with an incredibly catchy song as the opener, "Hit," there was no problem getting a newspaper to buy it. Bragi smiled when I told him which newspaper: Klassekampen. It must have sounded absolutely crazy to a foreigner's ears. As I was about to leave he said they were going to be playing in Reykjavik soon and I absolutely had to go backstage and see them afterward.

Gunvor was at the farm then, so I went alone, got so drunk on schnapps that before the gig I was rocking back and forth on one of the enormous lighting stands, it was highly dangerous, but I didn't give it a thought. A guard ran over and told me to stop, Yes, sir, I said, and left. If it had been Norway I would have been manhandled and slung onto the street, but here people were used to all sorts; because of an earlier ban on beer almost everyone drank schnapps and when beer was finally introduced the habit was so established that beer was almost exotic. Besides, half a liter cost a small fortune. Schnapps was what they drank, so it wasn't just me staggering around town. At night the lower part of the main street was packed with young people. The first time I saw it I wondered what on earth was going on, Gunvor told me it was always like this here. They stood elbow to elbow and were drunk. Iceland was full of such idiosyncrasies, which I saw but didn't understand.

The band started. They were good, and playing in front of their home audience, the gig was amazing. After the performance I went backstage. I was stopped, I claimed I was from the Norwegian newspaper Klassekampen and, in fact, had arranged to meet Bragi here. The guard came back, it was OK, I walked down the aisle, entered a crowded room, everyone was excited and in high spirits, the atmosphere was bordering on wild, Bragi was perched on the edge of a chair and waved me over. He introduced me to the drummer, said something to him in Icelandic, I heard the word Klassekampen and they both burst into laughter.

I had nothing to say, nevertheless I was happy, Bragi handed me a beer, I sat looking at the motley, outré selection of people around me, particularly at Björk of course, it was hard to take your eyes off her. The Sugarcubes were one of the best bands in the world at the moment, right now the room I was in constituted the epicenter of rock music. I was already looking forward to telling Yngve.

Bragi got up.

"We're off to a party. Want to come?"

I nodded.

"Just stick with me," he said.

I did. I stayed close to him amid the crowd of musicians and artists walking through the town, down to the harbor, where Björk had her apartment. It was on two floors with a broad staircase in the middle and was soon full. Björk herself sat on the floor by a ghetto blaster, surrounded by CDs, playing one song after the other. I was so tired that I could hardly stand. I slumped at the top of the staircase, leaned my head against the balusters, and closed my eyes. But I didn't sleep, something was rising from within, from my stomach and up through my chest, soon it would be in my throat, I jumped to my feet, took the steps to the first floor, ran to the bathroom, opened the door, bent down over the toilet bowl, and spewed up a magnificent yellow and orange cascade that splashed everywhere.

Some weeks later Mom visited us, we went to Gullfoss and Geysir and Thingvellir with her one day, another down to the south coast, where the sand was black and there were immense solitary rocks standing in the sea.

We went to an art museum together, the walls and floor were completely white, and with the sun flooding in through large skylights the light inside was almost aflame. Through the windows I could see the sea, blue with white crests of waves and breakers, a large white-clad mountain rose in the distance. In these surroundings, in this bright white room on the edge of the world, the art was lost.

Was art only an inner phenomenon? Something that moved within us and between us, all that which we couldn't see but marked us, indeed, which was us? Was this the function of landscape painting, portraits, sculptures, to draw the external world, so essentially alien to us, into our inner world?

When Mom went home I accompanied her to Keflavik Airport and said my good-byes there, on the way back I read Stephen Hero by James Joyce, the first book I had bought by him and quite evidently his weakest, it was also unfinished and not meant for publication, but there was something to learn from it, too, how he slowly transformed the autobiographical element, which was obvious here, into something else in Ulysses. Stephen Dedalus was a strong young character, summoned home to Dublin by his father's telegram, "Mother dying come home," but in the novel, Ulysses, that is, this arrogant brilliant young man was perhaps first and foremost a place where things happened. In Stephen Hero he was a person, distinct from the world around him, in Ulysses the world flowed through him and the story, Augustin, Thomas Aquinas, Dante, Shakespeare, everything moved through him and the same was true of Bloom, except that in him it wasn't the highest and the best that was in motion, that flowed, but rather the town with its people and phenomena, advertising slogans and newspaper articles, he thought about what everyone else thought about, he was Everyman. There was, however, another level above them, namely the place from where they were observed, which was the language, and all the insights and prejudices the various forms of language embraced, almost in secret.

But in Stephen Hero there was none of this, there was just the character, Stephen, in other words, Joyce, set apart from the world, which was described but never integrated. This development culminated, from what I could infer, in his final book, Finnegans Wake, which I had bought but hadn't read, where the characters had disappeared into the language, which lived its own everyman life.

I jumped off the bus at the stop between the university and the landmark building Perlan and walked the last part home through the embassy district. It was raining and misty, I felt empty, like a nobody, as a consequence of saying good-bye perhaps. In the apartment Gunvor was huddled up in the armchair reading with a cup of tea on the table beside her.

I hung up my coat and went in.

"What are you reading?" I said.

"About the famine in Ireland," she said. "The Great Famine. Did she get off OK?"

"Yes."

"It was nice having her here."

"Yes, it was."

"What are you going to do this evening?"

I shrugged.

She was wearing a shirt, with nothing underneath, and tracksuit bottoms. I wanted her and leaned over her. It had been a long time, it had bothered me, not for my part because I just wanted to have some peace, but for hers, she might have thought there was something wrong, that I didn't want her.

But there wasn't. I just wanted space around me, and I had that here, walking alone around an unfamiliar town during the day, swimming and sitting in cafés, and during the night writing at my desk while she slept in the bedroom, but even this space was too small, even there she came too close.

I was happy, therefore my desire was so great that everything else was swept away. Then I couldn't understand why I had been abstaining, there was nothing I wanted more, and afterward we were close again, as we had been when we first got together, then it had been only us two and not a word had to be said for it to be like this. Everything lay in the attraction and the pleasure, it looked after itself. But without it the distance had to be broken down or counteracted, with words or actions, and if I didn't want to or didn't have enough strength to sustain my desire, we were just two young people living together, sharing nothing more than age and culture.

She had never done anything bad to me. She had been good for me, always wanting the best for me. She had no defects, flaws, or shortcomings. She wanted only good and she did good. The defects, flaws, and shortcomings were all mine. I tried as hard as I could to hide them from her, and I was usually successful, but it was always there, inside me, a shadow I cast, and it gave me a bad conscience. I wanted to be out of this, I wanted to be alone, then it would disappear as it wouldn't affect anyone else, I would be left with it. But to be alone I would have to leave her, end what she had invested so much into and into which, in a way, I too had invested so much. She often told me she loved me, and I didn't want to hurt her, not for anything in the world, I didn't want to turn away from her, from someone who loved me so much.

Everything was good again this evening though. I had a shower, walked barefoot over the wall-to-wall carpeting, a feeling I liked very much, she watched TV, I sat down beside her, laid my legs across hers, she did simultaneous translation whenever I asked, but it didn't happen often, nearly all the pictures on the Icelandic news program were of fishing boats or fish auctions.

She went to bed, I switched on my computer and began to write. The telephone rang, I answered, there was silence at the other end.

"Who was that?" Gunvor shouted from the bedroom.

"No one," I said. "Weren't you going to sleep?"

"Yes, but the phone woke me up."

Now and then there were voices at the other end when we picked up the phone although no one had called or dialed a number. It was strange, but there were embassies everywhere and right below us, over the road, was the Russian Embassy, and it seemed to me the telephone cables in the district were under such heavy surveillance that the Icelandic authorities had lost sight of which were which. The country had a population of only two hundred fifty thousand people, it was impossible for them to maintain a high level in all the fields a modern state requires.

I switched off the lamps in the hall and the living room, making the desk with the computer a little island of light in the darkness, put on my headset, and started to write.

One short story was about a man in a swimming hall, the prosthesis made an appearance, propped up against the changing-room wall, but I was unable to develop it from there into something that wasn't vacuous. The descriptions were good, I had spent several weeks on them, but that wasn't enough. One and a half pages, one and a half months. I looked at it, put it to one side, looked at the next, a man with a camera walking around town taking photos, at the margin of one picture he sees someone he knows but hasn't seen in ten years or so and is reminded of the summer they'd spent together when the man in the photo's girlfriend had drowned. She had swum a few meters from the quay, at the bottom of the sea there were bits of masonry and reinforced steel from the work on the quay two years before, and she had dived down, perhaps three meters below the surface, and tied her hands to the metal. That was how they found her, with her hands bound, her hair drifting back and forth in the currents, all as a storm loomed over the island, with the sky black and vast.

Three pages, two months' work.

The problem with it was that I didn't believe it, a woman drowning herself, how could you make that seem realistic?

I put it aside and opened a new file, took out my notebook, and flipped through the ideas I had jotted down, decided on the following: man with a suitcase in a train compartment.

The next morning I had finished it. Ten pages. I was happy, not because it was good but because it was finished and because there were so many pages. Over the past two years I had written in all somewhere between fifteen and twenty pages. To write ten pages in a night was amazing. Perhaps there might be enough for a collection of short stories by summer after all?

The next weekend we went to the Vestmannaeyjar Archipelago, caught the bus down to the south coast and from there a boat over the sea. We went on deck and took pictures of each other, Gunvor with the hood of her blue raincoat over her head and raindrops on her glasses, me with one hand on the railing, the other pointing to the endless ocean like Leiv Eiriksson.

Then the islands appeared, they came out of nowhere and were a powerful sight, tall steep rocks, clad on one side with mist-shimmering grass, where sheep were grazing, up there they hung like little clouds, on the other, steep and without any vegetation, the rocks plunged vertically to the sea and birds were perched everywhere, on all the ledges and crags.

The ferry glided slowly between two of the rocks, inside, a natural harbor opened and we went ashore, left our things at the guesthouse and walked around the island, which was tiny. The houses nestled just beneath the volcano, the top ones were covered with lava after an eruption in the early 1970s. We walked up to the top of the volcano, where the ash was still hot.

"I wouldn't mind living here," I said as we strolled back down to the guesthouse. "That would be fantastic."

"What would you do?"

I shrugged.

"Just be here. On an island in the middle of the sea. What more could you ask for?"

She laughed.

"Quite a lot basically."

But I meant it. Renting a house here, in the middle of the sea, surrounded by shimmering grass, beneath a still-hot volcano. I could imagine that.

One evening Gunvor called Einar, he worked with computers, now we were having problems with ours, would he mind coming to have a look? He didn't waste any time, an hour later he was sitting in front of the computer in our sitting room working. Gunvor took him some tea, I asked him what the prognosis was, he said it wasn't a big problem, he would soon have it cracked. He stayed a while, we chatted about this and that, he was interested in everything we did, but never said much about himself. I knew he lived on his own, that he worked a lot, that he knew half of Reykjavik, at least judging by all the people he exchanged a few words with on a night out.

"When's your brother coming?" he said, standing in the hall and putting on his jacket.

"Next week," I said. "Perhaps you could take us out and show us the town?"

"Consider it done," he said. "I'll do it with pleasure. Just give me a ring."

And then he was gone.

Yngve came with his friend Bendik and Åse, Bendik's girlfriend. I met them at the airport, happy that they were actually coming to visit me, happy they were going to stay with us, and horrified at the same time, I had nothing to contribute, nothing to say, and they were going to be here for nearly a week.

I made dinner, Bendik said it was really good, I looked down and blushed, everyone noticed. They rented a car, we drove to the Geysir District, Bendik had brought some eggs with him, which he boiled in a tiny pool of hot water. The geyser itself was dead, there were no more eruptions, but jets of water could still burst forth, if you poured in enough green soap, they would spout up as in the old days. But that was something you only did on special occasions, as far as I was informed, during state visits and the like, so we had to make do with its little brother, Strokkur, which erupted every fifteen minutes or so. After the eruption the water lay still, it looked like any water, a shiny surface reflecting the grayish sky, but not long afterward the ground beneath us began to roar and soon the water rose, formed a dome, which then suddenly exploded into an enormous pillar of water. Steam and water everywhere in the air around us. Everywhere on the ground there were small simmering, bubbling springs. The terrain was a vegetationless wasteland.

I could have watched Strokkur all day, but soon we were off again, searching for a pool where we could swim. The idea of it appealed to everyone, bathing in scalding, hot steaming water outdoors in the middle of a wilderness. We saw some steam a few kilometers away, drove toward it, there was a pool, we made do with that, me silent, serious, tormented by the thought that I was silent and serious. Especially together with Bendik, who chatted and laughed nonstop and was the type to say whatever came into his mind. You're so quiet, Karl Ove, what's up, have you shit your pants or what? They were like beings possessed when they discovered how good the shops in Reykjavik were, bought running shoes, jeans, old sweatshirts, jackets, and CDs of Icelandic bands, which were the new big thing. They also liked the bars, we went out every night, to the first one with Einar, who was much more passive and reticent if Yngve, Bendik, and Åse were there than he usually was with us, when he tended to take the initiative. After a few hours we were in some bar drinking schnapps and Einar said he'd have to leave us, he had to meet someone, have a good time, see you soon, he said to me, and slipped into the night. I felt a little sorry for him, Gunvor and I were, it seemed, his arena, a place where he could be important, however I couldn't make this add up, he clearly knew lots of people in lots of places, how could he possibly need us? But a few minutes after he had gone I had forgotten all about him, the alcohol was having an effect, I was thawing, starting to open up, I was getting higher and higher as the night wore on, but at a certain point it turned, I felt a need to destroy something, hit someone, I hated everything, myself and my whole damned life, but I said nothing, did nothing, just stood there drinking, more and more out of my skull, and when I arrived home I got it into my head that I should tell Gunvor what I had been thinking for the last year, I was completely addle-brained, saw nothing of what I had around me, I was obsessed with one idea, suddenly and for no reason: to tell the truth.

She was asleep, I had been in the kitchen drinking, now I woke her up and said what was on my mind, everything.

"You're drunk, Karl Ove," she said. "You don't mean what you're saying. Please say you don't mean this."

"I mean it," I said. "And now I'm going."

I opened the window and jumped out. Walked down to the road, under the light May sky, and on to the town, up and down the streets, all dead and still, until I was so tired I started looking for a place to sleep. After a few blocks I found a flat-roofed garage beside a private house, clambered up, lay down, and fell asleep.

I was insanely cold when I woke up, it had rained, I was soaked through. Vaguely I remembered what had happened. But not what I had said.

Was it all over now? Was everything ruined?

I sat on the roof, dazed, climbed down a second later, so that I wouldn't be found there, and staggered homeward.

They were having breakfast when I arrived. Bendik smiled, Yngve was serious, Gunvor wouldn't meet my eye, and Åse acted as if nothing had happened.

"I'm sorry," I said, standing before them. "I got too drunk last night."

"You can say that again," Bendik said.

"Where have you been?" Gunvor said.

"I slept on a roof somewhere in town," I said.

"You're going to have to stop drinking, Karl Ove," Yngve said. "We were actually frightened for you. Do you understand?"

"Yes," I said. "Sorry. But now I have to go to bed. I'm on the point of collapse."

Gunvor and I went out for a talk when I woke up. I said I hadn't meant any of what I had said, I didn't know why I had said it, I was two different people, one when I drank and one when I didn't drink, she knew that, but I love you, I do love you, I said, and if what I had said, which I didn't even know, never completely vanished but lay between us, we continued to stay together, what we had was precious, especially for me. I decided to cut down on my drinking, that was where the problem lay, but the very next day I was out again, it was the last night, the following day I would be flying back to Norway with Yngve, Bendik, and Åse while Gunvor would stay on for a few more weeks, we had arranged that a long time ago, and it felt good, I had outgrown my life here, what had been wonderful before, the vast sky, the windy streets I walked alone, the swimming pools and cafés, the writing at night, our trips out of Reykjavik on weekends, everything had become infected, in a way, become entangled with the darkness of my inner life, the inadequacy of my soul, and so Bergen – with the job at Sandviken Hospital and its implicit renunciation of responsibility for my own life – appeared attractive.

Gunvor and Åse went home early, and Yngve and Bendik wanted to go too, Yngve almost dragged me, but the bars were still open, it was ridiculous to leave now, you can head on back, I'll follow you soon. What are you going to do out alone? Yngve said. I might meet someone I know, I said. Who knows what might happen?

And in fact I did. When I entered Filmbarin there was Einar at the bar. He waved and smiled when he saw me, I went over to him, we drank and chatted until the bar closed an hour later. He knew someone who was having a party, soon we were up in an attic flat somewhere with five or six others, each holding a glass of whiskey in our hands.

I lit a cigarette, he leaned forward with a little smile on his lips.

"Nice short stories," he said.

I stared at him.

"What are you talking about?" I said.

"The short stories you wrote. They're good. You've got talent."

"How the hell would you know?" I said, getting up. "Have you read them? How . . . ?"

"I copied them when I was fixing your computer," he said. "You've never wanted to say what you were doing here. I was curious. So when I saw your file I copied it."

"Jesus Christ!" I said. "You little shit!"

I turned and walked off, down the stairs, cigarette in one hand, glass in the other, outside into a backyard, where I was going to hurl the glass against the wall, but changed my mind, I wasn't that drunk, instead I put it down on a small transformer, or whatever it was, the little box that hung on the wall, went into the street, down toward the tiny Parliament building and uphill to our apartment, where everyone was fast asleep.

After six months on the desolate treeless black island in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean the sight of trees below the plane seemed unreal, and when, a few hours later, we were walking through the warm crowded streets of Copenhagen, with lush green parks and avenues, there was a touch of paradise about everything, as though it was too good to be true for the world to be like this.

I had told Yngve the strange story about Einar, he just shook his head and said the little he had seen of him hadn't been very confidence-inspiring. The fact that he had read my short stories was, strictly speaking, of little importance, and I had regretted my reaction by the time I was leaving, perhaps I should have asked him a few questions and got a more comprehensive evaluation of the stories. But that wasn't the main issue, the main issue was the way he had acquired them and why he had done it.

Who copies other people's files? And why did he tell me about it?

What did he want with us?

Some problems are geographical, this was one of them. When we walked through the swing doors at Flesland Airport later that evening and emerged in the square where the airport bus was, neither Einar nor Iceland was in my thoughts. Late May in Bergen, that was green mountainsides, light evenings, energized people, aquiver with life. We couldn't go home and sleep, we had to go out, the air was warm and bright, all the cafés and restaurants were full, and the first stars were twinkling in the gently darkening sky.

The next afternoon I knocked on Espen's door. I hadn't seen him for six months, it felt like a long time, before then we had generally spoken every single day.

I told him a bit about Iceland, he told me a bit about what had happened here: he had taken Philosophy this year and done some writing.

"How's it going with the manuscript then?" I said.

"It's finished," he said.

"Terrific!" I said. "Have you sent it around?"

He nodded.

"It's been accepted as well."

"Accepted? Are you going to make your debut?"

Green with envy, I stared at him as I squeezed out a smile.

He nodded again.

"How fantastic!" I said.

He smiled, fidgeted with the lighter on the wooden board he used as a table.

"Which publisher?"

"Oktober. I've got a really good editor there. Torleiv Grue."

"What's the title going to be?"

"Slow Dance from a Burning House, I think."

"Good. That's a great title. When will it come out? In the autumn?"

"Yes, probably. There's still a bit of work to do."

"Yes, I'm not at all surprised," I said.

In the kitchen the cafetière stopped hissing. Espen got up and went out, returning with two cups of steaming coffee.

"What about you?" he said. "Did you get anything written in Iceland?"

"A little. Some short stories. They're not that good, but . . . at least I was working."

"Vinduet is going to have a debutant issue this autumn," he said. "I thought of you when I heard. Perhaps you could send one in? I've already sent one."

"It can't hurt anyway," I said. "A rejection in the hand is worth ten publications in the bush."

"Ha ha."

My jealousy burned for an hour, in which time I felt little goodwill, but then it passed, he had always been in a different place from me, had written brilliant things from the first moment I met him, and if there was anyone I knew who deserved this, it was him.

He was twenty-one years old and was going to make his debut. It was fantastic. And he had opened up literature for me. He had been so selfless, he never kept anything to himself, he didn't carefully guard his writings, he didn't hold back any insights, Espen was never like that, he had always shared everything and it wasn't to be generous, to create a good impression, to do a good deed, but because he was like that, he bubbled over with enthusiasm he wanted to share with me.

Was I going to begrudge him his debut?

I wished it for him with the whole of my heart. If it rankled it was because it threw me and my life into such stark relief.

"How does your summer look?" he said.

"I'm working at Sandviken Hospital. Then I might go to Kristiansand and visit my dad. Yes, and I suppose I might spend a few weeks in Jølster. And you?"

"I'm definitely going to Oslo. And then I'll have to find myself somewhere to live."

"Why?"

"Haven't you heard? We've been given notice. They're going to demolish the building."

"What?"

"Yes, we've got to be out by the summer."

"Oh, shit. That is bad news."

"Shall we look for a place together?"

"You mean share an apartment?"

"Yes."

"Why not?" I said.

I had been given a month's contracted work at Sandviken and they seemed to be pleased to see me on the ward, well, not the patients, they were as indifferent as ever, but those working there, and I slipped back into institutional life as though I had never been away. I printed the short story about the man with the suitcase and sent it to Vinduet, without much optimism, and stopped writing because the job was taking too much of my energy and because I didn't feel like it. Gunvor was working in her village, so on my free evenings I mostly sat at home reading. I went on the town a few times with Yngve, we also had a couple of sessions with the band, but it was all halfhearted. In the two years we had been together we'd played Hulen twice, Garage once, we had recorded a demo and performed one song in a proper studio, which appeared on a record of selected Bergen bands, and that was good, but if we wanted to go any farther we had to invest more time, that is, go all out, and no one really wanted to do that, it appeared.

One night I couldn't stay in, the summer weather was too overpowering, staying in and reading seemed unhealthy, so I went out, through the park, and down to Café Opera. Yngve's friend Geir, whom I didn't know, but who had rented my flat while I was in Iceland, was there, I bought myself a beer and joined him and his friends. It was a weekday, not very busy, but a couple of girls I half knew from the first year at university came in, I chatted with them, one was blond and good-looking, I'd had my eye on her before, she was one of those who gladdened my heart when I looked around the reading room, for no other reason than that she was lovely, so when Café Opera closed and I was in my most upbeat mood, I invited almost everyone there to a party at my place, I still had some tax-free booze left: Geir, one of his friends, the two girls, and six Africans. I didn't know the six, but I had spoken to them in the café and thought they might not know that many Norwegians, perhaps they hadn't really got into life here, and asked them if they would like to come to a party so that we could talk and drink some more. The one I spoke to nodded and smiled, yes, thank you, that's kind of you. As we drove through the warm light night, however, it wasn't the Africans who were on my mind but the blond girl, and she, sitting on the other side of the rear seat, must have been thinking about me because when we entered, after I had paid for the three taxis, and sat down to drink – the crowd at Café Opera had seemed small, but they filled my apartment, when had there last been eleven people here all at once? – she looked at me, asked me what I was doing now, how I was, what I really thought about the first year and about them.

"About you?"

"Yes? You seemed so arrogant."

"Arrogant? Me?"

"Yes. You were the one who had read Dante and had been to the Writing Academy. One of the brainy ones."

"Brainy? I didn't know a thing."

She laughed, I laughed, we went into the kitchen, she leaned against the wall, I propped up the counter, we chatted but I was hardly listening to what she said and a moment later I leaned over and kissed her. Went closer, held her, squeezed her to me, she was soft and good and not unwilling. I whispered that we could go to the room next door. It was Jone's, but he was in Stavanger, and we sank into his huge water bed. Oh, she was wonderful. I lay on top of her, she had her arms wrapped around me, then I heard a movement behind us and turned.

It was one of the Africans. He was watching us in the semidarkness.

"You have to leave," I said. "We want to be left in peace."

He didn't move.

"You can't stay here, as I'm sure you know," I said. "Will you please leave the room?"

He didn't move.

"Don't take any notice of him," she said. "Come here to me."

I did, and it was soon over. When I rolled over onto my back the African was on his way out of the room.

"That was quick," she said.

Was she being sarcastic?

No, she was smiling and stroked my cheek.

"I've wanted to do that for a long time," she said. "Shame it was so short. But I'll be off now. It's late. See you."

She left, I fell asleep, and when I woke up, with a pounding headache, the apartment was empty. The two bottles of schnapps were gone as well as the wallet I had left on the hat shelf.

That was all my money.

I sat down and rested my head in my hands.

Why had I done it? Why, why, why?

The guilt I felt was boundless. The shame burned in me from the moment I woke to the moment I fell asleep. The thought of what I had done didn't leave me. It was always there.

This was hell. Being torn into pieces by remorse, this was hell. And it was my own fault, it was me who had done it.

Why, why, why?

I didn't want this. I wanted to live a calm, quiet, warm and intimate life with Gunvor, that was what I wanted and it should have been easy to achieve, it wasn't black magic, it was something everyone was capable of and always had been. Gunvor, was she unfaithful? Had she ever been?

No, of course not.

Had she ever thought of being unfaithful?

No, of course not.

She was decent, sincere, honest, kind, good.

She must never find out what happened.

The blond girl had said she would be working at a hotel in Hardanger that summer, I called the next day and got through to her. I had dreaded this, it was degrading and humiliating, but I had to do it, there was no way around it.

She was happy to hear my voice.

"Hi!" she said. "Thanks for last night!"

"That's actually why I'm calling," I said. "I've got a girlfriend. She can't find out what happened. Can you promise me you won't tell anyone? Can you promise me it'll stay between us?"

She went quiet.

"Of course," she said. "Are you ringing to tell me that?"

"Yes."

"OK," she said.

"OK?"

"Bye."

"Bye."

I waited several hours before ringing Gunvor, I wanted the conversation with her to be as pure and uncontaminated by what had happened as possible.

Of course she was pleased to hear from me. Of course she missed me. Of course she was looking forward to us seeing each other again.

I had known I wasn't worthy of her. But I clung on. I lied, and the distance between us grew, although she was unaware of it. I hated myself, and I should have ended it, not for my sake but for hers, she deserved better.

Why didn't I do it?

I was on the verge, but I couldn't.

The next morning I caught the bus to Sandviken, and there was some comfort in that, even the smell of the institution, even the comfortless sight of people immured there provided some comfort. This was life, and what I had done was also life. I couldn't escape it, I had to accept it. What I had done, I had done. Yes, I was distraught now and would be for weeks, but time dims everything, even the worst horrors, it interposes itself, minute by minute, hour by hour, day by day, month by month, and it is so immense that ultimately what happened completely dissolves and is gone. It is there, but so much time, so many minutes, hours, days, and months lie in between that it can no longer be felt. And it's feelings that count, not thoughts, not memories. And slowly I came out of it, all the while cleaving to the notion, the redeeming notion, that if she doesn't know, it doesn't exist.

It didn't exist, she came back to Bergen and at first my guilt flared up again, I was a liar and a traitor, a bad person, an evil person, for some weeks that was what I thought when I was with her, but then that too dulled and lay like a constant though manageable emotion slightly beyond my consciousness.

It hurt when she smiled, it hurt when she said she loved me and I was the best thing that had ever happened to her.

Then it didn't hurt anymore.

Espen and I searched halfheartedly for an apartment over some weeks, we went and had a look at a couple, however neither was suitable, instead we moved into separate places: Espen to an apartment out of town, me to Asbjørn's former apartment in Nøstet.

One day I received a letter from Vinduet. I opened the envelope and read the contents at full throttle standing next to the mailboxes in the hall. There had been more than one thousand five hundred stories sent in, thirty had been selected, and they were happy to inform me that mine was one of them.

I couldn't take this in and reread it.

Yes, it really did say that. My story would be published in the debutant issue.

I walked down the steps into my new apartment, sat down with the letter in my hand and read it again.

There had to be a mistake. Or else the standard of the contributions had been exceptionally low. But fifteen hundred texts? From five hundred authors? Could they all have been that bad?

That wasn't possible.

So they must have mixed me up with someone else. Kramsgård or Knutsgård or something.

I laughed.

I had been accepted!

A few days later I was called up to do compulsory national service. I had to go to Hustad toward the end of autumn and then I would have a work placement somewhere for sixteen months. Basically that suited me fine, more than two years at Sandviken Hospital was probably enough, and I didn't want to study.

I continued working, I also continued writing book reviews for Studvest as well as doing interviews, which Hans suggested, mostly with writers since that was my field, but with academics too and any other people a student newspaper might be interested in presenting. I had nothing to do with the rest of the paper, I went in and picked up a tiny tape recorder, did the interview, wrote it up and delivered it, that was it. Hans liked what I did and he said many others did too.

Just before I left for Hustad two copies of the debutant issue arrived in the post. I found my contribution, it was called "Déjà Vu," beside the title there was a picture of me, a little passport photo they had blown up, and in the introduction below my name, date of birth, and profession, which I had given as "unemployed." It looked good, no posing, no boasting, in fact, as near to nothing as you could get in a brief bio.

The debutant issue was reviewed in all the big newspapers, not least because the previous one, which had come out in 1966, had contained stories by Øystein Lønn, Espen Haavardsholm, Knut Faldbakken, Kjersti Ericsson, Olav Angell, and Tor Obrestad, so when Vinduet did the same twenty-six years later everyone had an eye on the possibility that an equally strong generation might be in the offing. The conclusion most papers drew was that this was not the case. In all the reviews names were bandied around as more promising than others; mine was not among them. That was understandable: my story was one of the weakest contributions and perhaps should not have been there at all. By the time I caught the plane up to Molde and the bus from there to Hustadvika, I had put all this to the back of my mind. I would soon be twenty-four and in the past few years my life had stood still, I hadn't developed in any direction, hadn't done anything new, I had only continued the pattern that had formed during the first few months in Bergen. When I looked around me now, I saw no openings anywhere, just more of the same everywhere. National service came heaven sent. It gave me sixteen months to defer decisions. Everything would be decided for me for more than a year, I wouldn't have any responsibility for my life, at least not the part to do with studies, work, and career.

Early one morning one of the staff at Hustad came into my room and woke me. There was a telephone call for me. It was only six o'clock, I realized something had happened and hurried down to the phone booth at the end of the hallway, lifted the receiver to my ear.

"Hello?" I said.

"Hi, it's Mom."

"Hi."

"I'm afraid I've got some bad news, Karl Ove. It's Grandpa. He died last night."

"Oh no."

"He died on the way to the hospital. He called Kjellaug in the evening, she called for an ambulance and Jon Olav went over. He was there when Grandpa died. I don't think he suffered. It was quick."

"That's good anyway," I said.

"Yes," Mom said.

"He was old," I said.

"Yes, in the end."

The funeral was due to take place in a week, I applied for leave, was granted it, flew down to Bergen a few days later, caught the boat to Rysjedalsvika with Gunvor, Mom picked us up, drove us through the rainy November countryside, across the small mountain district to Åfjorden, where Grandpa had lived his whole life. Born in 1908. To parents who lived in straitened circumstances. Everyone out here did. A mother who died while he was still small. A father who built houses and worked on trawlers. His father married again later in life and had a daughter. When he fell ill while fishing one winter in the early 1930s and died straight afterward in Florø Hospital, Grandpa laid claim to the house where the new wife and the little daughter were living. There was a court case, Grandpa appealed to the Norwegian Supreme Court and won. His father's wife and his half sister had to move out and Grandpa took over the house, where he had lived until now. He got married in 1940, to Kirsti Årdal, had four children between 1942 and 1954, ran the small farm with her, worked as a driver, kept mink, bees, a few cows, some chickens, and cultivated soft fruit. All the children apart from the youngest moved away, Grandpa retired, his eldest daughter was an ungdomsskole teacher, the next a nursing teacher, and the youngest a psychologist, while his only son was a ship's pipefitter and a poet. That was how it was, that was how things turned out, now it was over.

We drove up the hill to the house, opened the doors, and got out. It was raining, the heels of my shoes sank into the soft gravel as I opened the trunk and took out the suit bag and little suitcase.

His blue overalls hung on the hook in the hall and his black cap with the short peak. His boots were on the floor.

Voices came from the living room, I put down the luggage and went in. Kjellaug, Ingunn, Mård, and Kjartan were there, they hugged us and asked how Gunvor and I were getting on in Bergen. Ingunn asked if we were hungry. There was a happiness in the room, there always was when they met. I thought, this is what he has left behind: Kjellaug, Sissel, Ingunn, and Kjartan; their husbands: Magne, Kai Åge, and Mård; their children: Ann Kristin, Jon Olav, Ingrid, Yngve, Karl Ove, Yngvild, Odin, and Sølve. Tomorrow we would bury him. Now we would eat and talk.

The mist drifted in great sheets above the dense dark green, bordering on black, spruce trees on the hillside across the mere. It was nine o'clock, Mom asked if I would mind scattering spruce sprigs over the road by the gate. This was an old custom. I went down in the rain, laid sprigs over the gravel, looked up at the house, the windows aglow in the gray morning. I cried. Not because of death and its coldness but life and its warmth. I cried because of the goodness that existed. I cried because of the light in the mist, I cried because of the living people in the dead man's house, and I thought, I can't waste my life.

Jon Olav was supposed to hold a speech in church, he was crying so much he couldn't get out a word. He tried, failed, whenever he opened his mouth to speak another sob emerged. When the service was over we carried the coffin through the church into the waiting hearse. We joined Mom, drove slowly through the village, past the house, to the cemetery, which was situated on a hill above the fjord, where the grave stood open in readiness. We carried the coffin over. We sang, we sounded so strangely fragile in the enormous space. Beneath us lay the fjord, gray and heavy; on the opposite side, the mountain plunged vertically into the sea, wrapped in mist and cloud. The priest threw earth onto the coffin. Earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust. For a moment Mom stood alone in front of the open grave. She bowed her head, a fresh wave of sobs went through me, the last, for as we left to go to the community center, where hot meat broth was being served, the mood lightened, it was over, now life would continue without him.

I traveled back to Hustad, started calling around the places that employed conscientious objectors in Bergen, got an immediate nibble at Student Radio, as I had two years' experience of local radio, and after a few days of Christmas holiday at home with Mom in Jølster I went up to the Student Center for my first day as a conscientious objector. The door to the open-plan office on the first floor, where Student Radio, Studvest, and many other student organizations were located, was locked, so I waited downstairs for the manager to arrive, paced back and forth, reading the notices, looking at books Studia had displayed, sat down and lit a cigarette, nearly an hour had passed, what was this, had I got the wrong day?

An hour and a half after the time we had arranged he appeared.

Was that him?

A fat, long-haired guy with glasses approached. He was wearing a denim jacket, jeans, and a pair of the ankle-high yellow and black soccer boots with rubber studs we wore when we were small, before soccer became organized and we had real boots. One night three years ago I had been boozing and smoking hash in his studio apartment. It felt as if the gates of hell had opened. How could he be the manager?

"Hi, hi," he said.

"Hi," I said. "Are you the manager of Student Radio?"

"Yeah, baby."

"I was at a party at your place, do you remember? Long time ago."

"Yeah, you were pretty far gone, weren't you?"

"No, I wasn't. But you were!"

He laughed, a low chuckle. Laughter was an integral part of him, it seemed to flow around him, he laughed at nearly everything that was said.

Then he became serious again.

"Something happened that night. We realized ourselves we'd gone too far. I think we went out on the town a couple more nights and then packed it in. Per Roger traveled abroad and when he came back he'd cleaned up his act. And me, well, you can see what I'm doing! Come on and I'll show you around," he said, jangling a big bunch of keys.

We went up the stairs and into the office. Student Radio's rooms were at the back. Three desks, a corner sofa, some cabinets separating their section from the next.

"Here's your desk," he said, nodding to the closest. "I sit over there. And the people working here share the last one. Most of the work takes place in the studio. Have you been there?"

I shook my head.

"That's where you'll be most of the time. Your main task is to put the record archives onto the computer."

"Really?" I said.

He laughed.

"Archiving broadcasting schedules. The so-called TONO schedules. Archiving reels. Maybe playing them onto DAT if you've got time. Making coffee. Buying coffee. Let's see what else. Going to the post office. We get a hell of a lot of mail. Ha ha ha! Any other tedious chores we have? Cleaning the studio. Vacuuming. Copying flyers. Copying documentation for meetings. We're so happy to have a conchie you wouldn't believe it. You're the lowest on the ladder. You'll be our dog! That's your job description. You'll be our dog and at my beck and call! I'm in charge here."

He smiled, I smiled back.

"OK," I said. "Where shall I start?"

"Everything starts with coffee. Put a pot on, can you?"

I did, fetched water from the downstairs bathroom, sprinkled coffee into the filter, and switched on the machine while Gaute sat working in front of his computer. Apart from us two there wasn't a soul around. I sat down at my desk, opened the drawers to see what was in them, went for a walk to see what was on the shelves, looked out the windows, up at the park, the black branches stretching toward the sky. When the coffee was ready I poured two cups and put one on his desk.

"Thanks," he said.

"What are you working on?" I said.

"Wolfenstein," he said.

"Wolfenstein?"

"Yes. It all takes place in Hitler's bunker. The idea is to move up the floors. The old man's on the top floor. But it's not so easy because there are Nazis everywhere. The higher you go the harder it is."

I stood behind him.

There was a machine-gun barrel at the bottom of the screen moving forward along an empty corridor. At the end there was an elevator. Suddenly the door opened and some soldiers in white burst out.

"Oh dear," Gaute said.

They saw "him," there was an exchange of fire, they were behind a corner, a couple of them fell to the ground, but then another elevator-load of soldiers appeared, "Gaute" was hit and the screen filled with blood.

It was creepy because you saw the corridors and soldiers as if through a pair of eyes and when the blood came I thought, this is what it's like to die, your eyes filled with blood, game over.

"I've only played a couple of times," he said. "You've got the game on your computer as well. And Doom."

He stretched.

"Shall we call it a day then?"

I looked at him.

"I'm supposed to work eight hours a day. They're very strict about that. I have to fill in forms and stuff, which you have to sign."

"Who are 'they'? I can't see any 'they' here."

"Fine by me," I said. "But perhaps we should drink up our coffee first, eh?"

It soon emerged that, as far as Gaute was concerned, appearances deceived. I thought he was a slacker, a truant, and a shirker, but such was not the case. He was ambitious, had ideas in all sorts of areas for how radio could be improved, and during the time I was on national service there he reorganized the whole radio and made it more professional, from the management side to the music profile, and updated the technical equipment so that all the tapes I edited during the first months I worked there, when all the programs were analog, had gone by the time I finished after sixteen months, and everything was digital. Wolf was only played after working hours, and then I became obsessed, often leaving the office at two in the morning, having played nonstop from four in the afternoon, sometimes I was still playing when the others came in to do the morning program. We had a soccer manager game too, which was perhaps even more addictive, I spent all my free time buying and selling players and playing match after match until my team had won the European Cup, which could take several weeks. After a twelve-hour stint my head was ice cold, and utterly empty, this was systematized meaninglessness, but I couldn't stop myself, I was hooked.

Something else at Student Radio, which I hadn't seen before, was the Internet. This was also addictive. Moving from one page to the next, reading Canadian newspapers, looking at traffic reports in Los Angeles or centerfold models in Playboy, which were so endlessly slow to appear, first the lower part of the picture, which could be anything at all, then it rose gradually, the picture filled the frame like water in a glass, there were the thighs, there, oh, there was . . . shit, was she wearing panties? . . . before the breasts, shoulders, neck, and face appeared on the computer screen in the empty Student Radio office at midnight. Rachel and me. Toni and me. Susy and me. Hustler, did they have their own website as well? Rilke, had anyone written about his Duino Elegies? Were there any pictures of Tromøya?

After Christmas the outgoing conscientious objector returned, and he went through all the jobs with me. He was amazed to discover that I didn't know how to edit, didn't know the first thing about a broadcast technician's work, in fact, didn't know anything. On the radio in Kristiansand I'd had my own technician, all I needed to do was speak into the microphone, either outside, when I was interviewing someone, or in the studio, when I had my program. The technician took care of everything else. Here this was different. He was also amazed to see I wrote down everything I was going to say, even the simplest things like "Hi, welcome to Student Radio" instead of ad-libbing the way he and all the others working there did. But I learned fast. During the holidays the conscientious objector ran the programs, then I had to be able to work solo, that is, switch on the transmitter, play the radio jingle, the program jingle, introduce the program if I decided to play a repeat or sit there and play records and chat, perhaps call someone up and interview them on the air, which I enjoyed more and more, it gave me a real kick to do live radio alone, and the more complicated the schedule the bigger the kick. But usually I didn't run programs, apart from a short student news bulletin that was broadcast every day and for which I spent all morning collating, sifting through the newspapers to find anything student-related, writing, and recording. In addition, I compiled items for the culture programs, interviewed writers or taped book reviews, and every day I thanked my lucky stars I had washed up here and not, for example, at Sandviken or some other institution. Olav Angell had translated Ulysses, so I called him to ask him about his work. Fredrik Wandrup slated Ole Robert Sunde in a review, I called Wandrup first, then Sunde, added some comments of my own, and pieced it all together. Dag Solstad was in town, so I went down to his hotel and interviewed him. This was the first time I had worked on something I really liked. And I was not the only one who did, there was such an enthusiastic atmosphere, yet laid back, this wasn't a place for students wanting to farther their careers, on the contrary, up in the studio and down in the offices people hung around all day doing nothing special, drinking coffee, smoking, chatting, maybe looking through the new CDs that had arrived or browsing through papers or magazines. I said nothing for the first few weeks, nodded to anyone who came, worked as hard as I could, if I had fifteen minutes free I would key in a few record titles on the computer, if I had to go to the post office I would run up and down the stairs. At the meetings between managers I wouldn't say a word, however, I wrote down everything they said. But gradually I began to recognize the various faces and even remember their names. As I was the only person sitting there the whole time, everyone knew who I was and gradually I began to exchange a few words with them, perhaps even crack a joke. During one meeting Gaute suddenly eyeballed me and asked, what do you think, Karl Ove? To my astonishment, I noticed that everyone was staring at me expectantly, as though they really believed I had something to say.

At the beginning of every semester new assistants are recruited. Gaute asked me to make a flyer, it was the first real task I had been given and I was concerned I wouldn't perform it well enough, worked all evening on just the title, which ended up as Free Studio Loan, and sacrificed my favorite picture in the Dante edition I had, with the Doré illustrations, cut out the last picture, where they see God, the last and the first light, and stuck it on a sheet of paper, which I copied two hundred times and for the entire next day I stood handing them out in the Student Center concourse, which was swarming with new students. At the introductory meeting a few days later the room was jam-packed. Most sat or stood quietly listening to Gaute, but some also asked questions and among them I noticed a young guy with a shaved head and Adorno glasses, not least because he had a copy of Ole Robert Sunde's novel Of Course She Had to Ring on the desk in front of him. This was a statement and a signal, a code for the initiated, of whom there were not many, and therefore particularly significant. He read Sunde, he had to be a writer himself.

Some days after the meeting the interviews began. I sat alongside Gaute in a conference room asking successive candidates questions and jotting down brief notes. It was a peculiar role because I knew nothing, certainly no more than they did, yet they had to sit there and squirm in the chair and answer as well as they could, which no one demanded of me. Afterward we went through the list of names, discussed our impressions, and that was strange too, how much I enjoyed picking and choosing. Three of the girls had been especially attractive, one sat looking at us through anxious blue eyes under black mascara'ed eyelashes, with high cheekbones, long blond hair, probably about twenty, she had to be in. Another had her dark hair pulled into a long braid, kept moving her lips, perhaps the most beautiful mouth I had ever seen, sat with a straight back and her hands resting in her lap, elegant in every way, and when she said she played the drums, I was sold, she had to be in. Gaute laughed and added that she did in fact have experience in local radio as well and was an obvious choice anyway. The Sunde guy had to be in, the conventional Business School guy as well so that it wasn't just Arts students, and definitely the girl who was so knowledgeable about classical music . . .

After a couple of weeks' training, the various departments were in place, while I was beginning to get a handle on the job and was no longer nervous as I set foot on the steps up to the office. Now it was the opposite, I looked forward to going to work. Student Radio was the first time I had felt part of my own group in Bergen, hitherto everything in my life had gone through Yngve or Gunvor, that didn't happen here and I was pleased, although it also created problems. It felt as if something new had started in my life and it had done so outside Gunvor and me, outside our relationship, which was as before, we had been together for close to four years, we were best friends, we knew everything about each other, apart from the terrible deed I had committed, which was still there, inside me, not in her, she knew nothing, she saw me as a good person. But when she came to visit me at Student Radio, it felt wrong, I was uncomfortable, it was as though I were cheating on her merely by being there. I realized it was over, but I was unable to end it, I didn't want to hurt her, didn't want to disappoint her, didn't want to ruin something for her. Farthermore, our lives were interwoven in other ways, at home she was one of the family, especially for Mom, who had become attached to her, and for Yngve, who was very fond of her, but also for those not so close, such as Mom's brother and sisters, and the same was true on Gunvor's side. As if that weren't enough, she had got to know Ingvild last year, the two of them were friends now, and Gunvor moved into the collective where Ingvild had lived, the one with precursors going right back to Fløgstad's Bergen period, the one which in recent years had been dominated by Arendalers, in other words, Yngve's friends.

Could I cut the bonds to all this?

No.

I was too weak.

So I lived a kind of double life, I erected a wall between the various parts and hoped everything would resolve itself.

The guy who had brought Ole Robert Sunde's novel to the first meeting was called Tore, he came from Stavanger and brought a wealth of ideas to department sessions. One morning when he was in the office we got into conversation. I asked him how it was going with Sunde, he said he had thrown it at the wall in frustration and was writing an essay about precisely that right now, which he would try to sell to a journal.

"Have you read it?" he said.

"Not that one. I only got through the first twenty pages. But I read the one about O, you know, his Odyssey novel. I don't remember what it was called."

"Contrapuntal," he said.

"Yes, that's the one. I did my first-year assignment on Joyce, though. So I'm interested in that tradition."

"I'm more of a Beckett man myself."

"You like the secretary better than the master?"

He smiled.

"Doesn't sound so good when you put it like that. But Beckett's damn good."

"Yes, he is."

"In fact, I'm writing a sort of Beckett novel at the moment. Well, that may be overstating it. It has elements of the absurd anyway."

"You're writing a novel?"

"Yes. I'm going to send it in this spring. Then I'll get the usual rejections. Interesting blah blah blah, but I regret to say blah blah blah. I've got sixteen of them at home."

"Sixteen rejections?"

"Yes."

"How old are you actually?"

"Twenty. And you?"

"Twenty-four. I've had only one rejection."

"So you write too?"

"Yes . . . or no, not really."

"Do you write or don't you?"

"It depends what you mean . . . "

"Mean? Surely, either you write or you don't? There's no halfway house, to my knowledge."

"Then I do. But it's not very good."

"Have you had anything published?"

"A short story. In Vinduet's debutant issue. Have you?"

He shook his head.

"That's sixteen nothing to me in rejections, and one nothing to you in acceptances."

"Well," I said. "The Vinduet acceptance might sound good, but the short story isn't."

"We've spoken for three minutes and you've already told me twice something's not very good. I detect a pattern. A personality trait."

"I'm telling you the truth. It's got nothing to do with my personality. It's an objective fact."

"OK," he said, looking at his watch. "I've got a lecture now. But what about a beer afterward? When do you finish?"

"Half past four."

"Five at Café Opera?"

"OK, why not?" I said, and watched him go down the aisle between the partitions and disappear down the stairs.

He was sitting alone at a table on the ground floor when I went into Café Opera later that afternoon. I got myself a beer and joined him.

"I've read your short story. 'Déjà Vu,'" he said with a smile. "It's good."

"You've read it. Today? Where did you get a copy?"

"It was in the university library. Influenced by Borges, wouldn't you say?"

"Yes. Or Cortázar."

I looked at him and smiled. He was the type who didn't leave a stone unturned. Would I have gone to the trouble of checking out the library for a short story written by a guy I didn't know before meeting him? Not on your life. But Tore did.

He was short and possessed immense energy, on the one hand there was something open and receptive about him – he was the kind of guy who would look around when he laughed and drop comments all over the place, completely unconcerned by how he might be interpreted – and on the other, there was something closed about him, which could manifest itself after immersing himself in one of his frequent bouts of sociability, then he might suddenly go absent, his eyes totally vacant, and he would hear nothing of what was being said, it lasted a few seconds, that was all, and wasn't very noticeable, but I noticed it at our very first editorial session, and it sparked an interest.

"Have you lived here long?" he said, looking at me over the top of his beer glass, from which he took sips.

"Four and a half years," I said. "And you?"

"Only six months."

"What are you studying?"

"Literature. I think I'll take Philosophy afterward. And you?"

"I minored in Literature. But that's a long time ago. My life has stagnated for three years now. Nothing's happened."

"I'm sure that's not true," he said.

It was as though he didn't want to know that things could go badly. But I said nothing, drank, and looked out the window, at the streets, cold and gray, passersby in coats and cloaks, the occasional puffy ski jacket.

I looked at him again. He was smiling, and it was as though the smile and the ensuing laughter lifted him and pushed him forward.

"I played in a band in Stavanger," he said. "Everyone knows everyone there. One of the guys I met while I was at gymnas runs his own record company and has a little shop in Stavanger. His name's Jone. And he came to Bergen to study for a year. He told me he shared an apartment with a total madman. He played the drums and read books and was going to be a writer. That was all he did. His place was overflowing with books, he was completely possessed. You know, Dostoevsky novels in the kitchen cupboard and Sandemose's collected works in the toilet. And he played in a band. A student band."

"What was it called?"

"Kafkatrakterne," he said. "Do you know them?"

I nodded.

"Yes, I played the drums with them."

He jerked backward in his chair and stared at me.

"Was that you? You lived with Jone?"

"Yes. I thought that was why you were telling me. You'd realized it was me."

"No, no, not at all."

He went quiet.

"What are the odds on that?" he said eventually. "On the guy being you?"

"Pretty good," I said. "Bergen's a small town. You'll find out soon enough. But say hi to Jone and tell him not to exaggerate. Everything was very normal there. I did read, that's true, but the apartment wasn't exactly overflowing with books. Though it might have seemed like that to Jone as he isn't a very literary person."

"But it's true you had rats there?"

"Yes."

I laughed. What sort of picture had Jone drawn? I could see him in his record shop encircled by gymnas students, In Bergen, guys, it's the Wild West.

But I hadn't even read much. Skimmed a few books, yes, but I hadn't read them in any depth as Espen had, for example. I had rarely played the drums. And the rats . . . yes, there had been two. One I caught in a trap and one I poisoned and it lay rotting in the wall behind the stairs.

"Does Kafkatrakterne still play then?" Tore said.

I shook my head.

"Do you?"

"No, not here."

We sat in Café Opera for two hours. We liked the same sort of music, British pop and indie, except that his taste was more defined and categorical than mine. The Kinks were his big band. XTC, a close second. He also talked a lot about the Smiths, and Japan. R.E.M., the Stone Roses, Bowie, Depeche Mode, Costello, Blur. Every time I mentioned a band he hadn't heard of I saw him make a mental note. Boo Radleys, I said, you absolutely have to check them out. And the Aller Værste!, you really don't know anything about them? Norway's greatest band!

Then we talked about literature. He was up to speed on everything that had been published. All the novels, all the poetry collections, everything.

"Do you know Espen Stueland?" I said after a while.

"Slow Dance from a Burning House?" Tore said.

"He's my best friend," I said.

"Is that right?" he said. "That's terrific! One of the best debut collections in a long time. Do you know him?"

"Yes, we studied Lit together. And he lived in the apartment beneath me for two years."

"What's he like? A prodigy, eh?"

"Yes, not far off it. At any rate extremely dedicated. And he has incredible insight into everything he reads."

Tore stared into the distance for a few seconds laughing quietly and mumbling. Then he sat up straight.

"Rune Christiansen. Have you read anything by him?" he said.

"I've heard of him. But I haven't read anything," I said.

"Then I'll bring you his latest collection of poems. What about Øyvind Berg?"

"Heard of him. Totschweigetaktiken and Et foranskutt lyn. But I'm not a great poetry reader, just so that you know. Espen's a fan of Berg, by the way. And Ulven, of course."

"Oh, my God, he is so good," Tore said.

We almost had tears in our eyes when we talked about how good Tor Ulven's books were. Tore also loved Jan Kjærstad and Knife to the Throat by Kjartan Fløgstad but not his other works, although I did. I guessed that had something to do with academia. Of Norwegian poets he put Eldrid Lunden at the pinnacle, he said.

"Haven't you read any Lunden? Jesus Christ, Karl Ove, you've got to read her. This is important! Mammy, Blue is the best collection of Norwegian poetry ever. After Obstfelder, of course. Obstfelder, Lunden, Ulven. But I'll bring you a copy. And Det omvendt avhengige. You've got to read that!"

When I returned from lunch in the canteen the next day there was a little pile of poetry books on my desk. And, on top, a note:

> Karl Ove,
> TBR.
> from your friend Tore.

My friend?

I took the books home, skimmed through them as I usually did, to have an overview when he talked about them, the way I had done with Espen. He dropped by the next day, we had a coffee in the canteen, he wanted to know what I had got out of the books, especially Mammy, Blue, which I could see meant a lot to him. Now he wanted it to mean a lot to me.

What energy he had.

For the moment it was directed at me, and I liked that, in a way it was flattering, there was an element of him looking up to me, I was four years older, had done a course at the Writing Academy, I'd had a short story published in Vinduet and would soon start reviewing books for them. That had materialized a few weeks before, I had interviewed Merete Morken Andersen for Studvest, she was about to take over as the editor of Vinduet, and as a former Bergen student she was an obvious target for an interview. I met her at the Arts Faculty, we talked for an hour, when I'd finished and had switched off the tape recorder she said she'd been planning to bring in some new names on her appointment as editor, it was so easy to turn to the same old people, but she wanted some serious innovation in the journal and wondered if I could envisage writing for her.

I realized how this might seem through Tore's eyes. But it would only be like this for the few weeks it would take him to actually get to know me and get a sense of what was what, I was a wannabe who was actually unable to write because I had nothing to say, who wasn't honest enough with himself to draw the appropriate conclusions and was therefore trying to get a foot in the world of literature at any cost. Not as someone who created something himself, someone who wrote and was published, but as a parasite, as someone who wrote as others wrote, a second-rater.

I was a second-rater and that was why it pained me to see Tore's interest in me. But what should I do? Say no, back off, you're wrong?

He continued to pop his head in at Student Radio every so often, we would go to the canteen and talk, now and then he would join us when we went out after the program, or on Fridays when whoever wanted would meet up in the office and drink beer and go out afterward or stop by one of the private parties thrown by the staff. But his heart wasn't in radio, I sensed that immediately, he wasn't interested in any of what went on there, wasn't gripped by any of the intrigues, had no idea about the conflicts of personality that existed, couldn't care less who had been making out with whom, set up or split up with whom, and as far as the practical sides of radio production were concerned, he didn't know a thing and didn't want to. He performed his weekly spots and did a good job with them, such as the interview with Jon Fosse which filled an entire program or the book and drama reviews he wrote, but that was it. He belonged to one category of staff that Student Radio employed, the ones who applied to gain experience before moving on. The other category was those who stayed for many years, for whom radio was a kind of leisure club, a place where you could hang out and always find a drinking partner for the evening. Among them there were several nerds and losers who otherwise wouldn't have fit in anywhere, just sat in their nerd and loser apartments with their nerd and loser friends. Having them at Student Radio made it an immensely more pleasant place to be than, for example, Studvest, where everyone was out to learn and move on – however, their presence also made me nervous because I was just as addicted to the social life as they were, I had just as little outside it, and in reality I was like them, I sometimes thought in my darkest hours. But there weren't quite as many of them as before, the radio station was full of good people I got to know, not least those working in the culture section, such as editor Mathilde, a witty and attractive Nordlander, or cheery Therese from Arendal, or Eirik, a tall strong Bergensian, as sharp as he was garrulous, or Ingrid from Trondheim, who didn't say a lot, Tore – he had noticed her too – and I called her Garbo. One evening I was sitting in the studio working after a program, she was around, cleaning up, and when she came into the room where I was I wrote a sentence on our new speech recognition program, which one click later was read aloud by an automaton voice.

"Ingrid is dead," the voice said.

Ingrid is dead.

Ingrid froze and looked at me with scared black eyes.

Ingrid is dead.

In the darkened room, where only she and I were, it sounded eerie. The voice seemed to come from beyond the grave.

"Switch it off," she said. "It's not funny. It's not funny."

I laughed. Funny was precisely what it was. But it had spooked her, and I apologized. She left, I was alone, but I didn't want to go home, I went up to the office and played Wolfenstein until three, when I walked down to the collective in Nygårdsgaten, let myself in, and slipped into bed beside Gunvor, who without waking up put her arm around me and mumbled something incomprehensible.

The following evening I was going to dinner at Tore's. He had dropped by and invited me, I accepted and was happy to be asked, he had all his friends living in Bergen, as far as I knew, so it wasn't a foregone conclusion that he would include me. I bought a bottle of wine after work, had an hour's nap, took a shower, and then walked across town and uphill to the Sandviken side, where he lived in one of the buildings at the very top. Once there I turned around and gazed across Bergen, which sparkled and glittered in the sea of darkness between the mountains.

Tore's flat was on the second floor, the downstairs door was open, so I walked up the stairs, where it was so cold you could see your breath in the harsh light, along a narrow musty corridor to a door. A piece of paper above the doorbell said Renberg/Halvorsen. Renberg, that was Tore's name, wasn't it?

I rang the bell.

He opened the door and smiled at me.

"Come in, Karl Ove!" he said.

I took off my shoes, hung up my jacket, and went into what turned out to be the living room. It was completely empty. Apart from three candles on the table, it was also completely dark.

"Am I the first to arrive?" I said.

"What do you mean?" Tore said. "You're the only guest."

"Am I?" I said, looking around apprehensively. The table was set with a cloth, two plates and two wine glasses, which reflected the flickering candlelight.

He continued to look at me with a smile.

He was wearing a black shirt and a pair of black trousers.

Was he gay?

Was that what this was about?

"The food's ready," he said. "We can eat right away if you like."

I nodded.

"I brought some red wine," I said, and passed him the bottle. "Here you are."

"Any musical requests?" he said.

I shook my head, glanced around discreetly to look for more signs.

"Is David Sylvian OK? Secrets of the Beehive?"

"That's a good one," I said, and walked over to the wall. A large framed poster of XTC hung there.

"It's signed, look," Tore said from behind me. "I went to Swindon one summer and rang the bell at Andy Partridge's house. He opened up and I said, hello, I'm from Norway and was wondering if you'd mind putting your signature on a few things."

Tore laughed.

"He said it had been quite a few years since a fan had last rung the bell. I think he thought it was amusing."

"And who's this?" I said, pointing to a photograph of a beautiful blond girl.

"Her? Oh that's Inger. My girlfriend."

I was so relieved I laughed.

"Isn't she lovely?" he said.

"Yes, she is," I said. "Where is she now?"

"Out with some friends. I had to clean the house for you, you know. But let's eat!"

We talked all evening, presenting our lives to each other, the way you do when you are getting to know someone. We agreed we would make a series of programs about the ten best pop albums of all times, one for each record, we would call the program Popkarusellen, in the best spirit of the sixties, and try to spell out pop's ten rules while we were at it. And we agreed we would start a band. Tore would sing and write songs, he already had several new ones lying around, I would play the drums, we could get Yngve on guitar, so all we needed was a bass player.

He kept moving between the chair and the stereo, playing new singles by bands he liked and wanted me to hear, drew my attention to particular details, the way a melody was phrased, for example, or to an especially good line in the lyrics. Oh, this part's just great! he would say. Listen, oh shit, isn't that fantastic? There! Did you hear?

He told me the guy who lived below them was a nut, he stood at the window in the morning, just staring at them as they passed, and howled and roared at night. He told me he had gone to gymnas with Inger, she irritated him then, she was one of the self-righteous Young Friends of the Earth girls, but he fell head over heels in love with her afterward. He told me he had an older brother, his parents were divorced, his mother was a wonderful person and he worshipped his grandmother, but his father was an alcoholic and off the rails. He was a teacher. I said my parents were divorced too and that my father was also a teacher and an alcoholic. We talked about them at great length. It was as if we were brothers. I felt huge warmth for him.

He got up and went into the bedroom and returned with a manuscript in his hands.

"Here it is," he said. "The novel. I finished it yesterday. But I was wondering if you'd mind reading it before I send it in."

"Not at all," I said. "I'd be more than happy to."

He passed it to me. I glanced at the title page.

Takk's Cube
Novel
Tore Renberg

At that moment the door opened and the girl from the photograph walked in. Her cheeks were red from the cold or perhaps it was the steep incline that had produced the flush.

"Hi," she said.

"Hi," I said.

She came in and shook my hand, settled down in the chair beside Tore, and tucked her legs beneath her.

"So I've finally got to meet this Karl Ove!" she said. "How tall you are!"

"It's us who are so short," Tore said. "We come from short stock, the two of us."

They laughed.

"Well," she said. "I'm hungry. Is there any food left?"

"There's a little in the kitchen," Tore said.

She stood up and went in.

"What's the time actually?" I said.

"Half past twelve," Tore said.

"Then it's probably time I made my way home," I said, and got up. "Thanks for everything!"

"My pleasure," Tore said, accompanying me to the hall. "How long do you think it'll take you to read it?"

"I'll do it over the weekend. Drop by on Monday and we can talk about it."

"Great!"

Inger came to the hall, I said good-bye, closed the door behind me, and set off downhill toward town.

His novel was almost completely without action, it had no plot, everything revolved around the main character, Takk, and his lonely humdrum life in a flat. It wasn't bad, but so influenced by Beckett that it seemed unoriginal. It had nothing to do with Tore, none of his charisma and temperament was evident in the manuscript. When we met to discuss his novel I said nothing of this directly, I didn't want to offend or hurt him, but I implied it and he wasn't unfamiliar with this reaction, it turned out. He still sent the manuscript in unchanged to the publisher and received positive feedback from the reader.

My first book review came out in Vinduet and not long after I was contacted by Morgenbladet, who asked if I would be interested in reviewing books for their newspaper. I was. This was not altogether positive, for the path this was indicating was that of the critic, not the writer, and I almost felt it would have been better to do something else because as a book reviewer I looked defeat in the face every time I wrote. I could write about literature, could see whether it was good or bad, and describe in which ways, but I couldn't move beyond that. There was a wall of glass between me and literature: I saw it, but I was separate.

Kjartan came up to Student Radio a couple of times to ask if I felt like a coffee and there was something so slow about his movements, he could barely drag himself forward, that the others in the office asked who on earth that was. They were all young, apart from perhaps the caretakers, so this gray-haired, tousled man with such a slow gait stood out. He had an exam in May, but couldn't study any more, he said. He was considering giving up. I said he mustn't, he just had to hold on, even if he didn't study he knew so much he would be fine. The exam was important, I said, and if he didn't take it the whole year would have been wasted. He looked at me and said I might be right. He asked me if I would like to come by one afternoon, he had some poems I could have a look at if I wanted. Of course I would, I answered, and one Saturday afternoon I went there with Gunvor. Although he didn't live far away from me I hadn't been there before. The apartment was on the ground floor, but there was something cellarlike about it. The curtains were drawn, we sat drinking coffee in the semidarkness, Gunvor kept the conversation going and I saw how much Kjartan liked her and somehow became lighter in her company. But not by much, the heaviness in him was still palpable. As we left I wondered if gravitational force had a stronger effect on him or the earth had a stronger pull, and that was why his movements were so slow, he had to tug his foot free from the ground, yank the hand holding his coffee cup from the table. Kjartan, the man who wrote so much about air and skies, light and suns, the man who lived in the weightless realm of the spirit.

A few weeks later he was readmitted.

At the end of April I went to Prague with Espen. His debut book had been well received and he had joined the editorial team at Vagant in Oslo. He discussed literature with Henning Hagerup and Bjørn Aagenæs, Arve Kleiva and Pål Nordheim, went with them for a beer after meetings and had got to know many authors, among them the novelist Jonny Berg and the poet Rune Christiansen. Even though Espen was Espen and I had known him for more than three years I felt so inferior to him for the entire trip. He was a writer; I wasn't. If he looked left, I looked left, to see what he found so interesting. I was so puppylike I was destroying our friendship. In Berlin we had a few hours free before the train left, Espen bought a newspaper and discovered that a Romanian poet was going to be at the Romanian Embassy, his poems had just been translated into German. Although I knew no German, and a reading would therefore have been utterly meaningless to me, I didn't say no, can we do something else, as I didn't want to get between him and his poetry.

We found the embassy and went in. A waiter stood there wearing white gloves and holding a tray of aperitifs, men in suits and women in elegant attire mingled. Espen and I, who were not sweet-scented after a night on the train and a day in the streets, nor especially spruce, to put it mildly, caused a stir when we appeared. People sent us sidelong glances and, I thought, thank God Espen is a poet anyway, at least we could say that, if anyone were to inquire what we were doing here. A Norwegian poet, which would explain our clothes and the somewhat sharp odor we exuded.

We stood in the middle of the floor without saying a word to anyone.

"At least I can get a sense of the language," I said. "The tone and the timbre and the rhythm."

"Yes," Espen said.

The doors opened and we entered an auditorium full of chairs, with a stage at one end, on which stood a table with three microphones.

Espen walked along the front row, I followed, we sat down in the middle and had the best seats. The audience was small, numbering perhaps twenty. Three people, two men and a woman, took a seat behind the microphones. The woman talked. People laughed every now and then. I didn't understand a word. Then the man I assumed was the poet began to read while the other man next to him sat with his arms crossed and his eyes half closed, listening.

The poet peered down at the book lying on the table and then he looked straight at me. Not just once, though, no, he kept his eyes fixed on me. Accordingly I had to nod, as if I were deriving enormous benefit from his reading, and flash the occasional smile. Why he had picked on me was impossible to say, it might have been because of my central position, it might have been because we looked so different from the others.

To my horror, Espen let out a snore. I glanced at him. He was sitting with his arms crossed, his head at a slight angle and his eyes closed. His chest rose and sank at regular intervals.

I nudged him discreetly and he sat up with a start.

The reciter of the poem eyed us as one German word tumbled from his mouth after the other.

I smiled and nodded.

Espen went back to sleep.

I nudged him again. This time he didn't move, just opened his eyes, blinked and was gone again.

So all the responsibility rested on me. If he was asleep I would have to appear doubly interested. I opened my eyes wide, studied the ceiling pensively, narrowed my eyes, that was interesting, nodded to myself, stared straight at him with a look of acknowledgment.

All to a stream of unintelligible words and sounds.

At last he stopped. The woman presenter thanked him, that much I understood, and added something, then everyone stood up. I looked at Espen, who was conscious now.

"What did she say?" I said.

"It's the intermission," Espen said. "Let's go, shall we?"

"Yes," I said, and headed for the exit with determined step because the poet looked like he was interested in a chat. I turned my head, nodded, and hurried out. On the other side of the door the waiters were standing ready with their trays, which we nearly bumped into as at last we made our getaway.

I had lost all sense of proportion, that was what had happened, for the inferiority I felt became only stronger when we arrived in Prague and wandered around its beautiful streets. We didn't see the same things, we didn't even look for the same things, I was just your standard stupid guy who didn't notice anything and wasn't interested in anything. Espen wanted to see the Jewish cemetery; I didn't know there was one. We went there, strolled around, afterward he asked me if I had seen all the slips of paper on the gravestones, I shook my head, I hadn't, how could you not have seen them? he riposted, I don't know, I answered. He wanted to see houses some famous architects had designed in the 1920s, we went there, I just saw houses. We went into a church, he looked left, I looked left, he looked right, I looked right. He sat down on a bench and bowed his head. Why did he bow his head? I wondered, panic-stricken. Is he meditating? Why is he meditating? Is it the atmosphere here? Can he feel the presence of something hallowed or sacred? Is there anything special about this church? Has Kafka been here perhaps? No, he was a Jew. It must be the atmosphere. The sanctity. Some existential force on this very spot.

After a while Espen looked up again and we left. On the way I asked, as casually as possible, what he had been doing inside the church.

"Were you meditating or what?"

"No, I was asleep. Obviously I haven't had enough sleep over the past few days."

On our return to Oslo I stayed with him for two days, we went out both nights, on the second we went to Barbeint, I went with a girl back to her place, we made love in her room, it was just sad, I came immediately, I wasn't there for much more than half an hour. The day afterward I couldn't remember her name or what she looked like, only that she'd had a poetry book by Øyvind Berg on her bedside table. On the train the following afternoon I decided to break it off with Gunvor. It was no good anymore, nothing was any good anymore, I called her from a phone booth at the train station, said I'd done something I shouldn't have and we had to talk. I went to her place. Fortunately no one else was there. She made some tea, we went to the sitting room. I cried when I said we had grown apart, what we had belonged to the past, not the future. She cried too, four years of our lives were over. Afterward we laughed. For the first time in ages we were open to each other and chatted for several hours. I felt guilty about my behavior, as, actually, I was relieved the relationship was over and I was therefore crying crocodile tears. Yet they weren't, the situation itself, the intimacy of it, wasn't insincere, and that was what had made me cry. Gunvor couldn't have been aware of the distinction, couldn't have known the tears were masking something, and in her eyes it must have looked as if I really was sad it was over.

Late that night I got up to go. We embraced, stood in the hallway holding each other tight, and then I went down the stairs, my eyes blind with tears. I had betrayed her, but now it was over and the guilt I felt was easier to bear as it only affected myself.

In the summer nothing much happened at Student Radio, there were very few students in town, and Yngve was in Arendal, so I was mostly alone, spending my time either at the radio station or at home, I tried to write, but it didn't amount to much, a short story entitled "Zoom" about a man who met a woman, she went back to his place, her poses became more and more pornographic, and that was it, she went home, he heard her footsteps fade in the street. Oh, it was nothing, an idea, a piece of stupidity. I showed it to Tore when he came back to Bergen, he said it was good, I had created a good character, but perhaps I should develop him farther and the plot? I couldn't, I had stretched myself to the limit, it wouldn't get any better. Every sentence was meticulously constructed, which meant every word was important but only within the internal system that constituted the story, because for the reader, in this case Tore, it didn't matter whether I wrote "clutching claw-like fingers" or "scratching cloaca finger movements" or any of the sentences I had shaped with such care.

In the autumn I slaughtered Stig Sæterbakken's novel The New Testament over a full-page spread in Morgenbladet, it was all the various styles and pastiches I didn't like, when the main protagonist sits in a wing chair at a party and inwardly abuses all those present it was so like Thomas Bernhard that I couldn't see the novelty in it. It was a big novel, it had been many years since a young novelist had dared to invest such commitment, but sadly it hadn't come off. I had stayed up all night at the radio station, writing; when Tore came in the morning I read it to him. I wrote that the novel was like a giant dick, impressive at first sight but too big for the blood to create a fully functional erection, it only got semistiff. Tore screamed with laughter when I read it out.

"Are you going to write that in Morgenbladet? Ha ha ha! You can't do that, Karl Ove! No way! "

"But it's an apt image. That's exactly what the novel is. Big and ambitious, yes, but too big and ambitious."

"Alright, alright. It might be exactly like a giant dick, ha ha ha, but that doesn't mean you can write that, you fool!"

"Shall I delete it?"

"You have no choice."

"But that's the most precise image of the novel."

"Come on! Delete it and we'll go for a coffee."

A few weeks later Alf van der Hagen from NRK's P2 rang, he wondered if I would be willing to review a novel, the first in Thomas Mann's four-part series Joseph and His Brothers, for the radio program, Kritikertorget, I was enormously flattered, of course I would. I caught the bus to Minde, where NRK had its Broadcasting House. I was expected, my name was registered in the receptionist's book, the very idea of it, Knausgaard 1 pm, Kritikertorget, Studio 3. Kritikertorget was the most important literature program in Norway by far, all the good critics reviewed there, Hagerup as well as Linneberg, now I had a foot in the door. They would ring again, I would become a known voice, it would be heard every Saturday afternoon, my name would be one to be reckoned with. Knausgaard asserts his writing is overrated, do you agree? Knausgaard has chosen your novel as the pick of the crop this autumn, what do you say to that? Naturally I'm flattered. The man knows what he's talking about.

I was guided through the corridors in Minde by a woman, past the editorial staff at work in an open-plan office, computer screens shone, voices buzzed, and into a studio, bigger and smarter and more open than ours, where I put on a headset and spoke directly to Alf van der Hagen. Just the name, aristocratic and noble, sent shivers down my spine. He was friendly and welcoming, said the manuscript was good, all I had to do was read it. He interrupted me on occasion, asked me to repeat, but that was the way it had to be. And there I sat, the radio critic van der Knausgaard, the new voice, the new generation of critics, reading a manuscript about Thomas Mann. Reading aloud on radio was something I could do, I had been doing it every day now for close to a year, but van der Hagen was not satisfied, I had to read it again and again, and when we finally stopped I had the impression he didn't think my rendition was good enough, he was stopping because we couldn't keep on going ad infinitum without making any progress.

The review was broadcast, I got everyone I knew to listen, this was the real McCoy, this was NRK, not some poky local radio station in Sørland or Student Radio in Bergen. Everyone thought it was good, but the follow-up phone call never materialized, NRK never made a farther approach, they didn't want anything to do with me, obviously it hadn't been good enough.

Nevertheless my name was making the rounds, I received a request from Kritikkjournalen to review a novel by a Japanese writer, by the name of Murakami, the book was about someone hunting special sheep, and I slated it, mainly because it was so western. I slated several novels for Vinduet, did several interviews for Studvest, worked at Student Radio, went to Rica, Garage, Café Opera, the Football Pub, and drank beer with the others from the radio station, sometimes I walked home alone, sometimes I walked home with a girl, for something had happened to me too, they no longer said no to me, perhaps because I no longer cared so much that I was rendered speechless, capable only of staring at them with those wild, desperate eyes of mine, or perhaps because they knew who I was already. But I had no friends there, apart from Tore, who had moved with Inger into a big apartment below the university. I often went there, trudged over with some beer, shall we have a few and then go for a walk, so often I had to restrict my visits in case they began to form suspicions about me and realize that actually I had nowhere else to go.

Inger considered it a bit too much, I could see that in her face, she joked that Tore's personality had changed after he met me, now he wanted to go drinking all the time, there was something in that, and I knew it, both of them were rooted somewhere, they had something, whereas I had no roots and I saw myself through their eyes, a tall hapless guy with no friends, forcing himself on Tore, who was four years younger.

In town, sitting at a table in Garage drinking and chatting I had forgotten about all this, then what we had was good. Every Saturday morning we met and made a program in our Popkarusell series. So far we had done the Kinks, the Beatles, the Jam, the Smiths, Blue, and the Police. I recommended Tore to Morgenbladet, they were interested, he started reviewing poetry books for them, while still writing himself, now he was working on short pieces. He showed me some of them, and they were good, really good. Suddenly he had his own language. Green-eyed with jealousy, I read them with him next to me, but I kept my feelings well hidden, Christ, Tore, I said to him, this is really good. He shone like a little sun, put the texts on top of the disturbingly high pile and said he was beginning to find his feet. After such sessions I went straight home to the computer. I started a new short story, which I called "Blank," it was about a man who woke up in a park not knowing who he was. Walked around town, recognized nothing. Someone waved to him and called him Sean. Sean, is that me? he thought. I wrote three pages, polished every single sentence like a diamond, yet they didn't sparkle. They were like sentences in a bad detective novel or even worse, in a school literature essay. There was nothing of the personality Tore had managed to conjure up in his writing, the unprecedented concentration of atmosphere he had achieved, which lay not in the descriptions, not in the space where the action took place, but in the language. In other words, he wrote like a poet. Not to mention Espen, who was a poet. This wasn't about atmospheres but bursts of language, sudden revelations, images that were so unexpected they opened new associations.

Espen had been there ever since I first met him, so I didn't feel any envy toward him, but with Tore it was different, especially the ignominy of him being four years younger than me. I ought to have been a kind of Nestor, an older experienced student who could cautiously lead him to where he wanted to go, an older-brother figure in his life, instead I found myself left behind after six months.

We kept shifting positions with respect to each other, immature or mature, experienced or inexperienced, it was all up in the air, one moment I saw his vulnerability, which, normally, he showed no one, it appeared when you were close to him, the next he was utterly superior to everyone else I knew. It was the same with Inger. Sometimes I saw them as children and felt like the oldest twenty-four-year old in the world when I was with them, at others they laughed at me and my plastic bags and they were two independent, academically gifted students on their way to the top while I was a dropout with a second-rate university degree, three years old now, as my sole achievement.

Once when I went over, they had been in the process of frying a smoked mackerel for dinner.

Another time, sitting on the sofa, I happened to comment that I needed a haircut, Tore, never short of brainwaves, suggested Inger could do it. She cuts my hair, you know, he said. Or shaves my head with an electric razor.

"Hey, Inger. Can you cut Karl Ove's hair?"

She came out and tilted her head, a little embarrassed.

"Yes, I could," she said.

"There you are then!" Tore said. "Now it's done!"

I was skeptical, but he was so determined that I got up and went with Inger to the bathroom. She pulled out a chair, I sat down, she wrapped a towel around my shoulders, ran a comb a couple of times through my hair.

Our eyes met in the mirror.

She smiled and looked down.

"How do you want it?" she said.

"Cut it all off," I said.

"OK," she said.

She placed a hand on my head and our eyes met again.

This time it was my turn to blush.

Slowly the shaver began to buzz its way across my head, from the back of my neck all the way over. She moved around me, leaned against my side with her thigh, stretched to complete the run of the shaver, and pressed a breast against my shoulder. She tried to hide her embarrassment behind a closed professional expression, but an occasional flush flitted across her cheeks, and I could feel her enormous relief when she had finally finished and was able to take the towel off my shoulders.

"There we go," she said. "Is that OK for you?"

"It's great. Thank you very much!"

"I should produce a little mirror now so that you can see the back of your neck, but I'm afraid I haven't got one."

"I'm sure there isn't any hair there anyway," I said, and got up, running my hand through my centimeter-short hair.

I had a feeling she would give Tore the benefit of her opinion as soon as I had gone, how could he put her in such a difficult spot? Why on earth should she cut his friend's hair?

In the middle of September, I met Gunvor for the first time since we had split up. We bumped into each other in Nøstet, very close to my apartment, she was going to Verftet to meet someone in a café, it was Sunday morning, the weather was beautiful.

I asked her how things were, she said fine.

"How about you?" she said.

"Fine," I said.

"That's good!" she said. "We'll bump into each other again, I'm sure. Bye!"

"Bye," I said, and walked down the hill while she kept going straight. When I went into my room, pitch black after all the light outside, I cried. Lay down on the bed and tried to sleep, in vain, the fount of slumber had dried up. Hardly any wonder, the previous night I had slept fourteen hours. So I just had to lie there and read until it became possible again.

A few weeks later Tore and I began to play music together. Yngve had at last finished his studies and was looking for a job, he was on the dole and more than willing to come along. We got a room in a derelict factory, there was a ravaged drum kit, a PA system, and some Peavey guitar amps, the corners were heaped with junk, the concrete walls were cracked and dark with damp, it was freezing there during the autumn, this notwithstanding, we met once a week and did our best.

I visited Espen in Oslo, I tried to do that as often as possible, I could live for weeks off the train trip across the mountains, sitting in the restaurant car and alternately reading and gazing at the countryside, which was absolutely stunning in its autumn colors, and the stay itself, in his elegant, spacious flat. When we talked I could sometimes say things I had never even thought before, galvanized by the situation and Espen's enthusiasm, suddenly something in the room burst into being, it became a focus, not for me and my self-absorption, my constant sensitivity to what others thought about me, no, what we talked about detached itself from all that, the I disappeared, until the moment was over and we were back sitting on opposite sides of the table, which, somehow, became visible again. Traveling back home after these weekends, which were invariably eventful, whether we went out in the evening or he invited people home for dinner, I usually had a backpack full of books I had bought and which I read on the journey across the mountains. Once, Thomas Bernhard's Extinction was among them, it was shocking, as cold as it was clear, constantly circling around death, the parents and sister of the protagonist die in a car accident, he goes home to bury them, filled with hatred, which all Bernhard's characters are, but in this book there was an objectivity which I hadn't seen before in Bernhard, it was as though the hard facts of life came to the fore, as though they were so overriding and powerful that they took over the angry hate-filled monologues, that death crushed even the greatest hatred and fury, in a way it took residence in him, and it was so cold and so hard and pitiless, though also beautiful, everything came into existence through the insistent elaborate rhythm of Bernhard's language, which flowed into me as I read and continued even when I had put the book aside and looked out the window, at the snow that had just fallen on the heath, the wild stream that hurtled over the ravine, and I thought, I have to write like this, I can write like this, go for it, it is not an art, and I began to formulate the start of a novel in my head, in Bernhard's rhythm, and it went well, a new sentence came, and another, and the train jerked into movement again, and I thought up sentence upon sentence, which, when I sat down in front of the computer that afternoon, had completely disappeared. The sentences I'd had in my head were full of life and energy, those I saw on the screen were lifeless and hollow.

One day Yngve came up to the radio station to ask me if I wanted to go to Grillen with him for a cup of coffee. He still didn't have a job and was bored, he was ready to move on as so many of his friends had done, but nothing was happening, he was still drawing unemployment benefits and living alone in a studio apartment in Møhlenpris, no longer a student, nor anything else.

I said yes, of course, and walked beside him down the stairs.

"Who's the girl behind us?" he said. "Don't turn around."

I didn't need to, I had seen them as we left the office.

"That's Tonje and Therese," I said.

"Who is the one on the left?"

"Left as we're walking or left if we turn around?"

"Left as we're walking."

"That's Tonje."

"She's unbelievably good-looking!"

"Yes, Tonje's nice."

"What does she do?"

"Studies Media. Works as a social correspondent."

We went up the stairs on the other side and into Grillen.

"She'll probably be going to the Media party before Christmas then," he said.

"She probably will," I said. "But you won't."

"I will. And so will you."

"Me? What's that got to do with me?"

"You're playing the drums. I'll be playing a few songs in a band with Dag and Tine, and we need a drummer. I said you wouldn't mind. You don't, do you?"

"No, not at all. If we can practice a bit first."

"There are only six songs. And, by the way, our name is Di Derrida-da."

"OK."

Tonje was one of the girls I had noticed during the interviews a year earlier. Her face was both open and secretive, she dressed elegantly, often braided her long hair into a thick plait, but it was also loose sometimes. Her mouth, which was what I had noticed first, was beautiful, though also a little lopsided, and her eyes were dark, though not in any somber way, nor melancholic, there was something else, I didn't know quite what, but I noticed it. She had started working as a social correspondent, was serious and ambitious, but moved outside the circles I frequented, had her own friends in radio, Therese in particular seemed to be close, and my interest in her waned. My days were filled with work and little infatuations, a hand gesture here, a curvaceous thigh there, a dark eyebrow here or a turn of the body there. A girl with long blond hair and black mascara-ed eyes, tall and slim with full breasts, I stood talking with her at Landmark one evening, she was shy, I kept my distance, but then she got drunk and came back, wanting to provoke me, I accompanied her uphill to near the Student Center, she pulled off the ring I wore in my ear, ran away with it in her hand, I caught up with her and put my arms around her, we kissed, she lived nearby, when we arrived at her place she put Motorpsycho on full blast, cleared everything off the table with a sweep of her arm while I stood by the wall watching, she really was stunningly beautiful, and I was drawn to her, but she only wanted to smash things and cry, there would only be a little smooching then I had to go, she said, but I also had to promise to return, tomorrow at five, everything would be fine again, but of course it wasn't, when I rang the doorbell the next day after work, as horny as a billy goat, no one answered, and the next time I met her she was drunk again and claimed she had been at home but hadn't dared open the door. If I came by again, she would. OK, I said, she went onto the dance floor, I was at the bar, immediately afterward the band stopped playing, someone had thrown beer at the synthesizer, I had seen it all, it was her.

There was another girl who sometimes came to see me in the evenings, but she had started to fall in love, so on the last occasion I didn't answer the door. Then there were a couple of others I had something with, I was incredibly attracted to one of them and had opened myself up to her, and taken her home once, but she made it very clear that this was a mistake, she wasn't interested in the slightest, in fact she even went so far as to ask me not to tell anyone. At the radio station there were phone calls for her in the evening, I knew who was calling her and was out of my mind with jealousy, not that I had any right to be, I didn't even know her.

Tonje was outside all of this. I exchanged a few words with her when the opportunity arose, if, for example, she came into the studio when I was there or she needed a technician for some news item or something, but I knew nothing about who she was or what she did.

She was incredibly good-looking, as Yngve had said, but she was nothing to me.

In the first week of December I had my twenty-fifth birthday. It was an important event, a milestone, I should have had a party, but I didn't know enough people for that to be a possibility, so when I went to the radio station no one knew what a big day it was for me, which in itself I liked, it was fitting for the person I'd become, someone who kept a low profile and didn't attract unnecessary attention, someone who didn't boast and knew his place.

I arrived early, the office was empty and I cleared the table by the corner sofa, put on some coffee, began to scan the newspapers for any student-related news items I could cut out. Outside, the snow had settled, a faint shimmer extended into the darkness by the windows, that was all it took to change the whole office atmosphere.

The door by the stairs opened and I glanced over.

Ingvild!

She smiled and waved and walked up to me.

"Long time, no see," I said, and gave her a hug. "What are you doing here?"

"Happy birthday," she said.

"Thank you," I said. "How did you know?"

"I've got a memory like an elephant."

"Would you like some coffee?" I said.

"Please," she said. "I have to be going soon though."

She perched on the edge of the sofa. I took the jug from the machine and quickly poured two cups while the filter trickled and dripped onto the hotplate.

"What's it like being twenty-five then?" she said. "Does it feel good?"

"I can't notice any difference. Did you?"

"No, other than it's good not to be twenty anymore."

"Tell me about it," I said.

"I've got something for you," she said, producing a parcel from a bag and passing it to me. "Here you are."

"Have you bought me a present as well?"

"Naturally," she said, as she looked away, a little flustered.

I unwrapped it. It was a gray lamb's-wool sweater from Benetton.

I looked at her, then at the sweater.

"Don't you like it?" she said.

"Yes, I do, it's great," I said. "But a sweater? Why did you buy me a sweater?"

"I thought you needed one," she said. "But if you don't like it you can exchange it."

She sat with her hands in her lap, watching me.

"Thank you very much," I said.

I could see that she interpreted my reaction as meaning I didn't like it and there was an awkward silence until I realized I should try on the sweater. But that just made the situation even more awkward because what confused me was the sweater. Why buy me a sweater? It cost a few hundred kroner. And, in a way, it was personal. A record, a book, or a flower, if she was going to give me anything at all. But a sweater?

She stood up.

"I have to go now. My lecture's at a quarter past. But enjoy the rest of your birthday!"

She disappeared down the stairs and I went on reading the papers with a pair of scissors in my hand.

Yngve came by late in the afternoon, he just wanted to say happy birthday and that unfortunately he had no money for a present but better times were around the corner and then he would get me something really nice.

That was all that happened that day. I went home as usual, read and played records as usual, talked to Mom, who told me what had happened on this day twenty-five years ago. Dad didn't call, he never did, I wondered if he didn't actually know when we, Yngve and I, had been born or he knew but didn't care, but I was used to this, it didn't matter, he lived his life, I lived mine.

The following week was the Media party. It was being held in Uglen, Bergen's most infamous watering hole, where the most desperate and ravaged individuals hung out, typical of the jokers in Media Studies, who put Madonna on the same level as Mahler. I went there early, we were going to do a sound check and run through the songs, which we had hardly practiced, one last time. The snow had settled, it was cold in Bergen now, and for the first time in the five years I'd lived there you sensed a Christmas atmosphere in the streets.

We played five songs, among them "Forelska i Lærer'n" and "Material Girl," as well as an original which Yngve had written the music for and Marit, the vocalist, the words.

Afterward we stood by a table making a start on the beer we'd been given for performing. Yngve knew a lot of people, it was only six months since he had finished his course, for me most of the people were new faces, apart from Tonje, who came over and said hello after we had played.

"Are you here too?" she said.

"Yes," I said. "I get hired to play the drums all over town. It's especially busy at Christmas."

She smiled.

"Aren't you going to introduce us?" Yngve said.

"Tonje, this is Yngve, my brother. Yngve, this is Tonje from Student Radio."

They shook hands, Yngve smiled and looked her in the eye as he asked her if she was in her first year.

They chatted for a while, had more in common than she and I had, and I looked around as I knocked back the cold beer and enjoyed the taste, perhaps not so much the slight bitterness as the promise of an eventful night and the mounting pleasure that came with it.

Tonje rejoined her friends, Yngve took a long swig, put his glass down on the table, and said something about how good-looking she was.

"Ye-ah."

I glanced over, she was talking to a guy, but looked up at once, met my gaze and smiled.

I returned her smile.

Yngve talked about the various jobs he had applied for and how difficult it was to get in anywhere if you didn't have any contacts, perhaps he had made a mistake focusing on finishing his studies instead of working on the side.

"That's what you did," he said. "And now you're writing for Morgenbladet and freelancing for NRK. You've had a lot more opportunities than if you'd just kept studying."

"Maybe," I said. "But writing book reviews isn't exactly lucrative."

I met Tonje's eye again. She smiled across the room and I smiled back. Yngve was oblivious.

"Not book reviews, no," he said. "But if you stick with it you'll soon have a name. Then everything'll get much easier. If you have something concrete to show. I've got just the subject and the grade."

"It'll all come out in the wash," I said with a smile, feeling light-headed. Whenever I looked at her I got a tingle in my stomach. She seemed to possess a sixth sense because however deep in conversation she was, she always looked up when I glanced over. The people she was with noticed nothing. Yngve didn't notice a thing. It was as though we were sharing a secret. Whenever she smiled, she was smiling at herself.

Hey, it's us two, isn't it? Her smile seemed to say.

Us two? said my smile. Are you joking?

No.

No?

Come over here and let's see what happens.

You look terrific.

You too.

Us two?

Yes.

Yes?

Come on. Then you'll see.

"What are you smiling at?" Yngve said.

"Nothing special," I said. "I'm just in a good mood. It all went well with the band and everything."

"Yes, it did. It was fun."

We drank a bit more, Yngve went for a walk around the room, I was alone and she came over.

"Hi," she said.

"I'm glad you've come over," I said. "I don't know anyone here."

"I was surprised to see you here. But that question was soon answered."

She looked down and pursed her lips for an instant, then looked up and smiled.

"I was hoping you would be here," I said.

"Were you?" she said. "Did you know I was in Media?"

"Yes, but that's all I know about you."

"Sounds like I have you at a disadvantage," she said. "I know quite a lot about you, actually."

Yngve came back.

"You're so like Karl Ove," Tonje said. "I guessed you were his brother as soon as I saw you."

She stayed with us for a while, Yngve did most of the talking, as on the first occasion, but all the tension was between us two.

"You're not going soon, are you?" she said, looking at me as she went back to her friends again.

"No," I said.

She left, I watched her go. Her back was straight, her neck long and elegant, half covered by hair, which was gathered in a braid. At the radio station she would often hide in big clothes, as many girls do, wear a military jacket, thick sweater, and black boots, but this evening she was wearing a plain black dress which clung to her slim waist and gave her quite a different allure.

"Hm. You're a dark horse," Yngve said.

"Huh?" I said.

"You didn't say there was anything between you when I asked you who she was."

"There wasn't. We've just exchanged a few words."

"What's going on now then?"

"You know as much as I do." I smiled.

Every time our eyes met that evening it was as though everything else was blanked out, Yngve, all the students and lecturers who were there, all the chairs and tables, and not only that, everything in my life, everything that I carried with me, and that could be such a burden, was gone. All that existed as we gazed across the room was her and me.

It was odd.

Even odder was that I was completely relaxed. There was nothing to fear, nothing to worry about, I didn't have to perform, do anything, be someone. I didn't even have to say anything.

But I did.

We sought each other that evening, she moved around, we exchanged a few words off and on, then we were suddenly standing there alone chatting, utterly immersed in each other, I saw nothing except her, she shone with such a strong radiance that everything else vanished.

All evening men had made passes at her, the way they do at parties like this, when you've seen one another for a whole semester, in reading rooms and lectures, in the canteen and library, and then you meet, dressed up and primed with drink, ready to grab your opportunity. I saw everyone who wanted to talk to her, but what did she do? She looked up and smiled at me.

When at last it was only us two, Sverre Knudsen came over to our table. He had played in the Aller Værste! and was one of my old heroes, but of course he wasn't interested in that or me, it was Tonje he had his eye on. He talked and talked, in a manic frenzy, he wanted to know all about her, he said, she hesitated, he said he knew who had shot William Nygaard, the CEO of Aschehoug and publisher of Salman Rushdie, he was going to Oslo early tomorrow morning and would reveal the truth, she had to read Dagbladet in two days, it would be there. He said he feared for his own life, he had been followed for several days now because he knew what he knew, but he was too smart for them, he was two steps ahead, he knew Bergen like the back of his hand.

Yngve came over, he wanted to leave. I looked around, he wasn't the only one, the party was drawing to an end.

Sverre Knudsen wanted to stay longer with Tonje, she laughed and looked at me, it was time to go, would I walk her back?

It was snowing when we came outside.

"Where do you live?" I said.

"I'm living with my mom at the moment," she said. "Next to Støletorget. Do you know where that is?"

"Yes. I lived not far from there once."

We walked down toward Hotel Norge, she was wearing a long black coat, I was wearing my old worn coat. Hands in my pockets, a couple of meters from her, the mountainside high above us, gleaming in the darkness.

"Do you live at home?" I said. "How old are you actually?"

"I'm moving out after Christmas. I've got a room by the bus station. Behind there," she said, pointing.

We walked along by the hotel and into Torgalmenningen, which was deserted and covered with a thin layer of white snow.

"They're going to Africa after Christmas. So I have to move."

"Africa?"

"Yes, Mozambique. Mom, her husband, and my sister. She's only ten. It's going to be tough for her. But she's looking forward to it."

"What about your father? Does he live in Bergen as well?"

"No, he lives in Molde. I'm going there for Christmas."

"Do you have anymore brothers and sisters?"

"Three brothers."

"Three brothers?"

"Yes, anything wrong with that?"

"Wrong? No-o. It's just a lot of brothers. And when you say it like that, three brothers, well, I had a feeling they were the kind that look after their sister. That they're skulking around here somewhere, waiting for us this minute."

"Perhaps they are," she said. "But if so, I'll tell them you have only good intentions."

She looked at me and smiled.

"I do!" I said.

"I know," she said.

We continued without speaking. Snow was falling. The streets around us were perfectly still. We looked at each other and smiled. Crossed Fisketorget, with the sea beside us, all black. I was happier than I had ever been. Nothing had happened, we had only chatted and now we were walking here, I was two meters from her, with my hands in my coat pockets, that was all. Nonetheless, this was bliss. The snow, the darkness, the light from the Fløibanen sign. Tonje walking beside me.

What had happened?

Nothing had happened.

I was the same person. Bergen was the same town.

Yet everything was different.

Something had opened.

What had opened?

I walked beside her in the darkness, up the hill to the funicular railway, along the walls of the old school, up Steinkjellersmauet, and everything I saw, everything I thought, everything I did, even if it was only putting one foot in front of the other, was tinged with hope.

She stopped by the door of a narrow, old, white timber house.

"Here it is," she said. "Since you've walked such a long way you could come in, if you like?"

"OK," I said.

"But we have to be quiet. They're still asleep."

She opened the door and we were in a hallway. I carefully took off my shoes, followed her up the cramped stairs. By the bend there was a kitchen, but she continued up another floor where there were two rooms, both with sloping ceilings. The rooms looked like they do in home design magazines.

"It's lovely here," I said.

"That's Mom's doing," she said. "She's got flair. Can you see that picture over there?"

She pointed to a picture made of fabrics, portraying a choir, with lots of small puppets, all with their own individual expressions.

"She's an artist. But she doesn't do much art anymore."

"It's great," I said.

"It's pretty funny," she said. "The pictures would sell like hotcakes if she put her mind to it."

I took off my jacket and sat down.

"Anything you'd like? Tea?"

"Tea would be perfect," I said.

She went down to the floor below, I sat still until she returned five minutes later, with a cup in each hand.

"Do you like jazz?" she said.

I shook my head.

"I'm afraid not. I'd be lying if I said I did. But you do, I can see."

"Oh yes. I love jazz."

"Then play some."

She got up and put a record on the old Bang & Olufsen stereo.

"What is it?"

"Bill Frisell. You have to hear it. It's fantastic."

"I only hear sounds," I said. "Slightly strained sounds."

"I work at the Molde Jazz Festival every year," she said. "I have since I was sixteen."

"What do you do?"

"I take care of the musicians. Pick them up from the airport and drive them around and try to entertain them the best I can. Last year I went fishing with them."

I imagined her wearing a chauffeur's cap and uniform and laughed.

"What are you laughing at?" she said.

"Nothing," I said. "I just like you so much."

She looked down and pursed her mouth for an instant, the way I had noticed she was wont to do, then she looked up at me and smiled.

"I hadn't anticipated I would be sitting here with Karl Ove at the crack of dawn when I left home last night," she said.

"Do you see that as positive or negative?" I said.

"What do you think?" she said.

"It would be smug to say positive. So it has to be negative."

"Do you really imagine I would have invited you up here then?"

"Who knows," I said. "I don't know you."

"And I don't know you," she said.

"No," I said.

The sense of falling snow had stayed with me; as we sat there I imagined it swirling down from on high and landing soundlessly on the roof above us, flake by flake. We talked about Student Radio and the people there, we talked about music and about playing the drums, she wanted me to teach her, I explained to her that I wasn't really any good at it. She told me she had worked in local radio ever since she went to ungdomsskole and for a long time she had worked at one of Bergen's most controversial stations, run by an anti-immigration MD, so controversial that even I had heard of him. She said he was a friendly, though eccentric, man, she didn't agree with his opinions, but freedom of speech was paramount and it was strange that so few people remembered that when they condemned him and his radio station. As she talked she became more and more heated and involved, I could see she was committed, committed to radio and free speech, and liked to be, however unfamiliar this was to me, because it was fringe. The milieu she was describing was right on the fringe irrespective of how matter-of-fact her tone.

"I'm chattering away here," she said after a while. "I don't usually do that."

"I believe you," I said.

Down below a door opened.

"They must be waking up now," she said.

"Yes, I should go," I said.

Up the stairs crept a little girl. As thin as a straight line, large brown eyes, wearing a white nightdress down to the floor.

"Hi, Ylva, are you out of bed?" Tonje said. "This is Karl Ove. A friend of mine."

"Hi," she said, staring at me.

"Hi," I said, and stood up. "I have to go now."

I took my jacket from the arm of the chair.

"You're so tall," she said. "How tall you are?"

"Six foot three," I said. "Would you like to try on my coat?"

She nodded. I held it out, she stuck first one arm in and then the other. Took a few steps, the lowest part hung like a train behind her. She laughed.

I was in a family house.

Tonje accompanied me to the door, we said good-bye and I walked downhill into town, which during the time I had been at Tonje's had totally changed character: big buses were driving through the streets now, people got on and off, hurried up and down the streets, most with umbrellas because the weather had turned milder and the snow that fell was wet and heavy. It was past seven o'clock, there was no point going home, so I headed for the Student Center, let myself in, and went up to the office.

Someone was sleeping on the floor of the conference room.

It was Sverre Knudsen.

Beside him was a kind of board, and I immediately recognized it, it was the same color as the door. I stepped back and checked: that was it, the top piece, over the lintel, had been removed. So that was how he'd got in. How he had circumvented the front doors, however, was a mystery.

I went into the room, crouched down beside him, and placed my hand on his shoulder.

"You can't sleep here," I said.

"Whazzat?" he said, sitting up.

"You can't sleep here," I said. "People'll be here soon."

"You," he said. "I remember you. You were with that Tonje."

I got up.

"Would you like a cup of coffee?" I said.

He nodded and went in with me, sat down on the sofa, and rubbed his face with his hands. Then he jumped up, went over to the window, and peered down at the road.

"You didn't notice a green Beetle when you got here, did you?" he said.

"No," I said.

"They're after me," he said. "But I don't think they know I'm here. Perhaps they're waiting for me in Oslo. I know who shot Nygaard."

"So you said last night," I said.

He didn't answer, sat down on the sofa.

"You probably think I'm paranoid," he said.

"Not at all," I said. "But why did you sleep here?"

"That Tonje said she worked for Student Radio. I thought she might be here."

"I've been a fan of the Aller Værste! ever since I was a kid," I said. "It's great to meet you. I've also read one of your books. Butterfly Petrol."

He waved his hand dismissively.

"How about we do an interview now that you're here?" I said. "About the Aller Værste! days?"

"Alright," he said.

I passed him a cup of coffee, drank mine standing beside the desk. On the stairs I saw Johannes coming up.

"Early start today?" he said.

"Yes," I said.

"See you later," he said, and went down the other end, where he was doing his national service.

I put the radio on to hear what was being broadcast and who was there.

Sverre Knudsen studied me.

"This is going to be a sensation," he said. "Just wait."

Half an hour later we went up to the studio. I put on a reel, raised a knob on the mixing console, and went back to him. I was really exhausted, at the same time full to the brim with the events of the night, and found it difficult to concentrate, but that was nothing compared with Sverre Knudsen. Sweat was pouring down his face as he sat there trying to recall the events of fifteen years ago, which, even with the best will in the world, he was unable to summon any interest in now. After twenty minutes I said stop, he seemed relieved, I shook his hand, he stumbled down the steep stairs and hurried into town while I went back to the office and tried to kill time so that I could . . . well, could do what?

Be alone and think about Tonje.

All day flashes of happiness swept through me. Something fantastic had happened.

But what?

Nothing had happened. We had talked a little, that was all.

For a year she had worked here, for a year I had seen her coming and going, and she had seen me. I had never felt any of what I felt now. Not once, not even close.

Then we had met at a party, smiled at each other – and that was that?

Yes, that was that.

How was it possible? How could it change everything?

Because everything was changed, I knew that. My heart told me. And the heart is never wrong.

The heart is never ever wrong.

I went home, slept for a couple of hours, had a shower, sat down by the phone, had to call her and thank her, ask if we could meet again. I hesitated, suddenly afraid to ruin anything. But I had to.

I forced myself to dial the number, stopped before the last digit, then dialed. A woman, it must have been her mother, answered.

"This is Karl Ove," I said. "Is Tonje at home?"

"No, she isn't. She's out at the moment. Can I give her a message?"

"Please tell her I called. I'll try again later perhaps."

I lay down on my bed, my whole body aching.

I stood by the window, looked down at the enormous aerials on the TV 2 building, felt the allure of the darkness above them.

I dressed and went out. I ached. I walked toward Nordnes, a snowplow thundered past with flashing lights. I passed the aquarium and went on toward the park, reached the point of the headland, stood there with the wind blowing against me and watched the sea washing ashore below, the vast darkness where everything was at rest now.

I looked around. Not a soul.

OOOOOHHHH, I shouted.

Then I walked to the totem pole and examined it, thought of the continent where it originated, the Indians who had once lived there knowing nothing of us, us knowing nothing of them. It was such an incredible thought, the freedom of not knowing, just living, believing they were the only humans alive, their surroundings the only world.

I saw her in front of me and a wave of happiness and sorrow rose within me.

How was this going to turn out?

How was it going to turn out?

On my return I waited for another hour before calling.

This time she answered.

"Hi!" she said. Her voice was warm and very near.

"Thank you for last night," I said.

"Likewise," she said. "My sister has been talking about you all day. I've just been out with her now."

"Say hello from me," I said.

"I will."

Pause.

"When my mom told me you'd called I had to lie down on the floor," she said.

"On the floor?"

"Yes, I had such pains in my stomach."

"Hm," I said.

Pause.

"I was wondering . . . actually . . . well . . . if . . . ," I said.

"What were you wondering?"

"If you . . . or we, um, . . . or, well, if you'd like to meet me again. And go out or something?"

"Yes."

"Yes?"

"Yes."

"Just a cup of coffee or something," I said. "But not at the radio station. Or in the canteen, or in Grillen. Or in Café Opera."

She laughed.

"Wessel?"

"OK, why don't we say Wessel? Tomorrow?"

The following day there was a meeting in the Social Affairs section. I had forgotten about it, but of course she would have to go.

Her gaze brushed me as she arrived, no more than that, and she seemed to be smiling to herself, otherwise we didn't exchange a word, it was as if I didn't exist.

I looked through the window of the conference room, there they sat talking and gesturing without a sound. She looked up at me, flashed a quick smile, looked away.

What did that mean?

Tore came down the corridor.

"How's it going, Karl?" he said.

"I'm up to my ears in love," I said. "My body hurts. My joints. My joints ache."

He laughed.

"I saw you two days ago. You didn't say anything."

"Of course I didn't. It happened the day before yesterday."

"This is like being at elementary school," he said. "Have you asked her?"

"No."

"Tell me who it is and I can ask her."

"It's Tonje."

"Tonje? Student Radio Tonje?"

"Yes."

"Her sitting in there?"

"Yes."

"Does she know?"

I shook my head.

He laughed again.

"She probably has an inkling," I said. "We're meeting later. I called last night. Come on, let's go. Feel like a coffee in the canteen?"

I hadn't eaten all day, and I couldn't get anything down at home either, I wasn't interested and food didn't seem necessary. I was burning up.

For the two hours I had to wait before I could leave, I wandered around, lay down on my bed, stared at the ceiling, got up and paced back and forth. It was terrible, I was so high that all I could possibly expect now was a fall.

What would I talk about?

It wouldn't work, I was somewhere else now, I would sit and fidget and blush and be a total idiot, I knew myself so well.

I didn't have a mirror in my apartment, at least I was able to avoid having to look at myself, but now it felt as if I urgently needed one, so after changing clothes and putting gel in my hair, I turned over a CD and held it in front of me from several different angles.

I locked the door behind me and went out.

I had pains in my stomach.

This was no fun.

Just painful, all of it.

The snow shone in the streets around me as I walked up the gentle incline to the little kiosk beside the swimming pool, past the theater and Café Opera, around the corner, and into Wesselstuen.

She wasn't there, and I thanked the Lord, now I would have a few minutes to myself. I found a table and sat down, told the waiter who came over that I was waiting for someone.

She arrived ten minutes later. I trembled when I saw her. She was carrying lots of bags, leaned them against the wall and took off her coat, then sat down, somehow she had brought with her everything that existed out there, the street lamps and the shop windows, the crowds and the snow, it was all part of her aura, the same way a cat brings the forest and the darkness indoors the first minutes it comes into the house in the morning.

"I've been buying Christmas presents," she said. "Sorry I'm late."

"No problem," I said.

"Have you ordered?"

"No. What would you like?"

"A beer maybe."

Soon after, we were sitting with our beers in front of us on the table. The room was full, there was a great atmosphere, the last Christmas dinners were being eaten, around us sat men in 1980s suits and women in dresses with broad shoulders and plunging necklines shouting skål and laughing. We were the only ones not saying anything.

I could have said she was a star, a shining light, my sun. I could have said I longed for her so much I was making myself ill. I could have said I had never experienced anything like this in my entire life, and I had experienced a lot. I could have said I wanted to be with her forever.

But I didn't.

I looked at her and smiled gently. She smiled back, gently.

"You've got such unbelievably beautiful ears," I said.

She smiled and looked down at the table.

"Do you think so?" she said. "I've never heard that before!"

What had I said?

That she had beautiful ears?

It was true, her ears were unusually well formed, but so was her neck, and her lips, and her hands, small and pale, and her eyes. Complimenting a woman on her ears, that was crazy.

I blushed to the roots of my hair.

"I suddenly noticed," I said. "And so I said it. I know it sounds a bit strange. But it's true! You do have beautiful ears!"

The explanation just made things worse.

I took a long swig.

"You've got a nice sister anyway," I said.

Anyway?

"I'll tell her you said that," Tonje said. "She thought it was very exciting having you there. She's at that age. She doesn't really know what it is, but maybe she thinks she does. And she absorbs everything she sees."

She rotated her glass, pursed her lips, looked up at me with her head at an angle.

"Are you going to have a Christmas break? Or will you send your presents?"

"I'm going to my mother's on the twenty-third. I'll stay a week."

"I'm heading north tomorrow," she said. "My brother's giving me a lift."

"Does he live in Bergen?"

"Yes."

Nothing was left of what we had between us on the first evening and night. Everything was inside me.

"When are you coming back?" I said.

"At the beginning of January."

That was a long time. Anything could happen. She might meet someone up there, some guy she hadn't seen for ages, and she might get together with him.

The longer I sat next to her, the worse my chances were. She must have started to figure something out.

We chatted about the radio, normal things, everyday life, as though we were just two Student Radio employees having a beer together.

She looked at her watch.

"I'm meeting my mother and sister soon," she said. "They're doing their Christmas shopping as well."

"You go and do that then," I said. "I'll see you after Christmas!"

We left together, stopped in Torgalmenningen, she was going left, I was going right. She stood with her bags in her hands. I should have given her a hug, there was nothing wrong in that, it was absolutely natural, we'd just had a beer together, but I didn't dare.

"Merry Christmas," I said, clumsily raising my hand in the air.

"Merry Christmas, Karl Ove," she said.

Then we each went our own way, me up over Høyden and down to Møhlenpris, to Yngve's apartment, which he shared with a girl he'd studied with. Fortunately she wasn't at home.

"How's it going?" he said. "Anything happen after the party?"

We were in the living room, he was playing My Bloody Valentine.

"I went home with her. Nothing happened, we just talked. I've just met her again now, in Wesselstuen. I'm so in love I don't know what to do."

"Is she?"

"I've no idea! I wasn't able to say a single sensible word to her. Do you know what I told her?"

He shook his head.

"I complimented her on her ears! Can you imagine that? What lovely ears you have! Of all the things I could have said, I chose that."

He laughed.

"I'm not sure that was so stupid. It's original anyway!"

"What should I do?"

"Call her again? Go out again? If something's meant to happen, it'll happen of its own accord."

"So that's your opinion: it'll happen of its own accord?"

"Yes."

"Anyway, she's going home for Christmas tomorrow. I won't see her until January. I was thinking of writing her a letter. What do you think?"

"You can do that, can't you?"

"And buying her a Christmas present. I want to surprise her. And I thought of buying something that would make an impression. Not a book or a record or anything like that, something else. Something personal. But I can't think what."

"Ear warmers, of course," Yngve said. "Then you can write that you chose them so that she would take care of her beautiful ears."

"Excellent!" I said. "I'll do that. Could you come shopping with me tomorrow afternoon? Perhaps we can buy a present together for Mom while we're at it."

And that was what we did. I wandered around town with Yngve searching for ear warmers. They weren't exactly common, but in the end I found a pair. They were dreadful, covered in a kind of green fur, but it didn't matter. I had them gift wrapped, spent the following evening writing a letter, and sent everything up to Molde.

Mom noticed something had happened the moment I stepped inside her door.

"Have you met someone?" she said.

"Is it that obvious?" I said.

"Yes," she said.

"It's nothing yet," I said.

"I've got a Christmas card from Gunvor," she said.

I looked at her.

"To be honest, that's over. You're welcome to stay in contact, but for me it's all over."

"I know," she said. "I just thought it was nice she remembered me. What's the name of the girl you've met?"

"I'll tell you if it gets off the ground."

Mom seemed tired, she was pale and didn't have the energy she usually had, I could see that, just setting and clearing the table was an effort.

On Christmas Eve she unwrapped Kjartan's present and her face went white.

"What have you got?" I said.

"A wreath," she said. "I'm sure he meant to give me a nice Christmas wreath, but he's sent me a funeral wreath. The type you give at burials."

"There's nothing symbolic in it," Yngve said. "It doesn't mean anything. He's just made a mistake. It's typical of him."

She didn't answer, but I could see it had affected her and she did think it had meaning.

After we'd opened all the presents and had eaten cookies and drunk coffee, I went up to the study and called Tonje.

"Hi!" she said. "Thank you for your present! That was really nice."

"So it did arrive?"

"Yes, it came today. I was wondering if I dared open it with all the others there. After all, I didn't know what you had bought me. But I did anyway. They all had eyes like saucers. 'Who's Karl Ove?' 'Why has he given you ear warmers?'"

We chatted for a long time. All her friends had come home for Christmas, she said, they went out or they visited each other and were still close even though it was five years since they had left gymnas. She also told me they'd had lots of snow there and her three brothers had been clearing the roof all morning. I could visualize it all, the house, which was at the top of a hillside with a view of the whole town and the fjord beneath and the mountains behind, from what she said, and her three brothers, who in my imagination had taken on fairy-tale roles, they looked the same, stuck together, and worshipped their little sister.

Going down to the sitting room afterward, I missed her so much it was almost unbearable. I had never imagined that happiness could hurt so much.

Between Christmas and New Year's I went back to Bergen to put together some programs. Tonje returned at the beginning of January, I called her and invited her to dinner at my place.

Yngve usually made spaghetti carbonara with bacon, leeks, blue cheese, and cream, it was simple and good, I wanted to try to make it. I didn't have a dining table, so we would have to eat it on our laps on the sofa, that would have to do. If we met in town, we would just be sitting at a table and chatting, here it felt a bit freer, I could stand up and cook, serve her wine, play my music. There was room to move here.

Yngve suggested I put some white wine in the sauce. I followed his advice, but when I tasted it, only minutes before she was due to arrive, it was sweet and tasted horrible. I called him.

"What should I do?"

"Pour in more wine. That helps."

"Hang on a minute. Don't go away."

I poured more wine into the sauce. Stirred it, tasted.

"Now it's even sweeter! Oh, hell, this is a disaster! She'll be here soon!"

"What sort of wine is that?"

I read him the name.

"Doesn't mean a thing to me. But it is dry, isn't it?"

"Dry?"

"Yes."

I scrutinized the label.

"It says it's semidry. I thought it would be good if it wasn't very sweet."

"No wonder the sauce is sweet. You'll have to pile on the salt and pepper and hope for the best. Good luck!"

He hung up, I sprinkled some salt and pepper on the sauce, tasted it with my little teaspoon again and again.

The bell rang.

I hung up my apron, made a dash for the door at the end of the stairs.

She was all hat and scarf, two big eyes and smiling mouth.

"Hi," she said, bending forward to give me a hug.

It was the first time we had touched.

"Come in," I said.

She followed me down the stairs and into the hallway, removed her outdoor clothes while she looked around. What was there to see? Brick walls, a few posters, a kitchen farther along, brick walls there too, and the adjacent room, a bed, a bookcase, an armchair, a desk, some posters, a couple of rag rugs from IKEA.

And yes: three lit candles in a candelabra on the windowsill.

“How nice it is here,” she said. Glanced at the two pans. “What are we going to eat?”

“Well, it’s just a spaghetti dish.”

I spooned some spaghetti onto the two plates, added the sauce, took the small black stool and placed it in front of her so that at least she had something reminiscent of a table, put my plate on my lap and then we ate.

“Mm, that was good!” she said.

“Come on,” I said. “It wasn’t. I poured in some white wine, but it was too sweet.”

“It was a little sweet, yes,” she said, with a smile.

I removed the plates, put on a record, Siamese Dream by the Smashing Pumpkins, we sat drinking sweet white wine, her in the yellow armchair, me on the sofa. I didn’t want her to think I only wanted to sleep with her and made no attempt to get close. We talked, that was all. For some reason the conversation turned to various Bergen bands. Completely out of the blue, she said the vocalist in the band we were discussing was bisexual. Our eyes happened to meet just as she said it and I blushed. I thought she might think I was bisexual. Even if she didn’t, the fact that I blushed at the very moment the word was uttered would make her suspicious. I tried to find a different topic of conversation, but failed, and the ensuing silence was awkward and unpleasant.

This wasn’t good. She would never be mine. How could I make her mine?

It would be so much easier to give up, to say a cold good-bye and not contact her again. All the problems, all the pain, all the defeats would finish there.

But I couldn’t.

She stood up, it was late, time to go home. I accompanied her to the door, said good-bye, watched her go, she walked up the hill without turning around.

When I went back down I put on Siamese Dream again, lay back on the bed and let my mind fill with thoughts of her.

The next time we met it was a little better, we ended up in a café just below Steinkjellersmauet, it was late and we were the only ones there. We sat by the window, snow covered all the surfaces outside, which seemed to break the fall the town found itself in when the rain deluged down in the autumn, then it was as though everything was sinking, the streets, the narrow passages, the houses, the parks. The snow held the town firm, and I loved it, loved the new light it cast all around, the moods it created. And I loved her. She talked about her family, there was a grandmother and a mother, there were brothers and a sister, a father and a father's twin brother, I said it sounded like a Bergman film. She smiled and said she was moving that weekend, could I give her a hand? Of course I could. I appeared outside her apartment between the bus terminal and the train station on Saturday afternoon, a white van was parked on the sidewalk, five people were already carrying furniture and boxes. Tonje brightened up when she saw me. I hurriedly shook hands with all the others, three boys, one of whom was her brother, and a girl, and grabbed a box. The stairway was run down and drafty, the apartment was on the third floor and big, it had two rooms, but was in a state of disrepair, and the toilet, I discovered, was on the other side of a narrow open passageway, like a bridge, on the outside of the building.

"Even Fridtjof Nansen would think twice about going to the toilet in the morning," I said. "Imagine what it's like when it's raining. Or if it's snowing!"

"It does have its charms," she said. "Don't you think?"

"Yes. You can imagine it's the bridge on a ship or something like that in the worst storms."

I placed the box on the counter and went downstairs to get another, nodded briefly to the others as they came traipsing up. My role in all this was a bit unclear. The others were obviously good friends. No one could maintain I was. So what was I?

Whatever I was, there was nowhere else I would rather have been. Carrying up her possessions to her apartment. Catching a glimpse of a mixer. A glimpse of a shoe sole in another box, imagine, that is her shoe. Her saucepans, bowls, plates, cups, glasses, cutlery, frying pans, records, cassettes, books, clothes, shoes, stereo, TV, chairs, tables, bookcases, stools, bed, plants, her whole world, I was helping to carry the whole of her life up the stairs this Saturday afternoon.

The van made two trips, and after the last load had been deposited Tonje went out for some takeaway pizzas, which we ate in the middle of the chaos. I said nothing, I didn't want to occupy space, the others knew her better, I would fit in wherever.

This was great because, sitting there on the floor, back to the wall with a slice of pizza in my hand, listening to the conversation, I knew she was mine. Occasionally she flashed me a little glance and a smile, sending shivers through me. The thought of her was light, it arched like a sky over everything, but the thought of approaching her was heavy. What if I was wrong? What if she said no? What if she laughed at me? What has got into you? Who do you think you are? Do you imagine I would go out with you? You're just a miserable wimp!

But tonight I would have to!

Tonight I had to.

Her brother said his good-byes and left. One of the others did the same. I stayed where I was. When the last two stood up to go, I followed suit.

"Are you going too?" she said.

"I thought I would," I said.

"Couldn't you stay and give me a hand with the unpacking? I have to assemble the bookcase. That's hard to do on your own."

"Sure, no problem."

We were alone.

I sat against the wall smoking and drinking Coke. She sat on a wooden box in the middle of the room swinging her legs.

I was burning up. She was making me burn up. If she looked at me my cheeks went hot.

"Are you the handyman type?" she said.

"Me? No," I said.

"That's what I thought."

"Are you?" I said.

"In fact I am. I like fixing things. My dream is to have an old house one day, do it up and design it exactly to my taste."

"What else do you like doing?" I said.

"I like sewing. And cooking. I love cooking. And playing the drums."

"Mm," I said.

"And you? What do you like?"

"I don't like sewing. I don't like cooking." I like you. Say it now! Say it, say it!

"I asked you what you liked doing. Not what you don't like doing!"

I like you, I like you!

"I like playing soccer," I said. "But I haven't played for years. And I like reading."

"That's not my strong suit," she said. "I prefer to see films."

"What films do you like?"

"Woody Allen. He's a favorite."

She got up. "Shall we assemble the bookcase so we can play some music?"

I nodded. When we had found all the parts I held it while she screwed the cross braces into position and slipped in the shelves. Then she started to put together the stereo.

"Isn't that the same one as at your mother's house?" I said.

"Yes. She said I could borrow it if I was careful with it."

She put a speaker on either side of the room, opened a box of CDs and flipped through.

"Jazz?" I said.

"No," she said. "This is a song I want you to hear."

"Who by?"

"The Smashing Pumpkins. It's on an album with various groups. I haven't seen it anywhere else. There it is!"

She popped in the CD.

She stood watching me as the music flowed into the room. There was something dreamy and boundless about it, as though it embodied all that went on and on and never ended.

"Isn't it great?" she said.

"Yes," I said. "Really great."

Something inside me told me it would be fine if I got up and held her in my arms. She would respond and all I dreamed of would become a reality.

But I didn't dare. I didn't move and the moment passed; she set about organizing the boxes.

I helped her carry some into the kitchen, where she opened them and started putting things in their places. I watched for a while, wondering what would happen if I leaped forward and put my hands round her waist and kissed her fantastic neck.

She leaned forward, put a pile of pans on the counter, and opened the cupboard below.

"I think I'll be off then," I said.

"OK," she said, straightening up. "Thanks for the help!"

I put on my jacket and shoes, opened the door, she went with me, I stepped out into the cold harsh light of the corridor and turned to her.

"Bye then," I said.

"Bye," she said.

And, I thought, now, now I'm going to do it.

I leaned forward to kiss her. At that very moment she moved her head to the side, the movement coincided with mine, so instead of my lips meeting hers, they met her ear.

I turned and went down the stairs as fast as I could, ran for a few blocks to put as much distance between me and the fiasco as possible.

What must she be thinking now? I was behaving like a teenager. Not only that, I also felt like one.

Soon I wouldn't have many chances left. Not if I was going to continue like this. How was she supposed to react? What good was I to her?

I decided to return the following day, just pop by, hope she would invite me in, and then be determined and resolute. No more dithering, no more fumbling, no more flushed cheeks and stuttering.

If she said no, so be it.

I was at Yngve's all Sunday afternoon and visited her at about seven, rang the bell, stepped back into the street, and looked up at the windows on the third floor.

No lights?

Oh, no, don't say she's not in.

A window opened and she stuck out her head.

"Hi!" she said. "I'll come down and open the door!"

I walked to the doorstep. My heart was pounding.

The door opened.

"Karl Ove . . . ," she said. "Come in."

She said my name in such an affectionate way that I went weak. Up the stairs, which she managed with swift light strides, my legs were trembling.

What sort of hell was this?

I went into the kitchen, which was behind the door, took off my shoes and jacket, hat and gloves.

"Would you like some tea?" she said.

"Yes, please," I said.

I went into the living room, which she had as good as finished. Sat down on the low chair, rolled a cigarette.

"Can you roll me one too?" she asked.

"Sure," I said.

I put all my concentration and expertise into it, as it would be hers, but still it was a bit hard in the middle and a touch fatter at one end than the other. She was in the kitchen, I tore it up and made a new one, which turned out better.

"Here you are," I said, passing it to her.

She put it between her lips and lit up. Inhaled slowly, the smoke drifted between us for a second, then dissolved.

"Do you like the room now?" she said.

"Yes. Very much."

"Actually you came just at the right moment," she said. "I want to move the bookcase over there. But I don't want to take it apart."

"Shall we do it right now?" I said.

"Alright," she said, putting the cigarette in the ashtray and getting up.

After we had finished she put on the same song she'd played the previous evening. We looked at each other and she took a step toward me.

"You tried to kiss me yesterday," she said with a smile.

"Yes," I said. "But you moved away."

"Not intentionally, of course. Try again."

We embraced.

We kissed.

I held her tight and whispered her name.

I would never let her go. Never ever.

I stayed at her place all night. We sought each other, were completely open with each other, everything was filled with light. I ached with happiness because I had her, she was there, all the time. All the time she was there, around me, and I ached with happiness, everything was filled with light.

Life can be so fantastic. Living can be so fantastic.

We played the same song again and again. We couldn't keep our hands off each other. At the break of dawn we slept a few hours, I had to work, but it wasn't possible. I couldn't, not with her there, and we went outside to the telephone booth. While I called she waited outside, laughing, woollen gloves on her hands, hat on her head, and a big scarf draped around her neck. No one had arrived yet, I spoke on the answering machine, said I was sick and couldn't come to work, hung up, went out, hugged her and walked beside her, as close as it is possible to be.

"I've never played hooky before," I said. "Not once. I have a bad conscience now."

"You have regrets? You can go up and tell them you suddenly felt better."

"Of course I don't have any regrets!"

"I didn't think so!"

Of all the things to do, we went to the aquarium that day. It was January, not a soul was there, and we just ambled around, laughed when the penguins rushed toward us under the water, I took pictures of her with the camera I'd rushed home to get, she talked at great length about what she would make for dinner, it had to be special, this was the first day we'd been together. Because now we were together!

Wave after wave of happiness surged through me that day.

She made beef bourguignon, I stood watching, and she dipped a spoon in the saucepan, turned to me, put it in her mouth and rolled her eyes.

"Mmm! Fantastic!" she said.

"I love you," I said.

She stiffened, glanced across at me, almost frightened. Turned, took the lid off the other saucepan and poked a little pin in a potato boiling in the bubbling water. The steam billowed out.

"Two more minutes," she said.

I went over to her and wrapped my arms around her, kissed her neck. She turned her head and kissed me.

"I had a day like this when I was little," she said. "When everything was wonderful. Mom took me out. We were going to have a duck day. We saw Donald Duck in the cinema, we fed the ducks in the park, I got a Donald Duck comic book, and finally we went to a restaurant to eat duck."

"Is that true? Wasn't that a sort of barbaric end to the day?"

She laughed.

"I love duck. It's my favorite meal. And it was then too! But the best part was that it was only Mom and me. All day. I've thought about it many times today. I've been so happy."

After we had eaten she discovered she didn't have any coffee. She said she would just run down to the gas station to buy some. I answered that she didn't need to, but she insisted and was off down the stairs at once.

I was uneasy. The day had been so endlessly happy. Now I was imagining she was going to die out there. I knew it was a delusion, that the chance of this happening was so minute it couldn't have been smaller, nonetheless I could see it in my mind's eye, the bus coming, not seeing her, the truck driver glancing up at the sun visor for an instant, he had a packet of cigarettes wedged up there, and didn't see her as she ran across the road . . .

Ten minutes passed. Twenty minutes. Thirty.

Why wasn't she back?

Something had happened.

Oh no, please don't say it had. Don't say it had.

I was close to throwing up.

Then came the sound of footsteps on the stairs, then she came into the kitchen wearing her broadest smile and holding a red pack of Friele coffee in one hand.

"I met someone I hadn't seen for eons," she said, unwinding her scarf. "Was I away long?"

"You won't get permission to be away from me so long again," I said.

"Come with me next time then!"

When midnight approached we walked to my apartment, Tonje had her things in her backpack. From my door handle hung a plastic bag. I opened it and looked inside. A pack of coffee and a big bar of chocolate.

"Who gave you that?" Tonje said.

"No idea," I said.

Most probably it was one of the girls at the radio station, but I couldn't say that. And I didn't know anyway.

"I can see lots of us are looking after you in Bergen," she said.

"Looks like it," I said.

We went in, she showered, came into the room with a towel swathed around her. In her hand she was holding a bottle of L'Oreal children's shampoo.

"Is that the shampoo you use?" I said, pulling her close.

"Yes, why? It's the best for my hair."

"You're full of secrets," I said.

"This is a rather small secret, isn't it?"

Yes, I'd been ill, I said at Student Radio three days later, the flu, a bit of a temperature, not so high but enough to keep me from working. Tore dropped by in the morning and the mystery of the bag on the door handle was solved, it had been him.

"Heard you were ill, so I thought I would take you something to cheer you up."

I didn't have the heart to tell him I hadn't been ill. But I told him about Tonje, I couldn't stop myself, I was so full of it.

That evening we went to the movies and saw True Romance. Afterward we were going to her place to make waffles, I had the waffle iron in a bag between my feet in the cinema, when we came out it struck me that I was the antithesis of what we had just seen. They had their bags full of weapons, I had a waffle iron. I couldn't stop laughing.

On Friday we went to Café Opera, it was the first time we had shown our faces to others, we crossed the street hand in hand, kissed in the queue as we waited to get in, there were lots of people from the radio station, I saw them talking about us, Tonje and Karl Ove are an item, and I didn't want to be there, I didn't want to drink, I just wanted to be with her. All the spaces we were in were transformed, they were enhanced with the most fantastic atmospheres, irrespective of their actual appearance, her apartment, my place, the small cafés we went to, the streets where we walked.

After two weeks I did something stupid. Yngve was going to see a band at Garage, he called and wanted me to go with him, I said yes, I'll ask if Tonje wants to come too, is that OK?

It was OK. We walked there hand in hand, paid, had our hands stamped, and went down to the cellar, Yngve was already there. I bought a round of beer for us, we sat at his table, made tentative conversation, they didn't know each other and for some reason I didn't have a lot to say.

The band began to play, we moved forward to see them, Yngve and Tonje chatted, he leaned over and spoke in her ear, she nodded and looked up at him, I was happy at first, they were the two most important people in my life, I bought another round, started feeling a bit drunk, squeezed Tonje's hand, she squeezed back, but wasn't quite present, wasn't quite where she had been, and something in me turned, I became more and more upset, ordered more beer and when we sat down again I had nothing to say, all the happiness had left me, I drank and stared into the air, smiled at Tonje when she smiled at me, she didn't notice that anything had changed, because Yngve was happy and chatty, and she was happy and chatty, one subject led to the next, they laughed and enjoyed each other's company.

They enjoyed each other's company. And why shouldn't they? Yngve was Yngve, charming, amusing, experienced, in all ways a better man than me.

She laughed with him. He laughed with her.

What was going on?

I felt heavy, I could barely move, I was all black inside. Every glance they exchanged was a stab in my chest.

He was better than me. She knew that now. Why should she have me when she could have him?

Yngve stood up to go to the bathroom.

"What's the matter, Karl Ove?" she said.

"Nothing," I said. "Just thoughtful. So much has happened in the past few days."

"It has," she said. "I'm so happy. You have a nice brother."

"Good," I said.

But it wouldn't stop, it just kept going, they chatted away as though I didn't exist, I drank and became more and more desperate. Eventually, I thought, fuck all this living hell. To hell with all this fucking bullshit.

I got up and went upstairs to the bathroom. I rested my head against the wall. I saw a smashed beer glass on the floor. I bent down, took a shard, looked at myself in the mirror. I ran the shard down my cheek. A red stripe appeared, some blood trickled off my chin. I wiped away the blood, no more came. I ran the shard down the other cheek, this time as hard as I could. I wiped the blood away with paper, threw it in the toilet, flushed, put the shard behind the trash can on the floor, went out, sat down at their table.

For some insane reason it was as though what I had done gave me renewed energy. I bought another round of beer, Tonje held my hand and pressed it to her thigh as she kept on chatting, she may have sensed what was on my mind and wanted to comfort me. I drew her hand to me, drank half the bottle in one swig, suddenly I felt an urge to go to the bathroom, suddenly all I wanted was to go there and I got up and went again, locked the cubicle door behind me, took the shard of glass and made two long cuts beside the previous ones, and then one across my chin, where the skin was softer and it hurt more. I wiped away the blood, a bit more came, I rinsed my face in cold water, dried it, and went back to them.

I smiled at them and said I was so happy that they seemed to like each other. All three of us skål-ed.

"What's that on your cheek?" Yngve said. "Did you have an accident shaving this morning or what?"

"Yes, something like that," I said.

The room was dark, the place was heaving, and both Tonje and Yngve were drinking and preoccupied with each other, so neither of them saw what I was doing, apart from when Yngve made a comment. But he didn't have enough imagination to suppose that I might be cutting myself. I did it for the rest of the evening, coldly and methodically, every part of my face was covered with cuts, and stung more and more, in the end, sitting beside them and drinking, it hurt so much I could have screamed, had it not been for the fact that, simultaneously, I enjoyed it. There was a joy in the pain, there was a joy in thinking that I could stand it, that I could stand everything, everything, everything.

"Let's go to Café Opera before they close, shall we?" Yngve said.

"Good idea," Tonje said. I had already stood up, put on my coat, wrapped the scarf round my neck ensuring that the lower part of my face was covered, pulled my hat over my forehead and went up the stairs ahead of them and into Nygårdsgaten. The air was cold and good, it seemed to bite into the cuts as we walked. I was as drunk as I could be, but my gait was steady, my voice – if I could think of anything to say – absolutely normal.

My mind was empty. Apart from the feeling of triumph at what I had done.

Tonje took my hand, Yngve slightly lowered his head as he walked, as always.

There was a queue in front of Café Opera. We joined it at the back.

Tonje looked at me.

She screamed.

"What's happened? What's happened? YOU'RE BLEEDING!" I walked across the street.

"What have you done, Karl Ove?" Yngve said, following me.

"I haven't done anything," I said. "Cut myself a little, that's all."

Tonje caught up with us.

She was crying, she was hysterical.

"What have you done?" she said. "What have you done?"

I started walking down the hill. Yngve followed me.

"I'm going home," I said. "Take care of Tonje for me."

"Are you sure? You're not going to get up to anything else?"

"Leave me in peace, for Christ's sake. Take care of her."

He stopped, I kept going without a backward glance, up the hill by the Pentecostal Church, into Skottegaten and down to where my apartment was. I unlocked the door, got into bed fully clothed, waiting for the doorbell to ring, she had to follow me, she had to, she had to leave Yngve and come down here, ring the bell, she had to, and I lay listening, and I heard nothing, and I fell into a deep sleep.

Even while I was asleep I knew I shouldn't wake up, something awful was awaiting me, and for a long time I succeeded in staying there, in the zone beneath consciousness until the well of sleep had run dry and I had to move on.

My face ached, I sat up, all that had happened returned. Now I have to take my life, I thought.

I had considered this option many times, but it was a game, I would never, not under any circumstances, do it, not even now.

Nevertheless, I hurt so much inside that this thought was my sole relief.

The pillow was bloodstained. I went into the hall, took down the CD I had hanging on a nail, and studied my face.

I had ruined it. I looked like a monster.

If there were scars, I would always look like this.

I showered. Lay down on the bed. I tried to imagine what it must have been like for Tonje. What she might be thinking now. Whether it was over or not.

This wasn't what she had anticipated when she got together with me.

I sat up and bowed my head.

Dear God, I said. Let this go well.

I went into the kitchen, looked down into the backyard.

I had to see her.

Perhaps not today though.

Perhaps best to keep my distance today.

In the evening I was supposed to play with Yngve and Tore in the abandoned factory. I went down to Yngve's a few hours before.

"You look terrible," he said when he saw me. "Why did you do it?"

"I don't know. I just did. Got too drunk. Can I come in?"

"Of course."

We sat down in the living room. I couldn't meet his eyes, stared down like a dog.

"What were you thinking about?" he said. "Not Tonje, that's for sure."

"How was she?" I said. "What happened?"

"I took her home."

"What did she say?"

"Say? Nothing. She cried the whole way home. No, she did say she didn't understand anything. She said you'd both been so happy. She said she thought you'd been happy too."

"That's true."

"It didn't look like it, you know."

"No."

There was a silence.

"You've got to stop drinking. You mustn't drink anymore."

"No."

Another silence.

"Do you think she'll leave me?"

"How should I know? And there's only one way to find out. You have to go and see her."

"Not now. I can't."

"But you have to."

"Can you come with me? Well, not to see her, just walk with me. I don't want to be on my own."

"OK. I need a walk anyway."

Yngve talked about other things, normal things, as soon as we got outside. I said nothing, I was happy to let him talk, it helped. In case she wasn't home I asked him to wait. I rang the bell, looked up, nothing, I went back to him. We went to the twenty-four-hour café that shift workers, truck drivers, and taxi drivers used, where the chance of bumping into anyone was minimal. When it started to get dark we picked up Yngve's guitar from home and went to meet Tore.

Tore stared at me, white faced.

"What have you done?" he said. I had to look away; he was crying.

"It looks worse than it is," I said. "They're not deep. It's just a few scratches."

"Jesus, Karl Ove," he said.

"Come on, let's make some music," I said.

After an hour in the freezing room, all wearing hats and scarves and thick jackets, the breath from our mouths like clouds, we left. Yngve had to go home, Tore and I chatted on the corner. He told me a good friend of his had once tried to commit suicide. He had gone into the forest and shot himself in the chest with a shotgun. He was found and he survived.

"I didn't know that," I said.

"No, how could you?" he said. "Don't you dare try anything like that."

"But it wasn't anything like that, Tore. Not even close. I just got drunk and it seemed like a good idea."

"Well, it wasn't."

"No, in retrospect I can see that."

We laughed and started to walk. Said good-bye at the corner by the Grieg Hall, he went uphill to his place, I walked to Tonje's apartment.

This time she opened the window. But she didn't come down, as she had done every time so far, instead she threw the key down to the street. I let myself in and went up. She had a visitor. Her best friend was there with her boyfriend.

I stopped in the doorway.

"I'm sorry," I said. "I look absolutely terrible. I got drunk and cut my face."

Tonje couldn't look at me.

"We were just leaving," the boyfriend said.

They got up, put on their coats and hats, said good-bye, and left.

"I'm so sorry for what happened," I said. "Can you forgive me?"

"Yes," she said. "But I don't know if I can be in a relationship with you. I don't know if I want that."

"No," I said. "I understand."

"Have you ever done anything like this before?"

"No. Never. And I'll never do it again."

"Why did you do it then?"

"I don't know. I have no idea. I just did it."

I sat down on the chair, looked up at her, she was staring out the window.

"Of course I want to be with you," she said, and turned. Tears were coursing down her cheeks.

One year later we moved in together. Right below the Science Building we found a two-room apartment which we tried to fit out as best we could with the little furniture we had. The bedroom was at the back, it was as small as a cabin on a boat and we had no room for much more than the bed. Outside it was the living room, also small, and to make more room we partitioned it with a bookcase. On one side I had a little place to write; on the other we put the sofa, chairs, and a table.

Here we had our first arguments, this was the practical side of living together that you had to get used to, but also our first real life together with each other, suddenly we shared everything. In this little apartment we slept together, we ate together, listened to music or watched TV together, and I liked her always being there and always returning after she had been out. She was now a manager at Student Radio and worked long hours. I had started studying again, after a four-year break, I took History of Art and was so ashamed at being much older than most of the other students that I never attempted any contact. When I wasn't attending lectures and studying slides of artworks I was poring over books in the reading room and devouring them like a maniac. After my national service had finished in March the year before I had joined Jon Olav and some of his friends in Vats, where a gigantic oil platform, Troll, was being built and they had got some work. I went along in the hope that more employees would be needed in due course, and after having slept on the sofa in an admin hut for three nights, of all the fortune hunters only Ben and I were left, and even though we, or at least I, had to be the worst qualified construction workers they had ever encountered, we got jobs in the end. I worked there for two and a half months, down one of the shafts, which when I started stretched perhaps twenty meters above the sea, but, by the time I finished, were more than a hundred meters high. At the beginning I suffered from vertigo, but the shaft grew so slowly that I eventually became used to heights and during my last days, with a sense of pride, I moved around outside the edge on scaffolding which consisted of three planks and an insubstantial rail a hundred meters above the water, without feeling the slightest fear. I was an awful laborer, but the job was so simple that I still managed. We did twelve-hour shifts, either day or night, and walking around at night, beneath the stars, amid the drone of machinery, seeing the lights of the three other shafts, in the middle of the fjord, surrounded by the vast darkness, while the wind howled around our ears, was magical, it was as though we were alone in the universe, a little colony of humans on an illuminated vessel in the great nothing. Tonje was furious with me when I returned, not because I had left her for a job only a few weeks after we had got together, but because I hadn't called her once. I explained to her that in fact I had tried once, but she hadn't been at home and apart from that one attempt there hadn't been time. I slept, ate, worked, that was it. She didn't believe me, I realized, she thought this meant something, was a sign of something. Perhaps it was, I hadn't thought about her much, I had been engrossed by the fantastically exotic nature of the work, but what did that matter so long as I could look her in the eye and say I loved her and really mean it? Look her in the eye and say she was the only one for me, now and forever?

The money had poured into my account and I wanted more. The work at Troll Oil was finished for my part, but I could continue at Troll Gas, which they were building at Hanøytangen, just outside Bergen. I called them, and when I said I had worked for Norwegian Contractors, the door was open. They were probably expecting an expert of some kind or other and must have been disappointed when they realized I was only a clumsy academic, but I kept the job until the work was finished. It was heavy going and monotonous, but I liked it so much I started wondering about applying for other big projects, such as the new airport they were building in Østland that I had heard talk of during the breaks.

While I worked at Hanøytangen I lived at home, and in my free weeks I was with Tonje all the time, down in my apartment, where I woke up early every morning and dashed out to buy fresh shrimp, fresh bread, freshly ground coffee, fruit and juice for our breakfast, or up in her crooked, windblown apartment, which would be eternally illuminated by love's first glow.

One day I finally met Tonje's mother and her husband, who had been living in Africa for some months. Now they were back for a few weeks, they had borrowed a house from some friends, we had dinner in the garden, I was nervous, but it all went fine, they were kind and curious to meet me, and as we were about to leave they said we should visit them in Africa, at Christmas, perhaps. We accepted the invitation. We had the money and the time.

I tried to rekindle my writing, but it didn't flow, nothing came of it, nothing serious, at least not compared with what Kjartan or Espen wrote. I thought I would have to travel for a while, write full-time, and as it was possible now to have unemployment benefits sent from Norway to EU countries I thought I might just as well live in one of them, such as England, and got in contact with Ole. He had married an English girl and lived in Norwich and said it would be a great town for me.

The morning I was due to leave I broke a mirror. Tonje didn't say anything, but I knew she was angry. In the taxi on the way to the boat I said I hadn't done it on purpose.

"It's not the mirror, you muppet," she said, crying. "It's the fact that you're leaving me."

"Are you upset about that?"

"Didn't you know?"

"No. It's only for three months. And you're going to visit me. And then we're going to Africa afterward, for Pete's sake. Besides I have to write something soon."

"I know," she said. "I'm just going to miss you terribly. But I'll be fine. You don't have to feel sorry for me, if that's what you think."

She smiled.

As I was going up the tubular gangway an hour later and turned and saw her standing there, and we waved to each other a last time, I was thinking I loved her and wanted to marry her.

This was one of those thoughts that change everything. One of the thoughts that just appear and everything else slots into place. It was a thought with future and meaning. That was what I was missing and had missed for so long. A future and meaning.

Of course we could just live together and see what happened. Actually there was no less future and meaning in that. Tonje was Tonje whether we were married or living together. Nevertheless. No one else I knew my age was married, marriage belonged to the generations before us, it was a nineteenth-century anachronism, created as a result of a rigid sexual morality and an equally rigid view of humanity, in which the woman was at home with the children and the man out at work, it was as antiquated as a top hat and a chamber pot, Esperanto and a paddleboat. The sensible option for modern men and women was not to marry, the sensible option for modern men and women was to live together, to respect each other for what we were, in ourselves, and not to be dependent on external institutions to live our lives. There was nothing to say we had to run around in jogging pants and watch videos in the evening, have a few kids, split up, and have custody every second week. We could organize our lives in a dignified manner with the means our era had placed at our disposal. That was the sensible and appropriate option. But love wasn't sensible, love wasn't reasonable, love wasn't appropriate, it was more than that, had to be more than that, so for Christ's sake, why not drag up marriage from the mists of time and impose its form on love again? Why not use the big words again? Why not solemnly swear that we will love each other forever? Why not insist on the profound solemnity it implied? Honor the lifelong obligation? Everything else we did was nonsense, regardless of what we were doing, it was nonsense, no one believed in it, not really. No one I knew anyway. Life was a game, a pastime, and death: it didn't exist. We laughed at everything, even at death, and that wasn't completely wrong, laughter always had the last word, the skull's grin when one day we lay there with earth in our mouths.

But I wanted to believe, I did believe, I would believe.

I picked up the cabin key from reception, dropped off my suitcase, and went up to the café. Everything lay open before me. I was going to a new country, to a town I had never seen, I had nowhere to live and no idea what was awaiting me.

I would be there for three months. Then we were going to Africa and there I would be free.

It was perfect.

The boat slid out. Tonje would probably be on her way home now, I thought, and went up on deck to see if I could catch a glimpse of her. But we were already quite far away, it was impossible to identify any of the black figures walking along Bryggen from this distance.

The sky was gray, the water we steadily made our way through, black. I held the railing and gazed toward Sandviken. The old idea of leaving everything returned for a brief instant. The worst of it was that it would be all right. I had always known that I could turn my back on everything and just leave, with no regrets. I could also leave Tonje. I didn't miss her when she wasn't there. I didn't miss anyone and never had. I never missed Mom, I never missed Yngve. I never missed Espen, I never missed Tore. I hadn't missed Gunvor when we had been together, and I didn't miss Tonje now. I knew I would wander through the streets of Norwich, sit in lodgings somewhere writing, perhaps go out for a drink with Ole, and I wouldn't miss her. I would think about her now and then, with warmth but not with longing. This was a flaw in me, a shortcoming I had, a coldness in my heart. If I got close to people I could sense what they wanted and would subordinate myself to that. If Gunvor had felt I was too distant from her I sensed that feeling and tried to meet it halfway. Not for my sake but for hers. If I said something Espen considered stupid I was ashamed and tried to make amends, his assessment of me was paramount. Couldn't I be distant and stand firm? Couldn't I be stupid and stand firm?

No, not there, not in front of them.

But, when I was alone, it meant nothing.

This coldness in my heart was terrible, sometimes I thought I wasn't human, I was a Dracula who lived off other people's emotions, but had none myself. My love affairs, what else were they but a mirror? What else were they but my own feelings?

What I felt for Tonje was genuine, however, and since a genuine feeling was more precious to me than anything else, I had to commit everything to that.

But I didn't miss her.

All day and all evening I sat reading and jotting down ideas and thoughts in my notebook. It was now or never. I couldn't be someone who wrote but wasn't published for much longer, both for purely practical reasons – one, I already lagged several years behind those I had started studying with, and two, I had to make a living – and for matters surrounding my dignity. A twenty-year-old writing full-time to become a writer is simply charming; a twenty-five-year-old doing the same is a loser.

A short story like Joyce's "The Dead," I wrote in my notebook. A family gathering in which all the characters represent stages of life, childhood, adolescence, middle age, the declining years, but are at the same time themselves, idiosyncratic people, in the middle of life. Such a gathering, with all its conflicts, when the 1940s are present, the 1960s are present, like pockets in the here and now, the complexity, without any history, then the gathering disperses and the little nuclear family is on its way home. In the back of the car the two children, the older one is asleep, the younger awake with closed eyes listening to his parents talking about something dreadful. Either from the past, something important, or something that is going to happen. It is snowing. They arrive, the house is dark and still, they go in . . . and then? What's going to happen now? What is big enough to build on everything that has gone before?

I closed my notebook and immersed myself in Ulverton by Adam Thorpe. It had been translated by Svein Jarvoll and was about a fictional place in rural England, every chapter enacted a different epoch, the first the 1600s, the last our century. The chapters were written in a variety of forms and dialects. Jarvoll had chosen the Skjåk dialect for one, and it was strange how well it fit: the gates in the fences that were opened for riders to pass through, the fields and the trees, the low crumbling houses, it all fitted the Skjåk dialect. Perhaps in a way because dialects grew from the countryside around them, the style of speaking originated just there, in that particular valley, where the pronunciation of one word, for example, had come into existence with the great oak tree, which was now almost a thousand years old, the pronunciation of another with the terrain being cleared and the ancient stone wall built. In other areas there were other words and other oak trees, fields, and stone walls.

Time flowed through this novel, whirled through human lives. The appeal was enormous.

Perhaps I was attracted to it so much because I had grown up in a place where there was only the present day and the past was in books?

I bought a beer, wrote 1600s in my notebook, looked at my watch, it would soon be twelve, drank up, and went to bed.

The cabin was deep in the bowels of the boat, just under the engine room. This made me think about Grandpa, he always used to book a cabin above the waterline. If he couldn't, well, he would sleep in a recliner. I wasn't bothered by such concerns, the ship could sink while I was asleep for all I cared.

I undressed, read a few pages of Ulverton, turned off the light, and fell asleep. I awoke in the darkness a few hours later from the most fantastic dream I'd ever had.

I sat up and laughed to myself.

I had been walking down the road outside our house in Tybakken. Suddenly there was a roar from above the earth. The noise was deafening, I knew there had never been such a roar before, it rolled across the sky like thunder, though infinitely louder.

It was God's voice.

I stopped and looked at the sky.

And then I was raised up!

I was raised up to the sky!

What a feeling it was. The roar, the majesty of God's presence, and then the incredible moment when I was raised up. It was a moment of peace and perfection, joy and happiness.

I lay down again.

OK, so it was only a dream. But the feeling, that was real. I had really felt it. What a shame I had been asleep when I felt it, but now I knew it existed anyway, I thought, closed my eyes and dived into sleep, hoping something even more fantastic was in store for me.

When I was seven, we went to England on holiday, my memories of it were the best I had of my childhood, and they all returned when, the next afternoon, I stood holding the railing and gazing at the strip of land that had appeared in the distance. It was England. We passed some fishing boats on our way in, seagulls circled in the air above them, before us the land seemed to sink as we approached, I saw more and more of it until we entered what was like a canal and actually found ourselves in the middle. Run-down warehouses and factory buildings on either side with large areas of refuse-filled wasteland between them.

The grass was yellow, the sky gray, and if anything at all glowed it was the brickwork of the buildings, but of rust, the color of perishability and decay. Oh, that filled my soul, this was England; the buildings we saw probably originated from the first period of industrialization, I loved the Empire that had declined but was still proud, and those who grew up in this dismal grayness captivated us all, first the sixties' generation, pop, the Beatles and the Kinks, then the seventies' heavy rock, all the evil bands from the metalworking towns in the Midlands, filthy rich in their twenties, then punk, in the mountains of uncollected garbage in 1976, then post-punk and goth rock, the enormous seriousness they brought to their music, and then, now, Madchester, raves, colors, and beat. England, I loved England, everything about England. The soccer, what more could you want than a tired old stadium from the beginning of the twentieth century, filled with ten to twelve thousand grim-faced, fiery working-class men, the mist over the heavy muddy field and tackles so hard they echoed between the advertising billboards? The dark houses with wall-to-wall carpets everywhere, even on the stairs and in pubs.

When the boat docked I got on one of the double-decker buses going to the town center. The cries of newspaper vendors met me first as I alighted. The air was noticeably much warmer than it had been in Bergen, I was in another country again, everything was slightly unfamiliar. I walked to the train station and bought a ticket to Norwich, waited in a café there for a couple of hours, and boarded the train.

In Norwich I took a taxi to the University of East Anglia, Ole had said they rented rooms there before term started, which was correct, I was allocated one, I dropped off my luggage and walked down to the student bar I had noticed when I arrived. I sat alone for a couple of hours drinking and watching the students and trying to pretend I belonged there. The following day I went into town. It was small, surrounded by the remnants of a medieval wall, full of small churches used now for a multitude of purposes, in one I saw a pub and in another a sports shop. There were rivers with houseboats moored to the banks and there was a beautiful towering medieval cathedral. I bought a loaf of bread and some salami slices and sat down in a field nearby. Some boys were playing rugby in front of me, schoolboys, I assumed. The sight of their uniforms and the exotic game evoked strange melancholy feelings in me, I was reminded of Victorian times, the Empire, boarding schools, factories, the colonies, of which these young boys were a part. It was their history and could not be mine.

I bought two local newspapers and sat in a pub beside the river, ordered a cider and read through the accommodation ads, circled three that might be possibilities.

The first only rented a room to students, I was stupid enough to say I was unemployed and she just put down the phone. The second was more promising. She had a room in town, she said, but they lived somewhere else, could I meet her there?

Yes, I could. I jotted down the address, bought some chewing gum so that I didn't smell of alcohol, and got into a taxi.

A man in ragged clothes with a beard and earrings opened the door, shook my hand, said his name was Jim, called his wife, who came out and said hello. You come with me, he said, passing me a piss-pot–type helmet. His motorbike was in the garden. It had a sidecar, which I was supposed to get into. The sidecar was a bathtub, which he had welded on. He pushed the vehicle forward, gestured, take a seat. I climbed in and reluctantly sat down. He started up and we moved into the road and headed for the city center. People on the sidewalks and in cars stared at me. A Norwegian measuring almost two meters was sitting in a bathtub wearing a piss pot and weaving through the streets of Norwich.

The house was in a working-class district. A long row of identical brick buildings on either side up a gentle incline. He unlocked the door, I followed him in. First there was a staircase, carpeted, leading up to two rooms, of which I would have one. A bed, a wardrobe, a chair, and a desk, that was it.

He asked me what I thought.

"It's brilliant," I said. "I'll take it."

We went back down, into the living room. It was full from floor to ceiling with objects. All sorts of junk, from old car parts to stuffed birds. He said he was a collector.

This was not the only surprise. In a huge aquarium on the part of the floor that wasn't yet occupied was a boa constrictor.

He said that usually he would have let me hold it, but it was too hungry now.

I checked his expression to see if he was joking.

He was utterly serious.

Behind the living room there was a little kitchen, and behind that, a small bathroom with a tub.

"It's brilliant," I repeated, paid him two months' rent as a deposit, he showed me how the gas oven worked, said I could use anything there and he would pop by in the next few days to feed the snake.

Then he went, and I was left with the boa constrictor. It slowly coiled round the aquarium and nestled up to the glass. I was trembling as I watched and felt more and more nauseous. Even while I was unpacking upstairs in my room my body trembled with unease, the thought of it downstairs preoccupied my mind to the exclusion of everything else, also when I was asleep, I had nightmare after nightmare about snakes of all shapes and sizes.

Ole had written to say he would be in Norway when I arrived, so my immediate world during the first few days was the small carpeted room, which I left in the morning, to wander around town, and returned to in the afternoon. The noises outside were unfamiliar, children playing, shouting and screaming in English, and I never really got used to the long row of dirty terraced houses I faced, it was as though I was in an English TV series, meanwhile the snake downstairs was getting hungrier and hungrier. Sometimes it reared up and banged its head hard on the glass. A chill ran though me. But I was also fascinated, I would sit down on the floor by the aquarium and closely scrutinize this outlandish creature with which I shared my house.

At the end of the week the landlord returned. He shouted for me to come, this I had to see.

He took out some mice he had in the freezer. On the same shelf that I had put my sausages, I noticed. He warmed the mice lightly in the oven, lying on their backs with their legs sticking up. When finally they had thawed, while he'd been smoking his pipe and showing me a Norwegian tobacco blend, Eventyr, from the seventies, he had in his heap of junk, which Dad had smoked when I was a boy, he took one mouse by the tail, pushed the top of the aquarium to the side, tapped on the glass a few times, to wake the sleeping snake, and then dangled the mouse to and fro. The snake, sleepy and lethargic, slowly raised its head and then, so quickly I recoiled, launched itself at the mouse. It was given four mice. For the next four days it lay still in the aquarium with four large bulges in its otherwise slim body.

Once the world consisted of creatures like this one, deeply primitive, they slithered across the ground or thundered along on their huge taloned feet. What was life like when that was all there was? When we knew that once there had been nothing else, and actually it was still like that? Just a body and food and light and death?

One thing I had learned when I was working at the first institution: life wasn't modern. All the variants, all the deformities, all the freaks of nature, all the mental disabilities, all the insanity, all the injuries, all the illnesses, they still existed, they were as present now as they had been in the Middle Ages, but we had hidden them, we had put them in enormous buildings in the forest, created special camps for them, consistently kept them out of sight so as to give the impression the world was hale and hearty, that that was how the world and life were, but they weren't, life was also grotesque and distorted, sick and crooked, undignified and humiliated. The human race was full of fools, idiots, and freaks, either they were born like this or they became like this, but they were no longer on the streets, they no longer ran around frightening the wits out of people, they were in civilization's shadow, or night.

That was the truth.

The snake's life in the aquarium was another truth.

Once upon a time there were no creatures on earth with eyes. Then eyes developed.

After a few days in the house I realized I could forget about writing. I tried, but to no avail, what could I write about? Who did I think I was, believing I could create something that would interest anyone apart from my mother and my girlfriend?

Instead I wrote letters. To Espen, to Tore, to Yngve, to Mom, to Tonje. I described my days in detail, from the postman whistling "The Internationale" as he walked past in the morning, everything I saw on my many long walks through the town, to the strange experiences I had at the Job Center, all the poverty and misery revealed there, the seriousness of life that contrasted so starkly with my own, since nothing was at stake for me, the unemployment benefit I received was probably ten times higher than theirs, and actually was sort of a joke, something I had applied for in order to create time to write. The welfare officer I was assigned to must have been suspicious, at any rate he raised his voice with me now and then and threatened to withdraw all payments if I couldn't provide evidence soon that I was actually looking for work there in town.

Ole returned from Norway, I visited him and his wife in their apartment. It was tiny, she was very English. Ole was exactly as I remembered him, self-effacingly nice yet intense. He was still studying his subjects, but never took any exams, he was paralyzed by fear, however much he knew, however brilliant he was, he couldn't make himself take an exam. We made the rounds of all the secondhand bookshops, his favorite writer was Samuel Johnson, whom he occasionally translated on his own, for fun, and Boswell, and still Beckett, as five years ago.

I liked him a lot. But that didn't justify my stay here. I had to write. But what? Five days in succession could pass without me saying a word to anyone. Everything was unfamiliar, the houses, the people, the shops, the countryside, no one needed me, no one cared about me, and that was perfect, that was exactly how I wanted it, just walking around and looking, and looking at everything in existence without it looking back.

But to what end? And with what justification? What was the point of looking if you couldn't write about what you saw? What was the point of experiencing anything at all if you couldn't write about what you'd experienced?

I got drunk with Ole a few times, he always went back home when the pubs closed, I didn't want to, and he would accompany me to one of the nightclubs, say good-bye outside, and I would go in and continue drinking on my own, without talking to a soul. At four I would stagger home and to bed. Sleep in the next day, full of angst, listen to Radio 1, read all the major newspapers, that took all day, and then I would go back to bed.

Supergrass's debut single was played around the clock. I bought it. Elastica were in Norwich, I went to see them, drunk and on my own. With the money I received from Norway I bought secondhand seventies tracksuit jackets, shoes, jeans, records, and books. Caught the bus to London in the morning, trudged round the Tottenham Court Road area all day, and came back in the evening.

After I had lived like this for two and a half months, Tonje came to visit me. We went to London, bought tickets to Johannesburg and Maputo, and caught the plane home together to Bergen.

In Africa I asked her if she would marry me.

She said yes, I will.

Back in Bergen, in the new apartment, I realized I couldn't go on like this anymore. We were getting married in a few months and I couldn't let Tonje marry an idiot who thought he could be a writer, someone who was throwing his life away, I prized her too highly for that, so I went out and bought the most important art history books, borrowed the rest from the University Library, and set about reading them.

Tore, who was still studying Literature, writing a dissertation about Proust and his name, told me that an editor in Oslo had called him, he'd read Tore's reviews in Morgenbladet and wondered whether he would like to work as a reader for him. Tore said he would. He had also told him he was a writer, and the editor, Geir Gulliksen, wanted to read what he had done.

I had also written reviews in Morgenbladet. Indeed, it had been me who got Tore into Morgenbladet. So why hadn't Geir Gulliksen called me?

But then something happened for me too. I received an invitation in the mail to contribute to an anthology. The Writing Academy had some anniversary or other and they were looking for contributions from alumni. I sent them "Zoom." It wasn't a competition, the anthology was open only to alumni and I hadn't even considered the possibility of a rejection. But I was rejected. They didn't want it.

I had reacted to every other rejection with composure, they were expected, all of them. But this one crushed me. I was completely demoralized for several weeks and this led to me making the final decision to stop writing. It was simply too humiliating. I was twenty-six years old, I was getting married, I could no longer live with the dream.

Some weeks later I went up to Tore's, we were going to Verftet to practice with the new band. It consisted of Hans and Knut Olav from Kafkatrakterne plus Tore and me. Lemen, we were called, the hyperactive Norwegian lemming, after Tore, his shaven head and inexhaustible energy.

We walked downhill to the center. It was the beginning of March, one o'clock in the afternoon, the streets were dry and filled with that delicate pale spring light that came gradually and imperceptibly after the winter's endless succession of damp gray dark days.

Tore looked at me.

"I've got some good news," he said.

"Oh?" I said, fearing the worst.

"My manuscript has been accepted. It's coming out this autumn! I'm going to make my debut!"

"Is that true? But that's fantastic, Tore," I said.

All the energy I had drained away. I walked beside him, black to the core inside. It was so unfair. It was just so unfair. Why should he, four years younger than me, have the talent and not me? I had long reconciled myself to the fact that Espen had the talent, his debut was no surprise, it made sense. But Tore? And so young?

Shit.

Tore was beaming like a sun.

"'This has to be published,' Geir Gulliksen told me. I sat up all night thinking of titles. I've got a list of them here. Want to see?"

He took a folded sheet of paper from his inside pocket and passed it to me. I read as we walked.

Julian's Calendar
Once as Invisible as Nausea
Snowflake
Sleeping Tangle
A Liberated Blush
A Tangled Second
For Shame's Sake
Once and for All

"Julian's Calendar," I said. "Without any doubt."

"I like Sleeping Tangle," Tore said.

"No, it's too cryptic. What is a sleeping tangle?"

"It's a mood, a problem that exists but hasn't had any impact yet. There's something passive about it. Or abandoned. Above all, though, it creates a mood."

"Julian's Calendar," I said, giving him the sheet of paper. He put it back in his inside pocket.

"We'll see," he said. "Actually I'll soon have finished. Only have to polish it now."

"Would you like me to read it?" I said.

"Not yet. But if you wouldn't mind reading the final version."

I had already read a lot of his work and this much I knew: I couldn't help him. It was much better than anything I had written. The most disturbing feature of it was that he hadn't just taken a narrative form and filled it with what he'd learned it should be filled with, as one might be tempted to think would be the case with a debutant who was only twenty-two. He had taken a form, that was true, but the whole project, everything he wrote about was in some unclear but obvious way connected with himself, his very essence, all the fascinations he had and was almost unaware of, and he could therefore write about with the unfettered joy of discovery.

"Congratulations," I said. "That's absolutely fantastic news."

"Yes, it really is," he said. "At long last! Seventeen fucking rejections it took. But now I'm there."

At that time we practiced a lot, the band was going to play at the new Studentkvarteret in the spring and we hadn't been together that long, there was still a lot to work on. Tore, our singer, had written half the songs, Knut Olav, who played the guitar, the other half, apart from one, which Hans, now the bass player, had written. Knut Olav was prodigiously talented, he played all the instruments and composed excellent pop songs and could have gone far if he'd had better musicians around him. But he wouldn't hear of it. As a drummer, he was perhaps a thousand times better than me, but he put up with me slowing and accelerating the tempo of his songs, and when he arranged them, all he had in his head was something unfussy. With Tore on vocals as well, utterly undaunted by his high profile as he was, brazen even, everything worked out fine.

There was nothing I liked more than playing with them and then going out afterward. Maybe ringing Tonje and getting her to come along. All while the light was growing and the leaves were coming out on the trees.

The nineteenth of May was the day we were playing at Kvarteret. I turned up a few hours before the sound check, Tore met me at the door, I could see at once that something had happened.

"Have you heard?" he said.

"Heard what?"

"Tor Ulven's dead."

"Dead? Are you serious?"

"Yes. Geir Gulliksen called to tell me."

"But he was young."

"Yes. And Norway's best writer."

"Yes. Oh, Jesus. How awful."

We went into the café and discussed the news farther. Both Tore and I considered him to be quite different from and much better than the rest of Norwegian literature. I thought of Espen, it had been him who'd introduced me to Ulven and he had read him more intensely than anyone I knew.

Hans and Knut Olav came, we drifted into the auditorium, did the sound check and gradually stage fright took over, half an hour before we went on I was on the point of throwing up, but as usual the fear vanished the moment we appeared and played the first bars.

Afterward we sat backstage drinking beer and chatting about the performance – what were you actually doing there, I completely lost it there and had no idea where we were – someone poked a head in and said the Crown Prince had been in the audience, we laughed, but Tore wasn't with us, he was in shock, the sudden death, I could see it in his face, the brief moments of total absence that punctuated his otherwise sociable persona. If anyone had inspired him in the writing of his book, it had been Ulven. Nonetheless, we moved on, went to Garage, and when it closed I walked home with Tonje, the night was still, the streets spring light beneath the mountains and the sky with twinkling stars.

We spent more and more time discussing the wedding and planning it. It would be at her home in Molde, she wanted it on the island of Hjertøya, and so it was to be, I wanted it as small as possible, only family, she agreed to that so long as we had a party afterward with everyone we knew.

I called Dad and told him I was getting married. Still he had a hold over me, still not a day passed without my thinking about him, and I had long dreaded this conversation. He had separated from his wife and moved to Østland, but I managed to track him down at Grandma's.

"I've got some good news, Dad," I said.

"Oh?" he said.

"I'm getting married."

"Uh-huh. A bit young, aren't you?"

"No, I want this. You were only twenty when you got married."

"Different times. I had to, you know."

"We're getting married in Molde this summer. I'd like you to come of course."

"I can do that. Grandma and I will drive up, I imagine. What's the name of the girl you're marrying?"

"Tonje."

"Ah, so it's Tonje, is it. OK, that's good. But now I have to be off."

"Alright. Bye."

"Bye, Karl Ove."

The thought of him coming was a concern for me, not only because of his drinking but also the fact that I would see him there with Mom for the first time since I was sixteen. On the other hand, I wanted him to be present. I was getting married, he was my father, it was important. It was of less concern that Tonje's family would see the state he was in and he might cause a rumpus.

It was also important that Tonje should meet him. I had told her a lot, but meeting him was quite another matter. What I had told her would have a different meaning then.

A few days later Tore said he was moving to Oslo, he wanted to be there when the book came out, that was where it was all happening. Inger would go with him of course, otherwise he wouldn't have gone. Tore couldn't be alone.

"But what about the band?" I said. "It's finally beginning to click. You don't need to move just because your book is coming out, do you?"

"We've lived in Bergen for so long now," he said. "It feels as if the town has nothing left to offer."

"Tell me about it," I said. "I've lived here for seven long years!"

"Anyone would think you'd been forced to live here the way you're talking. Take Tonje and move to Oslo as well."

"I'll never do that. You can say what you like about Bergen, and perhaps not a lot happens here, but at least it's not the center."

"No, because the center's where it all happens!"

"Yes, and I don't want to be there."

"Oh, so you'd rather sit on the margins as the unrecognized genius?"

"Genius? Do me a favor. You go. The cemetery's full of irreplaceable people, as Einar Førde once said."

"What's up with you today?"

"I mean what I said. We've got something good going with Lemen."

Tore threw up his arms.

"C'est la vie," he said. "I can't sit on my hands here just because you want me to."

"No, you're right about that."

He handed in his Proust dissertation, gave me his manuscript, which was theoretically ready to be published, I read it, made a few comments which he accepted with gratitude, albeit without acquiescing to them, and one day I saw them off, Tore and Inger, on their way to their new home in Oslo. I often crossed the mountains to visit Espen, now I could visit Tore as well. My life was here, with Tonje, in Bergen.

Three weeks before the wedding, Dad phoned. He said he couldn't come after all. Grandma wasn't doing well, he said, it was a long trip, he couldn't risk her health.

"So I can't make it, Karl Ove," he said.

"But I'm getting married!"

"I can't make it, you have to understand that. Grandma's fragile and . . . Well, we can't drive all the way up to Molde now."

"You're my father!" I said. "I'm your son! I'm getting married. You can't say no."

I started crying.

"Yes, I can," he said. "I'm not coming, and that's it."

"Then you're just like your own parents," I said. "They didn't go to your wedding, either. Not to your first, or to your second. Are you going to do the same to me?"

"Well, I don't have to to listen to this," he said, and put down the phone.

I cried as I'd never cried before, completely overcome by my feelings, I stood in the middle of the floor, bent double, as wave after wave of sobs racked my body. I couldn't understand it, I hadn't realized how important it was for me that he come to the wedding, I'd had no idea, but it certainly had been, I concluded, put on my sunglasses, and went to town to walk it off. I cried all the way to the bus station, it was sunny and the streets were crowded with people, I felt excluded from them, I was deep inside myself, and when I had calmed down and was sitting in the café at Hotel Terminus, I understood nothing. Thinking coldly and calmly, I was glad he wouldn't be there. I had been worried about it, actually, in my heart of hearts, I hadn't wanted him there, neither at my wedding nor in my life. Then he said he wasn't coming to the wedding and I broke down.

Understand that if you can, I thought, worn down by all the crying, in the middle of this beautiful, spacious, almost empty 1920s café, with a little pot of coffee on the table in front of me, from whose spout at that very moment a droplet fell onto the white cloth, which greedily absorbed it.

We went to Molde a few days later. Even if the wedding wasn't a big affair there was still a lot to be done. Boats to and from the island had to be arranged, the food had to be organized and all the practical details connected with it, I had to write a speech and teach myself to waltz, the two events I dreaded most. I held my arms around a cushion and tried to practice the steps on the sitting-room floor after the others had gone to bed, to the music of Evert Taube, and I was reminded of Grandpa: it takes all sorts to make a world. Mom had bought my suit, one day we went out in Bergen and found one in olive green. Tonje's dress, which she loved, was a plain creamy yellow.

The day came, we went down to the function room where the ceremony would take place, I was nervous and thought I had everything under control, but when I met Mård and Ingunn outside and they congratulated me I realized this was not the case, I had nothing under control, because I suddenly started crying. I didn't understand why, but I summoned all the willpower at my disposal to suppress it.

When we said "I do" to each other we both had tears in our eyes. Afterward the whole company walked down to the harbor, where the boat was waiting. People snapped photos, the food was served, I made a speech, Yngve, who was my best man, made a speech, Tonje's father made a speech, and Mom made a speech. The sun shone, we danced on a terrace outside the reception room, I was both pleased and sad because Tonje was so happy and I wasn't worthy of her.

We went on our honeymoon to England, I insisted on this, she had suggested a hotel by a beach in a hot country, where everything was easy, I wouldn't have that, so there we were, on a bus from London to Cornwall, where I had been as a seven-year-old, although I recognized nothing at all, for a week we hopped from village to village along the coast, living in small dirty hotel rooms, apart from one, which was magnificent and as romantic as Tonje had hoped, with a terrace and a view across the sea, champagne waiting for us when we arrived, walks along the wild cliffs, dinner in the restaurant, me in a suit, her in a dress, we were, after all, newlyweds, which the waiters knew, they were very attentive, and I sat blushing and squirming, uncomfortable with all the attention, uncomfortable in the suit, I looked like an idiot, unable to escape the little picture and rise to the bigger one. Tonje, cool and beautiful, didn't understand this side of me, but she would.

Back home, we moved into a new apartment, in Sandviken, opposite the church, consisting of one long room with a combined kitchen and sitting room, as well as a bedroom, and, unlike all the other apartments I'd lived in over the past seven years, the building was in good condition. We couldn't afford it, but we rented it anyway. I was happy there, I especially liked the view of the church and the trees surrounding it.

At the end of August we went up to Mom's, where Yngve and I painted the house. Kjartan dropped by, he had written something, he said, but didn't have much hope, he had been refused too often for that, he was considering sending his manuscript to Oktober. What did I think?

Send it, send it, it's excellent.

Kjartan was a writer. Espen was a writer. Tore was a writer. But I wasn't, I was a student, I had come to terms with that and I used every ounce of strength I had to study. I followed the courses of lectures, went up to the reading room early in the morning and sat there until late at night. I liked the subject, especially the lectures, since so many of them were spent viewing slides, of all the greatest buildings, sculptures, and paintings in existence. All the material I had found difficult and impenetrable before, when as a twenty-year-old I had taken a stab at hard-core theory, was now easily comprehensible, and this was strange as I hadn't tackled any theory since, however I didn't waste any time pondering this, I was there to read, and read I did.

Tore's book came out, it received good reviews, he was invited to join Vagant, where two of my friends worked now. Tonje continued at the radio station, on weekends we visited her mother or her brother's family, unless it was just us two, either at home in front of the TV or out with friends. Life had settled down, it was good and, provided that I could pass the two subjects I needed and make a start on my main course, everything to do with job and career would sort itself out. In addition, I was also making a last desperate attempt to write again. This was against my better judgment, I no longer believed I could do it, I was running on sheer force of will. No more short stories, now it had to be a novel. It was about the slave ship Fredensborg, which had sunk off the island of Tromøya some time in the eighteenth century and was discovered when I was a boy, by the head teacher of my school, among others. I had always carried this story within me, had always been fascinated by it, not least when I saw objects from the ship exhibited at the Aust-Agder Museum, the world and history coincided in a point near where I grew up, and now I was going to write about it. Progress was slow, there was so much I didn't know, such as daily life on board a sailing vessel of almost three hundred years ago, I knew nothing about that, had no idea what they did or what tools they used or what they were called, only things like the sails or the masts, and that meant I had no freedom at all. I could describe the sea and the sky, but that wasn't much to base a novel on. Their thoughts? Yes, but what did a sailor think in the eighteenth century?

I didn't give up, I fought on, borrowed books from the university library, wrote a sentence or two after I returned from the reading room in the evening and for a few hours on Sunday mornings, it wasn't good, but sooner or later it had to click for me too, as it had done for Kjartan: Oktober had accepted his collection of poetry, it would be published next autumn. After twenty years of writing poems he was finally where he wanted to be and I was ecstatic on his behalf because he had resigned from his job, he had been forced to stop his studies, so writing was all he had left.

Late that autumn I got a phone call from Yngve in Balestrand, Gunnar had called him, Dad had gone missing.

"Gone missing?"

"Yes. He's not at work, not in the apartment, not with Grandma or Erling."

"Could he have caught a plane and headed south?"

"Doubtful. Something's probably happened to him. The police are searching for him. He's been reported missing."

"Really? Do you think he's dead?"

"No."

A few days later, he called again.

"Dad's been found."

"Oh? Where?"

"In a hospital. He's paralyzed. Can't walk."

"You're joking. Are you telling me the truth?"

"Yes, that's what I've been told. But it's unlikely to be permanent. It's alcohol-related in some way or other."

"What'll happen now?"

"He'll be admitted to a detox clinic."

I called Mom and told her. She asked me for the name of the clinic, I said I didn't know, but Yngve probably did.

"What are you going to do?"

"I was thinking of sending him my love."

The exam came, I wrote about Greek statues, it went well, at the oral they told me it didn't matter what I said, they couldn't give me a better grade than the one I already had. I continued with History of Art and took Philosophical Aesthetics on the side, read Kant's Critique of Pure Reason all Easter, Tonje applied for a radio job in Volda, Tore phoned to say he would be editing an anthology and wanted a text from me. But I haven't got anything, I said. Then you'll have to write something new, he said. You're doing this. I perused the little I had, there was nothing of any value, apart perhaps from a passage in the novel that was almost finished now. Fredensborg is sailing between the islands of Mærdø and Tromøya on this day in the eighteenth century, from Copenhagen bound for Africa to collect slaves, one of the crew stares over at the shore, there is a farm, a woman is drawing water from a well in a bucket, he looks at the house, which is derelict. Flies are buzzing around her. In the house a man starts sleeping more and more every day, he enters a coma, everything is crumbling around him, until at last sleep encloses him, encapsulates him, and she, after fighting against everything, is set free. I turned the text into a short story, entitled it "Sleep," and sent it to him.

In late spring Eivind Røssaak phoned, he had been appointed the culture editor in Klassekampen and inquired whether I would like to review books for him. I said yes. The History of Art exam came, I wrote fifty pages about the concept of mimesis, a whole booklet, which I handed in to the university porters before going home. The grades I was awarded were obscenely good and more and more I was reconciling myself to the idea that I was going to be an academic.

Tonje had been accepted in Volda and was going to move up there while I would stay in Bergen, start on my main course, and join her for the last year. Tore had accepted my piece, the anthology had come out, to a deafening silence, but it did do some good, Geir Gulliksen called one day and asked if I would be in Oslo in the near future, if so, he would like me to drop in on him, so that we could talk about me and my writing.

In fact, I would be, I lied, and we arranged to meet.

In Oslo I stayed with Espen, as always. Now Tore was in Oslo too, the three of us met up, cycled over to see Vigeland's morbid chapel in the morning and in the evening met again to go for dinner. It was a Vagant dinner, everyone who worked on the journal was there, Kristine Næss, Ingvild Burkey, Henning Hagerup, Bjørn Aagenæs, Espen, Tore – and then me. They had asked me to interview Rune Christiansen, it was to take place the following day, so I was a kind of associate member of the editorial team for a weekend. The dinner was at Kristine Næss's place, we sat around a small table, it was all nice and intimate, my two best friends were there, I was inside the circle, I was where I wanted to be, but my respect for them was too great, I didn't dare say anything, I just listened. Henning Hagerup, the best critic of his generation, sat next to me and asked me one or two polite questions, and I didn't answer. I said nothing, just looked down and nodded, glanced up at him, he smiled at me and turned away. We ate, the conversation was lively, but I was mute. I didn't dare say anything. In a big room with a lot of people this wouldn't have mattered because no one would have noticed, but here, where there were so few of us, it stood out. The longer I remained quiet, the more and more conspicuous it became, the more impossible it was to say anything. I cursed myself, tied myself in knots inside, couldn't stop, listened to what was said, formulated something I could say, but didn't, held back, held everything back. An hour passed, two hours passed, three hours passed. We had been sitting there for three hours and I hadn't said a single word. The atmosphere was warming up, beer and wine and cognac were on the table. Four hours passed, five hours passed, I hadn't said a word. Then another problem presented itself. Soon I would have to go, but how could I do that, after five hours I couldn't just get up and say thank you for everything, it's been nice, I'm afraid I have to go, that would be impossible. Nor could I leave without saying anything. I was trapped, as I had been trapped all evening, naturally everyone had noticed and both Espen and Tore had watched me initially with curiosity, then with concern, but in that gathering, which consisted exclusively of writers and critics, I couldn't speak, I had nothing to offer, I was an idiot, a blushing tongue-tied little shit who came to Oslo from the provinces thinking that with his savage reviews in Klassekampen and his glowing grades he at least had something to offer, but I had nothing, I was a nobody, a zero, indeed, such a nonentity that I couldn't even get up from the table. I couldn't speak and couldn't leave. I was trapped.

Five and a half hours passed. Six hours passed.

Then I went to the toilet. Went into the corridor, put on my shoes and jacket, poked my head around the door, they were still sitting around the table, and I said:

"Got to be off. Thanks for everything. It was nice."

Everyone shouted good-bye and nice to meet you, I carefully closed the door behind me, went down the stairs, and when I emerged and the cold sharp autumn air hit my face I burst into a run. I sprinted as fast as I could across the road and down the block, the veins throbbing in my neck, my mouth gasping for air, and that was why I did it, I assume, that was why I ran, I needed to feel that I was actually alive.

I had read Rune Christiansen's work for years, his visual, almost filmic, poetry had a strong appeal for me, and the moods it evoked or that were aroused in me were a kind of constant in my life, which always informed the way I saw and felt, but on which I never reflected. If the theme of transience appeared in his poetry it wasn't brutal, as it was with Tor Ulven, this osteal hardness which could occasionally split open into a death's-head grin, this bone-rattling merry dance, laughter as life's sole bulwark against the void, no, with Rune Christiansen transience was gentler, bathed in a light of reconciliation, it was rust, autumn, decay, hedgehogs shuffling through a pile of leaves, planes crossing the sky, romance in a hotel room, in a subway entrance, in a train clattering through a forest somewhere.

I met him in a Sunday-empty café in Lommedalen. In the forest outside, the darkness fell as we talked with the Dictaphone on the table between us. Hardly any newspapers or journals wrote about poetry, and this was to be quite a big interview, so he had prepared well, keeping some densely written sheets of paper at his side, presumably containing everything he had considered bringing up. I was no poetry expert, but in some way or other the questions appeared to strike a chord with him or else he managed to twist everything toward the essence of what he was trying to say in his writing, because the interview was a success, we sat there for close to two hours and when I left to catch the bus to town it felt as if everything was within my reach, I was on to something important, all I had to do was stretch out for it. This was a vague feeling, nothing on which you could build, but all the same I knew I had something there. In the mist, in the darkness of the forest, in the dew drops on the spruce needles. In the whales that swam in the sea, in the heart beating in my breast. Mist, heart, blood, trees. Why were they so appealing? What was it that enticed me with such power? That filled me with such enormous desire? Mist, heart, blood, trees. Oh, if only I could write about them, no, not write about them but make my writing be them, then I would be happy. Then I would have peace of mind.

The following morning I had arranged to meet Geir Gulliksen. He worked for a publishing house called Tiden, they had an office in Operapassasjen, I stood outside the door and wiped my palms on my thighs, hardly able to believe this was happening, I had an appointment with an editor in Oslo. Tore had engineered it, this was true, I had nothing to show him, this was true too, but I was actually standing here, I did have an appointment, no one could take that from me.

I took the elevator up and went into reception.

"I have an appointment with Geir Gulliksen," I said.

At that moment he walked around the corner, thin, rangy, smiling, self-assured. I recognized him from the photos I had seen.

"Karl Ove?" he said.

"Yes."

"Hi!"

We shook hands.

"We can go into my office," he said.

Manuscripts lay there piled up, big envelopes that probably also contained manuscripts, and books stacked high.

We sat down.

"Well, you sent us a damn good short story," he said. "I'd just like to put that on record."

"Thank you very much," I said.

"Are you working on anything now? Or have you got anything else that's finished?"

I shook my head.

"No, but I've got a large-ish project in mind."

"I'd be happy to read it."

Then he started asking me all sorts of questions, what I had done, what I liked reading. I told him Stig Larsson.

"Hah, all the young writers say Stig Larsson now. Two years ago no one talked about him."

"That's good, isn't it?" I said.

"Of course it's good," he said. "Anyone else you read?"

"Tor Ulven."

"Alright," he said, and laughed. Aligned the edges of a manuscript. Did that mean my time was up?

I rose to my feet.

"I'll send you something as soon as I have it."

"Yes, please do. It might take a while before you get an answer."

"That's OK."

He stood up and accompanied me out, raised a hand to wave good-bye, turned, and went back in. He had lots of important manuscripts to read, I thought, lots of important writers to meet. I wasn't one of them, he had arranged the meeting because of Tore, but I had a foot in the door, now I wasn't just a name but also a face, and he had promised to read what I sent him.

We spent Christmas with Tonje's father in Molde. I liked being there, he had a big house with a view of the fjord and the mountains behind, there was a swimming pool on the ground floor, a wet room with a sauna and diving equipment in a corner, a large open sitting room on the first floor, above it a loft with a ping-pong table. It was always spotless there, everything worked, there was snow shoveling in the early morning, skiing late morning, they had good lunches, cozy evenings, and if there were any problems in the household, if there were any hidden secrets, I never came across them. We used to go down to the city center in the mornings, often bump into her friends, with whom I never managed to behave naturally, I was always quiet and tormented, apart from when we went out and I drank of course or on New Year's Eve when we ate at Tonje's father's place, with all her friends, and suddenly I could talk from the heart with them. Even the angst the following day was less there, in well-ordered surroundings, I felt less like a bad person than a young son-in-law letting his hair down on vacation.

At the beginning of January, Tonje went back to Volda while I took my computer and headed for Kristiansand, where I'd rented a room in an old manor house on the island of Andøya – provided by the local council's arts department. The poet, Terje Dragseth, had been behind this. After living in Copenhagen for many years he had returned to his hometown, where he worked as a literary liaison officer on the local council. He was published by Tiden and was held to be one of the best poets of his generation, his poems were often described as "hymnlike," I hadn't read any of them myself. He was energetic and outgoing, his personality razor sharp. He drove me to the manor house, which had once been situated a long way out of town, in the country, but now it found itself in the middle of a housing estate. He showed me around, said I only had to give him a call if there was anything, worked for a while in his office, at the other end of the building, which I could use any time I wanted, then he went back to town and I was alone. I took my computer from its cardboard box, connected everything, put the books I had brought with me in a pile next to it. Two volumes of À la recherche du temps perdu, Avløsning by Tor Ulven, and Tore's debut novel, Sleeping Tangle.

The room was small, a bed, a desk, a kitchenette, but the building around it was enormous. From what I had gleaned, it had once belonged to the violinist and composer Ole Bull. In the evening I wandered around inside, the furniture and the wallpaper and everything was intact, like in a museum. I nosed around Dragseth's office, browsed through a few books, went back and sat down in front of my computer, but too much had happened that day for me to be able to work, so I rang Tonje and talked with her for an hour instead, then went to bed.

I woke up at eleven, had breakfast, switched on my computer, and sat down.

What was I going to write?

I didn't have the foggiest.

I opened some files to see if there was anything I could work farther on.

There is a time for everything. Now it is here, in this house, by this window with a precise segment of nature outside, resting in the dim May darkness; it cannot be other.

Footsteps across the soft grass, swish swish, in the rain. The rain falling on the field, the drops from the branches onto his neck as he stops to open the gate. It emits a gentle creak, thuds back against the post, is fastened with a wire loop. His hands are freezing cold. He shoves them into his pockets and walks on down the narrow muddy path.

* * *

The figure appears in the deep snow, running, head bowed into the wind. He notices the movement from the window, the figure becomes clearer, clearer against the heavy gray unchanging background; the eager flushed face of a boy with important news and a big responsibility. He knows what it is about, heard the shot himself some minutes ago. It filled him with such disquiet that to begin with he doubted what he had heard and speculated that it might have been thunder; instead of going out into the storm, up the hill, to investigate the matter, he tossed another log on the fire and sat down in the chair by the window, his head still muzzy with sleep. But now he had to go out, the boy was pounding on the door with his fists, shouting his name.

Every night the same. On scaffolding, high up, with an iron bar in my hand. The streets of the town so far below. A siren somewhere. The sudden clang of metal on brick. Someone shouting. I walk over to the railing. One of the cranes swings above the rooftop. The container hanging from the chains sways gently back and forth. Like prey, I think. I turn, smash the bar against the lock. What satisfaction. Grip the railing. Fingers in the glove, the coarse material against my skin. I know the metal is cold, I know I will feel it if I keep holding. But I duck underneath, walk along the planks on the scaffolding. Tip back my helmet, take off one glove, scratch my scalp. Feel the sudden cold on my sweaty forehead. Feels like the cold is coming from inside. One of the older workers is leaning against the railing staring out. I walk over to him. He says nothing. We gaze across the town. The sun is almost white against the hard blue sky. It gives everything we see great definition, I muse. The sun makes the scattered patches of ice glint. I feel like saying something to him. The shadow of the apartment building beneath us stretches across the sidewalk, making a sharp dividing line. The concrete bridge's gentle arch over the icebound lake. The smoke rising from the chimneys on the rooftops, almost invisible, just an undulating wave in the air, a darker hue. Heat. And the crane's leisurely hydraulic movements. I say nothing. I never say anything.

I could see no farther than the hills twenty meters from the house, with the cluster of rowan trees and the rickety fence at the top, which marked the boundary to the neighboring farm. The countryside beyond, the fjord, and the steep mountain on the far side of it, were hazy in a heavy gray mist. I opened the window a fraction. The rush of the ever-rising stream became louder. The deep ruts from the tractor wheels in the field were filled with turbid grayish-brown rainwater. I thought about the ferocious noise. With every turn of the wheels the tractor had sunk deeper, the sound had intensified in volume, in aggressiveness and power; a sign of impatience, of farther activity and the dogged belief that all problems can be solved. Then it was quiet. The neighbor jumped to the ground beside his vehicle in his thigh-length boots and yellow rain jacket, stood there studying it for a while, then returned in the ruts made by the tractor. He walked up the slope, across the field of red-currant bushes, over the fence, which the tractor had plowed through without ceremony, and for those of us standing at the window, watching, he disappeared from view. A little later we heard the sound of a second tractor, it swung up the gravel path and lumbered into the field; a neighbor was standing on the footplate holding on to the door frame, another neighbor was in the cab. Grandpa stood at the window while they attached the chain between the tractors and started them both up, he saw the thick black smoke pouring from the exhaust pipes as the engines were put under strain, the tractor rocked back and forth until in a matter of minutes it was pulled onto firm ground and the second neighbor could drive away. He watched with a blank expression on his face, I couldn't read any of his thoughts and I couldn't ask. Two days before, on the first evening here, he had discreetly referred to Kjartan's plans for what he still called the bog land, what he had intended to do with it this year. After seeing him stare at all this activity outside his own window, in which we weren't involved – Why didn't the neighbor come in and ask us for help? Why didn't he use our phone? It was right here, in the hallway.

He could have used it to call, couldn't he? – I didn't consider his remarks to Kjartan about the running of the farm to be a sign of calculated malice, as I first thought, nor incipient senility, as though he had forgotten what it was like here, no, it was a loss so great that he couldn't take it in, he had to act as if nothing had changed, re-create what went on outside here every day, find an explanation he could accept. Are you sure we can afford to hire all these people, he asked Kjartan later that day, when we were in the sitting room eating waffles. He drank the lukewarm mixture of half cream and half coffee, sucked a sugar cube, waited for an answer. I looked at Kjartan. He made no attempt to answer, carried on eating, but not in such a convincing way that I was unaware he was repressing enormous irritation. This had been going on for some time. But of course you've got another income on the side, Grandpa said, and with that he calmed down. I didn't know what to say, so we continued to eat in silence. There was nothing to ask, nothing to discuss.

I took the lid off the saucepan. Circles of grease had floated to the top, a couple of sausages had already split. I pulled it off the heat and took a pair of wooden tongs from the drawer. The clock on the wall above the window showed it was nearly twelve. Even if the land was leased out and everything that could be called farmwork had ceased many years ago, they still maintained the old mealtimes: breakfast at six, lunch at twelve, tea at five, and supper at nine. Habits that were tied to farmwork. This was how it had been around here for many centuries. And it had been like this for a reason. The fury I occasionally felt as they sat down to eat lunch at twelve sharp was completely unjustified, it was unreasonable to get worked up about this. Yet, somehow, yes, it was reasonable: what sort of life was it getting up at the crack of dawn to sit around all morning, as she did, in a chair, or as in his case, to lie on the sofa, with the radio on so loud that the voices were distorted, what sort of a life was it, living day after day, as though they were waiting for something and while they waited went into the kitchen to eat, then returned to wait and so on and so on? It was deeply entrenched inside them, almost an instinct, any tiny deviation could cause tremors that spread and became, or so it seemed, unbearable, perhaps even life-threatening.

I took the bread for the sausages out of the oven, turned off the stove, and put the sausages in a dish, then I went into the sitting room to get them. Grandpa was lying on the sofa, as was his wont, wearing a black suit, a tie, a somewhat stained, not-quite-white shirt. I glanced at the television and the picture of drenched, bedraggled children walking in line down a road somewhere in Norway shouting sporadic and halfhearted hurrahs, switched it off with the remote control, and bent down by Grandma's chair. She was also in her finery, a blue dress with white embroidery, a brooch fastened to her chest. A strip of paper towel hung from the neck band.

This is what I had. Two years' work. I knew every sentence by heart. The slog it had been was unbelievable. And the happiness at finding a phrase: head bowed into the wind, swish, swish in the rain. But this wasn't something I could take any farther, everything in these sentences stopped there.

What should I write about?

I switched off the computer, got dressed, went out, to the bus stop by the main road, and caught the bus to town. It was smaller than I remembered and closer to the countryside, especially the sea beyond the streets, heavy, brooding. I walked up and down Markens a few times, there weren't many people out and about, but the atmosphere felt congenial, people greeted one another or stopped and chatted. The sky was gray, and what I saw, I thought, was everyday Kristiansand, one of an endless number of days that came and went. The people walking past were in the middle of their lives, in the middle of the depth of their existence. It was as though I was on the outside, I didn't belong here, for me this was just a place and my relationship to it a mystery. What was belonging really? It wasn't the place itself, for that was only houses and a few rocks by a sea, rather it was what they had made the place, the meaning they had infused into it.

Everything is woven into memories, everything colored by the mind. Then time flows through the cocoon that is our life. Once we were seventeen, once we were thirty-five, once we were fifty-four. Did we remember that day? The January ninth, 1997, when we went into REMA 1000 to do our shopping and came out again with a bag in each hand and walked down to the car, put the bags on the ground and unlocked the door, placed the bags on the backseat, and got in? Beneath the darkening sky, by the sea, the forest behind, black and bare?

I bought a few CDs and a whole stack of books, which were on sale and I thought I might need for my writing.

I should go and visit Grandma, I couldn't stay in the town without doing that, I might bump into Gunnar at any moment, for example, and he would think it was strange and perhaps also impolite to be here without telling them.

But it could wait a few days, I was here to work primarily, they would understand that. Instead, I went to the library café, bought myself a cup of coffee, and sat flipping through the books with an occasional glance through the window. I recognized the girl working behind the counter from ungdomsskole, but I didn't know her well enough to say hello and she evinced no signs of recognition. The town was full of such faces, which once had formed the context of my life, but no longer meant anything, except for precisely this.

A girl parked her bike outside, performed all the necessary movements with consummate ease, in with the wheel, out with the lock, click it into position, straighten up, look around, head for the door, and remove the hood of her rain jacket.

She greeted a girl at the table behind mine, ordered a cup of tea, sat down, and started chatting. She talked about Jesus Christ, she'd had a religious experience.

I wrote down exactly what she said.

This is where the novel should start. Right here, in this town by the sea, in this library café, with this conversation about Jesus Christ.

Excited, I made notes. A young man arrives in his hometown, Kristiansand, overhears a conversation in the library café, meets an old gymnas friend, Kent, and is transported back in time.

In my room, a few hours later, I began to write. At around ten in the evening I rang Tonje and read her what I had written. She said it was good. I continued through the night. Whenever I dried up or I thought it wasn't good enough I leafed through one of the books I had with me, particularly Proust, and, invigorated by the atmospheres of that fantastic world and the clear language, I went on. There was no plot, I wanted to entwine the internal with the external, the neural pathways in the brain with the fishing smacks in the harbor, and so that the protagonist should not be me I made the language conservative, I no longer used the Norwegian "a" endings, I rewrote everything, it came to half a page, and I went to bed.

By the weekend I had eight pages.

I call Grandma. Is that you? she said. I told her I was in Kristiansand, would it be convenient if I dropped by? She replied that Dad was there and it would be nice if I did.

I hadn't seen Dad for almost two years. I had no wish to see him either, but now he knew I was here, so I couldn't not go.

I walked all the way from the bus station, over Lund Bridge and the final kilometer up to the house, nervous and tense the whole time, frightened for brief instants too, he was going to haul me over the coals, why hadn't I kept in touch?

I rang the bell, minutes passed, Grandma opened the door.

She'd changed. She was thin, her dress was stained and in a mess. But her eyes were the same. Radiant one moment, distant the next.

"He's upstairs," she said. "It's good you've come."

I followed her up the stairs.

He was in the sitting room watching TV. He turned his head when I entered the room. His face was damp with sweat.

"I'm going to die," he said. "I've got cancer."

I looked down. He lied about everything, even this, but I couldn't show I knew, I had to pretend I believed him.

"How awful," I said, glancing at him.

"I've just been to the hospital. They cut my back open. You can see the scars if you want."

I said nothing. He looked at me.

"Your father's going to die," he said.

"Right," I said. "But it could turn out OK, couldn't it?"

"No," he said. "That's out of the question."

He watched TV, I sat down on the footstool. Grandma came in and sat on the other chair, which faced the TV. We watched for a while.

"Everything going well here, Grandma?" I said.

"Yes, it certainly is," she said. A cloud of smoke hovered above her head. Dad struggled to his feet, lumbered across the floor to the kitchen, returned with a bottle of beer.

They were sitting in what had once been the parlor, used only on special occasions.

"I'm in Andøya Manor, writing," I said.

"That's good, Karl Ove," he said.

"Yes," I said.

All three of us watched the big TV. A girl was playing the flute.

"They say Erling's youngest girl is very musical," Grandma said.

Dad looked at her.

"Why are you always talking about her?" he said. "I'm also very musical."

I went cold inside. He had claimed that in all seriousness.

After half an hour in front of the television I got up and said I had to be off.

"Let's go to the restaurant one night while you're here," Dad said. "My treat."

"OK," I said. "I'll give a call. Take care."

No one went down with me. Distraught, I left, caught the bus to Andøya, where the mist lay thick and heavy between the houses on the estate, unlocked the door and went in, fried myself three eggs, put them on three pieces of bread, ate them standing by the window, sat down, and began to write again.

Back in Bergen, three months later, I had sixty pages, which I posted to Geir Gulliksen. In the two weeks that passed before he phoned me, I was beset by dreadful bouts of shame and terror. At first, I tried to repress what I had written, pretend it didn't exist, but to no avail, and so to gain control over these overwhelming feelings of humiliation I sat down one morning and tried to read my text through his eyes. I switched on the computer, opened the file, and the title page shone up at me.

A TIME FOR EVERYTHING
Novel, 1997
By Karl Ove Knausgaard

PART ONE
TIME'S PIONEER

The town is there, a place in the world, with its houses and shops, its streets, its harbor, its uplands. Geography, architecture, materiality. A place. Now and then I think about this town just before I fall asleep, follow one of the streets downward, pass house after house, block after block, I might stop in front of a facade and allow my eyes to wander over myriad details. The sun always shines on the dirty white wall, glints on a half-open veranda door, in front of it a terra-cotta flower box, two empty bottles, a plastic bag the wind has wrapped around the bars of the balcony balustrades. A hand grips the door, a face is glimpsed for a few seconds, the door slides shut. There is someone inside, I think, in this dark room, and that is how it is all over this town. An elderly woman draws the curtain to the side and stares out, her attention attracted by a sound. It is the neighbor opening his garage door; as so often before she watches him getting into the car, reversing down the drive, and she lets go of the curtain and lowers her head to concentrate on the crossword on the counter in front of her. Sometimes she lights one of the many half-smoked cigarettes in the ashtray, pencils in a word. A student sits gaping at the television, exhausted, with the sound off and the picture unclear in the glare from the morning sun. A woman bends her head and strokes her neck, a boy, ill in bed, watches the car he is operating race around the track again and again, another is in front of a computer shooting at anything that moves. There is no one to see them and they act without thinking; she crosses the kitchen floor to open a cupboard while the onions sizzle in the pan on the stove and the radio blares. A cat wakes up and stretches before slinking over to see if there is any food in the dish, a baby screams. This is how it is around me, I think, and see the shadow of the squat row of houses casting a sharp dividing line, roughly where the patches of ice and remnants of snow lie between the pavement and the street. The traffic lights emit their shrill squeals to help blind pedestrians cross the road. Cars idle waiting, shiny, beautiful; it is cold and I inhale a mixture of chill air and mild car fumes as I walk across the road to go down Dronningens Gate, today with the sun shining on me, as I have done so often before, the streets of this town I sometimes traverse in my mind's eye. In the bedroom of my flat in Bergen, in the guest room of my grandparents' farm in Sogn, even in a hotel room one night at the southern end of Africa, in the Transvaal, I can visualize them, the streets, even as I walk along the stunning Cromer Beach it hits me: the light, the sea; I have it in me, I carry it inside me, in the darkness of my brain.

The clear blue sky, the low sun on the tall hotel, the crowds. You go there to get the best possible view, squeeze between people behind the provisional barriers and the rope to keep them at a safe distance. Bodies push against you, all with heads back, tilted to one side, eyes trained on the top of the building. Bluish-black smoke seeps out and rises, follows the unpredictable currents of wind, disappears. More and more black smoke is belched out into the clear air. A fire engine ladder glides upward, you can hear the faint hum mixed with the crowd's murmured expressions of awe. One of the hotel occupants had jumped. The rime frost on the tarmac in front of you and the blue sky. It is clean, it is clinical, the world is precise. But the smoke continues to belch out, thick and black. You can't see any flames, only smoke. This disaster is soundless in the same way that pain is soundless. Behind you, people are shoving. Another ambulance weaves its way in, two men get out, lean against the side of the vehicle and stare upward as well. The hotel is empty now. Only firemen with breathing apparatuses and astronaut costumes move through the corridors and search the rooms in case there are any more guests who hadn't managed to get out before being suffocated, and lie in heaps where they fell, their bodies unable to absorb any more smoke. It must be like drowning, you think, but much worse because there is plenty of air, nearby, they have a hope, they die in hope. This is your death day. You eat in the hotel restaurant, have an early night, flick through the TV channels, maybe find an old film, you fall asleep. A few hours later you wake up, snow on the screen, a blind channel, you switch off the television, get undressed, crawl under the duvet and go back to sleep. When you wake up now it is for the last time. To screams and slamming doors, to the roar of flames, this is how you will die, in the smoke seeping into and filling your room, visibility is zero, you are disorientated out of your wits, and so you die, sitting on the bathroom floor with a wet cloth over your face. And now it's over, you think, the dead are carried out, the survivors are evacuated. But the fire rages on. The flames switch directions blindly, frighteningly, spring up in more and more places, it is out of control.

"Hi, Henrik."

You turn when you hear your name and see Kent waving, he comes toward you wearing his long gray coat and carrying a white helmet in one hand.

"You're ditching too, eh?"

"Heard the news early this morning. Seems to be over though."

"It's still burning," he says, looking up.

"But they got everyone out, they said."

"It's terrible," Kent says, smiling.

"The worst is all the people who come here to rubberneck. That's terrible," you say, and smile as well because you feel a sudden happiness standing here and talking to Kent, as only a seventeen-year-old can. The sudden happiness a seventeen-year-old can feel at even the most mundane, humdrum things, such as talking about everyday matters with someone his own age, a happiness that, if it continues, threatens to take control, his voice can fill with emotion, or laughter, he can laugh and laugh at trivia, he becomes intoxicated by it, it grows until he is so overcome that he has to start avoiding these situations. He has to look down instead of into people's eyes, withhold a comment instead of blurting it out to all-round hilarity and acknowledgment. You can't trust yourself anymore, you think, something is happening to you. There > is also the opposite, this sudden urge to cry that comes over you, in the strangest situations, your eyes go moist, you can't cope and have to look down, hold back. Like now, in front of the hotel, you can feel the happiness bubbling away, but you force yourself to focus on the smoke as if you are extremely interested in it and what it attests: a hotel fire. Later that evening footage of the conflagration is broadcast around the world, Germans sit in front of the screen and see pictures of the hotel, this is where it happened, Swedes, the British and the French, in this town, Danes and the Swiss, in this hotel."

> Fourteen people lost their lives.

From there the text moved to Bergen, where the main protagonist lived, an incident describing him sleeping outdoors, and when he crosses Torgalmenningen on his way home, I had a ridiculous idea, he stops at a telephone booth, dials the number his family had during his childhood, and he himself is at the other end, ten years old, talking about how he is right now.

What would Geir Gulliksen think?

He had got himself involved with an immature person who not only unabashedly sent him the most hair-raisingly stupid stories, but also imagined, in all seriousness, they would be published and someone apart from himself would be interested in reading them.

How was that possible?

How could I be so crass?

So conceited?

The telephone call came.

"Hello, it's Geir Gulliksen."

"Hi."

"Hi! What a fantastic piece of writing!"

"Do you think so?"

"I certainly do. It's very, very good. Especially the moment where the protagonist calls himself, you know . . . He's crossing the square. Do you know which part I mean?"

"Yes."

"You've really got something there."

"Oh, good."

"You must continue. Write more. This is going to be good, you know. I mean really good. If you want me to read anything along the way, just send it. I can also read the whole book when you've finished if you'd prefer that."

"Oh yes," I said.

"There was one tiny thing I was wondering. At the end of the sequence, you write: in the world, out of the world, in the world, out of the world. Do you remember?"

"Yes."

"That's fantastic. I was thinking, is there a title in that? A potential title? Out of the World. Give it some thought anyway."

Tremendously encouraged, I wrote two hundred more pages, also a long passage about Dad, and I cried as I wrote it, I could hardly see the screen through my tears, and I knew it was good, it was quite different from anything I had done before.

That spring there was a family gathering in Kristiansand, one of Gunnar's sons was being confirmed. I traveled down again and arrived at Grandma's house in the early morning. Dad was sitting in the kitchen, thick and heavy, his hands trembling and his face shiny with sweat. He was wearing a suit, shirt, tie. In the living room behind us were his brother Erling and his family, with Grandma.

For the first time in my life I felt stronger than him, for the first time in my life I didn't feel a trace of fear in me when I was in the same room as him.

He was harmless.

I asked him whether he was still with the woman he had met, whose name I didn't even know.

"No, I'm not," he said. "She told me where to put my shoes. I didn't like it."

"No," I said.

"Can you decide where you put your shoes?"

"Yes, I think so."

"That's good. You can't lose your freedom. You must never do that, Karl Ove!"

"No," I said.

He looked down at the newspaper on the table in front of him. He was heavy and slow, but his manner wasn't, that was nervous and jumpy.

"You'll have to help me with my tie before we go," I said. "I still haven't learned how to do it."

"Who does it then?"

"Usually Yngve."

"Does he know how?"

"Yes."

He struggled to his feet.

"Let's do it right now. Where's your tie?"

"Here," I said, taking it from my jacket pocket.

He put it around my neck. His breathing was labored. He crossed the ends, folded over and through, watching carefully as he did so, then tightened.

"There you go," he said.

Our eyes met, mine were moist, he turned and sat down. Erling came through the door, holding a bunch of keys.

"Ready?" he said. "We don't want to be late for church."

"Doesn't Karl Ove look smart today?" Dad said.

He actually said that.

"Yes, he does," Erling said with a smile. "But let's go now."

The priest talked about prayer in his sermon. He said that God wasn't like a Coke machine; you put money in and out came a bottle. I couldn't believe my ears. He had six years of Theology courses behind him and close to thirty years of experience, judging by his appearance, and he spoke about divinity in that way.

When the service was over I met an old acquaintance outside. I hadn't seen her for many years. She gave me a hug, we chatted, she said she had wound up in Kristiansand again, somewhat apologetically, as though she had ceded to greater powers than her own. While we stood there I watched Dad make his way to the car. Perhaps it was because of all the people there, perhaps because of our surroundings, where I wasn't used to seeing him, but suddenly I could see him as he was now. All that usually drew my eyes in his direction, for our entire life together, everything he had done, been, and said, that which made up "Dad" and was immanent in him, or in my view of him, whatever his appearance, all that was suddenly gone. He looked like a drunk who had put on a suit. He looked like an alcoholic his family had picked up, cleaned up, and taken along.

In the car the conversation was about the best route to Gunnar's. Dad maintained we should turn right. No one listened to him, he got angry, talked nonstop about the road to the right, said he knew and they would see.

I watched him, chilled to the soul. His regression was massive. He was like a child. All the way to Gunnar's house he whined that we should have gone the way he said. When we arrived he stepped out carefully onto the gravel and shambled to the door. During lunch he was on his own, completely outside the conversation; now and then, however, he did make a comment, which was always out of place. He was sweating profusely and his hand shook when he put a glass of cider to his mouth. After the meal the children ran around and played, and soon they discovered a new game, yelling Dad's name, running over to him and touching him while shouting his name and laughing. He did nothing, reacted with surprise and stared at them. Erling had to tell them to stop. The rest of the time we were outside I had the children's jeers ringing in my ears.

This was a man who had once had the strength and magnetism of a king.

There was nothing left of him.

And now, now that everything was over, he turned to me. Only now could he say I looked smart. But I was twenty-eight, not eight, I no longer needed this, and I no longer needed him.

We went back in two smaller cars, Erling's family and Grandma in one, Dad and I in the backseat of the other. I was in a hurry, I had a plane to catch and the bag containing my everyday clothes was in the hallway. Dad stood on the steps fumbling with the keys. He eventually found the right one and opened the door. The burglar alarm went off quietly. Dad stared at it.

"Tap in the code," I said.

"Yes," he said. "But I don't know it."

"I need my bag now," I said. "It's just inside. Let me just run in and get it. Really quick?"

"Go ahead," he said.

I dashed in. The alarm immediately emitted a shrill penetrating howl. I grabbed my bag and ran back out. I was sure he would read me the riot act, but he just stood there eyeing the code panel and fiddling with the keys. Grandma came walking up the hill.

"Have you managed to set off the burglar alarm again!" she shouted. "How many times do I have to tell you? You have to tap in the code before you go indoors!"

She walked past him, tapped in a number.

"I couldn't remember the code," he said.

"But it's so simple!" Grandma said in a loud voice. "You're absolutely impossible! You can't do anything!"

She glared up at Dad with fury in her eyes. Dad stood with his arms down by his sides, looking down the hill.

In Bergen I continued to work on my novel. By the middle of May it had grown to roughly three hundred pages, which I sent to Geir Gulliksen. He asked me to drop by so that we could talk about it, I went to Oslo, stayed with Espen, when I went into his office, my manuscript lay on his desk.

He spoke about it for maybe ten minutes.

Then he said:

"Would you like to sign a contract now? We can do that, you know. Or would you rather wait until you have a final version? If we hurry we could publish it in late autumn."

"Publish it?" I said. I hadn't even considered the possibility.

"Yes," he said. "It's as good as finished. If you were run over by a tram on your way out we'd have enough to publish."

He laughed.

In the white spring light I threaded my way through the pedestrians on the sidewalk as if in a trance. What he had said reverberated in my brain; everything around me seemed to be so far away. A tram clattered past, a fat man got out of a taxi, two buses went up the hill, one after the other. I couldn't believe it was true, so I repeated it to myself again and again. I'm going to make my debut. My novel has been accepted. I am a writer. I seemed to be staggering under the weight of my elation. I was going to make my debut. The novel has been accepted. I am a writer.

Espen answered when I rang the doorbell, turned and went into the room at once, he was in the middle of something. I used his phone and called Tonje. Of course she wasn't home. Then I called Yngve at his office. I told him the novel had been accepted.

"Oh?" he said.

I couldn't understand the lack of interest in his intonation.

"Isn't it incredible?" I said.

"Yep," he said. "But you must have known it was going to happen, didn't you? I mean, you've had contact with a publishing house for a long time."

"I didn't know at all. In fact, I thought it was never going to happen."

"Yeah, yeah," he said. "Have you been out yet in Oslo?"

After we'd hung up I sat on the sofa waiting for Espen to finish, so that I could tell him. But he didn't show much enthusiasm either.

"I heard you say that on the phone," he said. "Congratulations."

For him this might have been a matter of course, I thought. Nearly everyone he knew was a writer.

"Did you believe I would make it?" I said. "That I would ever make my debut?"

"Yes, I did. But perhaps not in literature. I guess I thought it would be a collection of essays or something."

At the beginning of the summer we emptied our apartment and put everything in storage outside town, where it would stay until the end of August, when we would move up to Volda. Tonje had applied for a summer job in NRK Hordaland, which she didn't get, so to earn some money she was going to work in her father's medical office in Molde. We went up to Mom's place in Jølster, where the plan was that I would finish the novel. While we were there Tonje rang NRK Sogn og Fjordane and, miraculously, was offered a job, she canceled her secretarial work, and we stayed there all summer. She drove to NRK in the morning, I wrote, she buzzed around the county of Sogn og Fjordane in her white NRK car while I sweated in a room so full of light that I could barely see the letters on the screen in front of me, she came home in the afternoon, we went swimming or we had a barbecue in the garden or we watched TV. I wasn't making any headway with the novel, I was stuck and becoming more and more desperate, I started working every hour there was, also at night. It was all I thought about. To publish it as it was now would have been a terrible mistake, the storyline lacked a motivating force. A young man returns to his hometown, rents a room, meets some old friends, and his whole life takes a turn for the better, a series of protracted memories, in itself absolutely fine, but why tell them? There was no narrative engine. I had to make one. But how? Obviously he must have come from somewhere, and in that place something must have happened that was harrowing enough, severe enough, for him to flee and simultaneously cause him to relive his life, to search for a reason, to search for some coherence, to try to understand himself.

There was no space inside me for anything else. I kept everything else at arm's length. One night Tonje shouted at me in her frustration.

"I don't want this! I'm only twenty-six! I want to live, Karl Ove! Do you understand?"

I tried to calm her down, this had nothing to do with her, I had to write, and I didn't have any space for anything else, but it would soon be over and I loved her, I always would. It helped to talk, above all it helped her, she poured her heart out that night, we became closer to each other, it was as though we were starting anew.

Some days later I wrote a passage about Northern Norway, with Henrik Møller-Stray, the name of the main character, working there as a teacher. I had him sitting in the staff room, talking to the other teachers, then going into the classroom with the students, he was their homeroom teacher, and in that instant I knew I had the solution to all my problems.

He fell in love with one of the pupils, slept with her in the end, she was only thirteen, he had to flee and had nowhere else to go but Kristiansand.

It fit perfectly, but I couldn't do it, couldn't have him falling in love with a thirteen-year-old and definitely couldn't have him sleep with her. That was immoral, and it would be exploitative because the justification for using it was novelistic technique. I needed a plot with the most powerful fulcrum I could find. He could kill someone, but I wasn't interested in that kind of conflict. Steal something? No, no. It had to be a positive force that drove him, something fine and beautiful, falling in love, nothing else fit.

But I couldn't do that.

If I did, that is what would be discussed, the morality of the novel, and I wasn't in the slightest bit interested in that.

Another consideration was the unease I would feel if I wrote myself into the novel, for some of this was indeed true, which no one should ever find out, and if I wrote it, it would exist in the world, not only inside me, however much of it was fictional.

Tonje went to Molde, I stayed to meet Tore, we were going to one of the mountain cabins my family owned to finish writing a film script. It was about an apartment building, several stories were played out there, the most important of which concerned a woman who heard strange noises in the ventilation shaft, toward the end of the manuscript, after many misfortunes, it emerges that these noises come from an apartment belonging to two brothers, where they are holding their father prisoner and abusing him.

One night, after we had finished working, I explained my dilemma to him.

"Do it, for Christ's sake, don't even think about it. Go for it! It'll be a big hit!"

We were there for four days, several times I expressed my doubts and uncertainties, he remained rock-solid, go for it, do it. We strolled down the narrow gravel path through the forest to the lake, where we went into the little shop, I took him to see Borghild, who laughed at us and our shaven heads, you two look like convicts. She made us coffee and I asked her about her childhood, she told me she'd had TB and spent many months in a sanatorium, high above a fjord, the cure had been to get as much sun as possible, so the women had sat in chairs on the first floor veranda, and the men on the ground floor veranda, because we were topless, asthey say today, she said with a laugh, then she went on to tell us what it was like when she returned home, there was a stigma attached to the illness and to the tan you got at sanatoriums. Tore was fascinated by her and she liked Tore. Everyone liked Tore. We went back up and carried on with our work, a horse stuck its muzzle through the window while we were sitting there, we gave it some sugar cubes and an apple, in the evening we sat outside drinking beer and smoking, surrounded by the roar of the waterfall from the forest, with the snow on the mountaintops on the other side shining in the glow from the setting sun.

In the middle of August I traveled up to Volda. Tonje met me at the bus stop, we walked uphill to the house where we would rent the whole of the first floor, it was old and not in great shape, but there were three rooms and it was only us two living there. She had shared it with another student all last year, now it was ours. We were husband and wife, the thought of this still sent tingling sensations through me. We were going to share our lives together, and now we were here, in a little village full of students between the mountains.

From the room I used as a study there was a view of the fjord and the ferry that plied back and forth almost round the clock, glittering in the night darkness, and the instant I put my computer on the desk I knew I was going to be able to work here.

Tonje was enjoying her course, she made a lot of friends, sometimes they came back to see us, but usually she met them away from home. I joined her now and then, but not so often. I was there to write, this was my last chance, in only two years I would be thirty, I had to give it everything I had. Unlike all the other places I'd been, I had almost no relationship with Volda at all. I got up in the evening, wrote through the night, went to bed in the morning, longing for the evening when I could write again. Occasionally I would cycle down to the little town center to buy CDs or books, but even the short time that took felt like a huge sacrifice, something I really shouldn't allow myself. What I discovered during these months was the great power of routine and repetition. I did exactly the same every day so that I didn't have to waste any energy and could put it all into my writing. Which also derived energy from the same source, three pages in one day became three hundred pages in a hundred days, and in a year more than a thousand. From the cigarettes I rolled in the course of a night, twenty or so, I always spilt some of the tobacco, which after six months built up into quite a pile beside the chair leg. The letters on the keyboard became slowly worn according to a system that remained a secret to me, some shone bright and intact after six months, others were as good as erased. But the routine had a farther function: it protected me from seeing what I wrote from the outside. Routine had the effect of keeping me inside my writing day after day. If I upset the pattern, that is, visited someone or perhaps had a few beers out with Tonje, everything was dislocated, I lost my rhythm, saw the routines and what I wrote, which wasn't any good at all, what was I thinking, that anyone would have any interest in my childish immature thoughts? Then this idea found reinforcement and the stronger it became the more difficult it was get back into routine's exclusion and tranquillity. As soon I was back in the groove, I decided not to make the same mistake again, not to meet anyone, not to go out drinking with Tonje. Then the decision also vanished, because that was how it was inside writing, everything on the outside vanished. During working hours I often stood by the hot radiator on the bathroom wall staring out the window, not dissimilar to a cat, I would watch everything that moved outside, would stand there for half an hour, an hour, then went back in and carried on working. It was a way of having a break and resting without losing my rhythm.

It was a fantastic feeling. I had spent ten years writing without achieving anything, and then all of a sudden, out of nowhere, it was just flowing.

And what I wrote was of such quality, compared with what I had produced earlier, that I was surprised every evening when I read through what I had written the night before. It was like having a head rush, or walking in your sleep, a state in which you are out of yourself, and what was curious about this particular experience was that it continued unabated.

Tonje knew it was important for me, and she was independent, lived her own life, had her own ambitions, but sometimes I noticed she wanted more, of me, of us, that this wasn't enough for her, and then I tried to give it to her, not for my sake, I needed no more than I already had, but for hers.

Once she asked me if she could use my computer, only for half an hour, there was something she had to write and going all the way up to the school was a hassle. I was extremely annoyed, but I said nothing, of course she could use my computer for half an hour, and so that she would understand what a sacrifice it was for me I sat on a chair in the corridor, outside the door, waiting, seething with impatience.

She often referred to the opinion one of her friends had expressed about our life together, how strange it was that I worked all the time and never showed my face outside with her, of course she told me this because she thought the same, deep down, I was angry, what we did with our lives was none of his business.

One evening in spring she got terrible abdominal pains. She had to go to the urgent-care doctor, she said, I asked if I should go with her, no, she said, you write, it'll be fine, and then from the living room window I saw her walking up the hill stooped over and I thought it was generous of her to let me write instead of accompanying her to the doctor. Personally, I had no objection to doing this kind of thing on my own, I was unsentimental in this regard, and I was happy she felt the same.

Two or three hours later she phoned, they had admitted her to the hospital, they didn't know what was wrong and were going to perform a little procedure to find out.

"Shall I come?"

"Yes, could you?"

She was lying in bed when I arrived, her smile gentle and apologetic, the pain had gone, it was probably nothing.

The next day I went back up, they hadn't found anything, it was a mystery. I was going to Oslo for a final discussion of the manuscript, the plane tickets had been booked ages ago, so she would have to make her own way home, it wasn't a problem, and she had lots of friends who could go shopping for her, if need be.

In May I revised the manuscript for the last time, everything that had to be done had to be done now, so when the seventeenth of May came, Constitution Day, Tonje asked if I could be with her that day, have breakfast with some friends, then walk to town to watch the procession and afterward to have a few drinks in a pub, but I couldn't, work was at a crucial point, I couldn't lose a whole day, anyway you know lots of people there!

She went in her sailor's jacket, she looked a dream, I watched her from the window and that was what I thought, then I sat down in the sun on the veranda and began to plow through the manuscript with pen in hand. After a while I went in and had a bite to eat, continued to read, until the telephone rang. It was Tonje.

"I miss you so much," she said. "Can't you come on down? Just for a little walk? I'm having a great time, but it would be even better if you were here. And the others are asking me if there's something wrong. Because you're not here."

"Look," I said. "You know I have to work. I can't. You understand, don't you?"

Yes, she did, perfectly.

We hung up.

I stood scanning the fjord.

What on earth was I doing?

Was I a complete cretin?

Was she supposed to sit all on her own in her sailor's jacket on the seventeenth of May?

I threw on my jacket, jumped into my shoes, and hurried up the hill. As soon as I reached the top and started to walk I saw Tonje. She was ambling along with her head bowed.

Was she crying?

Yes, she was.

Oh, Tonje.

I ran over to her and held her in my arms.

"Don't take any notice of me," she said. "I don't know what's come over me."

As she said this, she smiled.

We walked back down to the center, into the bar where her friends were sitting and then to the pub, where we got drunk, the thing to do on a Constitution Day. While we were sitting there I said my novel would be on the front page of Dagbladet when it came out. Tonje eyed me. "Want to bet?" I said. Yes, she said. A trip to Paris. If you win you take me. If I win I take you.

We walked home that night with our arms intertwined. She told me how the way we lived had worn her down, I said it would soon be over, there was only one more month, then everything would be different.

"The worst is I believe you," she said.

The night England played Argentina in the World Cup a moving van took all our things away. We flew to Bergen and waited outside our new apartment the next day for the van. We had answered a want ad, Tonje had written a letter explaining who we were and we got the apartment, an old lady owned it and wanted very little for it, although it was big, at least by our standards.

My phone rang, it was the driver, he was at the bottom of the hill and couldn't get any farther. We ran down to meet him.

"Can't do it," he said, scratching his cheek. "I'll have to unload everything here."

"Here? In the street?" I said.

He nodded.

“But you can’t do that!” I shouted. “We’ve paid for the move. You’ll just have to carry the stuff to the apartment!”

“But I can’t get up the hill,” he said. “You can borrow a handcart if you promise to bring it back.”

I gave up and helped him to move all the furniture and boxes off the van. The pile was the height of a man. He drove off, I rang Eirik, who was the only person I knew was in town right now, but he was busy, so it was a case of rolling up my sleeves.

People walking past stared at the household goods. There was something completely wrong about it, I thought, putting three boxes onto the handcart and pushing it uphill. It looked obscene, naked, unprotected. A divan in the road. Our bed in the road. A sofa, a chair, a lamp. Pictures. A desk. All shining in the sunshine against the dry gray asphalt.

In the following days we painted the place and once we had finally decided how to arrange the furniture we were happy. It felt like our first decent apartment, we were no longer students, the future started here. Tonje had a job with NRK Hordaland, my novel was finished, all that was left was the proofreading. And the cover. I went down to see Yngve in Stavanger for some help with that. I had photos of zeppelins with me, I had thought from the beginning that a zeppelin would be right for the atmosphere I was seeking in the novel, the overwhelming feeling of everything that had been lost, all the time and all the eras, there was little that expressed this better than the German airship, this whale of the air, this Moby Dick of progress, so beautiful and alien it hurt. As an alternative I had a book that Dad had given me, it was about space, no photographs, just drawings. Early 1950s, space travel didn’t exist yet, but there was speculation, there were designs of space outfits, this is how the first space traveler would be dressed. There were designs of rockets, houses on deserted planets, moon vehicles. All in the style that was so typical of the 1950s, American advertising optimism. A father with his child pointing to the starry sky. The future, adventure, the entire universe at man's feet. The covers Yngve and Asbjørn designed, with zeppelins and fifties' drawings, were good, but not precise enough with regard to the novel. They tried more and more variations, and I was beginning to reconcile myself to this when Asbjørn came up with some photos by Jock Sturges, an American photographer, in a magazine. One of them showed a girl, perhaps twelve years old, perhaps thirteen, she was naked and stood with her back to the camera, and when we saw it the search was over. This was actually what the novel was about. Not time that was lost, but the main character's desire for a thirteen-year-old girl.

Back home again, I spent my days reading newspapers and watching TV, sitting in Verftet drinking coffee with a book in my hands, while Tonje worked, I was in limbo, a routine no longer did anything for me, it was just a routine, the days in it were empty. Yngve and Asbjørn lived in Stavanger, Espen and Tore lived in Oslo, Hans and nearly all of the others had also moved there. Only a handful of friends remained in Bergen. Ole was in town, I knew, he'd gotten divorced and moved back, I called him, we went out for a beer. Eirik, whom I had first got to know in Student Radio, was doing a doctoral thesis in Literature, I cycled up to his office and had a coffee with him in the canteen.

When I returned Mom called, Borghild was dead. She had passed away, she hadn't been ill, hadn't had any pain, she died in her sleep. It was a year since I had last seen her, I'd cycled up to her place from Mom's, sat on her veranda and asked her questions about farm life in the old days. I wrote down what she said in a notebook; what were memories for her was history for me. It was incomprehensible how different that world was from this. Borghild belonged in both, but now she was dead, and I could hear how upset Mom was. We arranged that I would go to the funeral. Tonje was working and couldn't make it, but I packed my suitcase the night before, had breakfast, and was about to go down to the bus station when the telephone rang. It was Yngve. He said Dad was dead.

Four days later I left the chapel in Kristiansand after seeing Dad, or what had once been him, and was now a corpse with his features, for the second time. The sky was bright but hazy. A stream of vehicles drove past on the road in front of me. Seeing him had been terrible, especially since in the days that had passed since I first saw him he had changed. His skin had gone yellower, it seemed more sunken. He was on his way to the earth, something was drawing him there, with great force. I went over the pedestrian bridge, beneath me cars swept past, the drone of engines seemed to resound inside me, I lit a cigarette and looked up at the tops of the houses in front of me. They said something, just by the way they stood there, what they said wasn't human, it wasn't living, but it was a statement. The house across the road, which might have been from the 1930s, said something else, and so it was with the houses all over town, in all towns. A blank expression beneath the sky, people entering and leaving.

Where the hell had all the blood come from?

When we went to see him for the first time the undertaker warned us, there had been a lot of blood, he had said, it might be a bit distressing. Naturally, they had washed him, but they hadn't managed to remove it, the blood seemed to have sunk in his pores. And his nose had been broken. In the living room, however, where he'd been found, there had been no blood. Had the pain been so great that he'd risen, slumped against the wall by the fire, maybe, broken his nose, dragged himself up into the chair, died, and been found there? Or had he broken his nose the day before, on a walk into town? Or had the fracture and the blood been what caused his heart to stop?

But where was the blood?

I would have to call the doctor tomorrow and ask him what had actually happened the day he was found.

Grandma was sitting at the kitchen table when I returned. She brightened up for an instant, she didn't want to be alone, not for one second: whenever Yngve and I left the house she followed us.

I put on a jug of coffee, went into the living room, and called Yngve, after closing the kitchen door first.

"Have you spoken to the doctor?" he asked.

"No, not yet. I was planning to do it tomorrow."

"Good," he said. "How's it going down there in Kristiansand?"

"I've cut almost all the grass in the garden today. Or hay or whatever you want to call it. I was thinking of cleaning tomorrow."

"The priest?"

"Oh, yes, that's right! I'll deal with that. I'll call him after this. But I think the undertakers have contacted him."

"They have. But you have to go through the ceremony with him. He'll probably say a few words about Dad, too, so you'll have to put him in the picture."

"What should I tell him?"

"Well, just give him an idea of his life. Teacher on Tromøya, active in local politics, stamp collecting. Two children from his first marriage, one from his second. Interested in . . . well, what was he actually interested in?"

I let out a soundless sob.

"Fishing," I said. "He liked that."

There was a pause.

"But . . . do you think I should say something about the end?" I said. "His last years?"

"Perhaps not in so many words."

"Say it had been difficult for him?"

"Yes, that'll do."

"I'd like it to be dignified."

"I know. Me too."

"When are you coming down?"

"The day of the funeral, I think. Or the night before."

"OK. I'll call you tomorrow whatever happens."

"OK."

"Bye."

"Bye."

In the evening the clouds opened and the low sun cast its orange light across the town as dusk slowly settled over the fields and soon it would begin to rise and fill the space all the way up to the sky, which was light's last bastion, it hung there, deep and blue, and then, almost imperceptibly, the light from a star came into view, as fragile as a newborn child, but it grew stronger, was surrounded by other stars, and soon the still-light summer sky was full of them.

While Grandma sat in the sitting room watching TV, I stood on the veranda alternately studying the sky and gazing across the town and the sea. I thought about that 1950s book Dad had given me. He had read it here. Dreamed about space the way children do, wondered what the future might bring in terms of rockets and robots, inventions and discoveries. What would that have been like for him?

How had he felt?

The summer he met Mom, when they had been seventeen years old, that is, in 1961, he'd told her he had testicular cancer and might not be able to have children.

It was a lie, of course, as it had been a lie when he told me he had cancer and was going to die.

But it wasn't a lie that he was going to die.

Perhaps it wasn't a lie that he couldn't have children either? In the sense that he didn't want them, he knew it wasn't a good idea.

My God, they had been twenty when they got married. If they had been as immature as I was when I was twenty, it was quite a feat they had pulled off.

I stubbed out my cigarette and went into the house.

The telephone rang.

"You answer it," Grandma said, without looking at me. Again it was as though she were talking to someone else, using a different tone, and this other person could only have been Dad.

I went into the dining room and lifted the receiver.

"Hi, Gunnar here. How are you two doing?"

"Not bad under the circumstances," I said.

"Yes, this is an awful business, Karl Ove," he said. "But we were thinking of taking you to the mountain cabin tomorrow. So you get a change of air. The forecast is good. What do you say?"

"Sounds great."

"So let's do it. We'll come by early tomorrow morning to pick you up. Make sure you're ready! It's best to leave early so we get something from the day, don't you agree?"

"Yes," I said. "That's best."

We went to bed at the same time, I followed her down the stairs, she turned in the hall and said goodnight and disappeared into her room, I opened the door to my room, sat down on the bed, put my face in my hands, and cried for a long time. Actually I had wanted to go to sleep fully clothed, but Gunnar was coming tomorrow and I didn't want to give him the impression that I was a mess, so I summoned the last strength I had, went into the bathroom and brushed my teeth, washed my face, folded my clothes and put them on a chair before going to bed. I had dreaded this, the worst moment was when I closed my eyes and lay there without being able to see anything in the house, it was as if all my terrible thoughts, finally liberated, launched themselves at me, tonight as well, as I sank slowly, sort of dangled into sleep, not unlike a hook on the end of a line, I caught myself thinking, which the weight drags down, then darkness fell and I disappeared from the world.

When I awoke at eight Grandma was already up. She was wearing the same filthy dress she'd had on every day so far, she smelled and was sunk deep inside herself.

She should have a bath, she should put on clean new clothes. Her mattress should be thrown away, she should get a nice new one, with nice fresh bed linen. She should have food, good hot food, and she should be allowed to rest.

I could give her none of this.

"They'll be here soon," I said.

"Who?" she said, looking up at me, a curl of cigarette smoke rising between her fingers.

"Gunnar and Tove," I said. "They're taking us to the cabin today, remember?"

"That's right," she said. "That'll be nice."

"Yes," I said.

At a little past nine their car drew up outside. Grandma peered out the window in exactly the same way she did when I was a child, turned to me and tossed her hand through the hair on her neck.

"It's Gunnar," she said.

"Shall we go down?" I said.

"You don't think they'll come up?" she said.

"They're taking us to the cabin," I said.

"That's true," she said.

I followed her down the stairs. Gunnar stood in the hallway waiting. Tanned, blond, tall, and slim. He regarded me with affection in his eyes.

"How are you managing?" he said.

"Fine," I said with moist eyes. "It'll be nice to get out for a bit."

Grandma put on a coat, grabbed a bag, which she carried on her forearm as we went down the steps to the car. Tove, squinting into the sun, welcomed us, took Grandma's arm and helped her into the car. I walked around to the other side and got in.

The cabin was about twenty miles east of Kristiansand, in the skerries. It was many years since I had been there. When I was growing up we used to go there perhaps once a year. There were various rituals connected with the journey there at that time and it was all an adventure. Even the parking lot, which was a little field in the forest with each place marked with a car registration number, painted on a rock or a piece of wood. Grandpa drove into their spot, by a stone wall, beneath the flickering shade from the branches of a large oak tree, I opened the door and got out, the air there, smelling of earth and grass and trees and flowers, was so hot it felt as if I was stepping into it. Apart from birdsong and perhaps some scattered voices or an outboard motor from the little harbor where we were going, all was quiet.

Parking the car on grass!

The big square cooler bag Grandma would lift out of the trunk. The dry moss in the cracks of the stone wall, all the smells there, some of them dark and moldy, if you lifted a stone, it could be damp underneath and tiny insects would dart in all directions. The same was true of the stiff grass, it smelled dry and hot, but beneath it, if you dug down a little, there were quite different smells with more presence and depth, akin to decay.

The bees buzzing around the rose hips on the other side of the stone wall. The air above the path, which in some places, where the sun had been all morning, was like bunkers of heat, spaces we entered and left. The salty tang of sea became stronger, and of rotten seaweed. The screams of gulls.

We were always taken over to the island by the same elderly boatman. Grandma and Grandpa stood on the quay and passed him whatever we were taking with us, he placed it at the bottom of the boat, then we climbed on board and sat down. Grandma, an elegant woman in her early sixties, who, when the wind ruffled her hair, always fought against it and kept patting it into position; Grandpa, an affluent man a few years younger with black combed-back hair and sensitive lips. The old boatman, wearing boots and a black peaked cap, one hand around the throttle of the outboard motor, the other resting in his lap. Slowly, we made our way out, crossed the sound, went ashore on the jetty at the other side, below the simple white cabin. Both Yngve and I used to long to come here. Where wild cherries and apples grew. You could swim by the smooth rocks beside the cabin. From the jetty we could fish for crabs. There was a little red Pioner dinghy we could row. But best of all we liked playing soccer on the little field behind the cabin, especially when the adults joined in: Grandpa, Gunnar, and sometimes Dad.

All this was in my gaze this morning. The parking lot was no longer grass but paved. The long walk through the forest was not long but covered in a matter of minutes. No boatman was waiting for us, he had probably died ages ago, and the atmosphere of industry in and around the harbor during those days had completely gone, now it was one of small boats and cabin life.

Nonetheless. The forest was the same, the sounds and smells were the same, and the sea with its islets and islands was the same.

Gunnar pulled the boat to the quay, Tove helped Grandma in, soon we were heading across the sound beneath the high blue sky. Grandma sat motionless, eyes cast down, as though the surroundings, the open space and the light that met us, hadn't reached her. Her pale, lean, birdlike face was even more painful to see here than at home. Because here there was bronzed skin after long days in the sun, salt in your hair after a refreshing swim, laughter and smiles, happy flirtatious eyes, evenings with shrimp and crabs and lobsters.

Tove laid her hand on my shoulder and sent me a consoling smile.

I started to cry.

Ooooh. Ooooh. Ooooh.

I turned away, stared at the sea. The sound was full of boats, this was a main thoroughfare for tourists in the summer. The small waves beat against the hull, showering us with saltwater spray.

While Tove was helping Grandma ashore and Gunnar was mooring the boat, he turned to me.

"Did Grandma have anything to drink yesterday?" he said.

My cheeks flushed, I looked down.

"I think she had a little," I said.

"Thought I could smell it," he said. "That's not good."

"No," I said.

"She can't look after herself anymore."

"No," I said. "That's obvious."

"We've helped them for so many years," he said. "Both your father and Erling moved away, so we had to step up."

"It's incredible you've had the energy," I said.

"It's got nothing to do with energy," he said. "It was something we had to do. She is my mother, you know."

"Yes," I said.

"Go and get yourself a cup of coffee!" he said.

I went up to the cabin, my eyes wet with tears. I was in a state. A little smile, a friendly hand, that was all it took, the dam would burst.

Grandma was his mother. Dad had been my father. I knew how he felt, I knew he wanted to die. I hadn't lifted a finger. I could have traveled down, talked to him, told him he had to go to a detox clinic. Yngve could have accompanied me, we could have stayed there, his two sons, and taken responsibility for him.

The thought was as alien as it was impossible. I was capable of doing many things, I was able to force myself to do almost anything if it was necessary, but I couldn't have done that. Never.

Should I have been able to say to him, come to Bergen, you can stay with Tonje and me for the time being, then we'll find a place for you nearby?

Ha ha.

Ha ha ha.

"Sit down, Karl Ove, and relax," Tove said. "You've been through a lot. You can enjoy some space out here. You'll both have to go back soon enough."

I sobbed and covered my eyes with one hand.

Grandma sat smoking and glanced down at the quay as Gunnar walked up.

An hour later he took me on a walk through the island. At first we said nothing, just walked side by side along the path, surrounded by trees, tall dry grass, scrub and bushes, bright flowers here and there, bare ridges, all gray with patches of multicolored lichen, the odd hollow with wispy stalks of grass swaying in the breeze, and then everything opened into a rectangular clearing, some houses shone white with orange roofs, and red pennants fluttered on the flagpoles.

"Do you recognize this?" Gunnar said.

"I do," I said.

"I can remember being here when I was little," he said. "Your father was a young man then. He was studying in Oslo. I looked up to him in the way that only a younger brother can."

"Mm," I said.

"There was something special about him. He wasn't like the rest of us. I remember he used to stay up late at night. No one else did that."

"Uh-huh," I said.

"He was so much older than me that we didn't grow up together," he said. "When I was ten he already had a son of his own. He already had his own life."

"Mm," I said.

"He didn't have it easy at the end. It was sad that things turned out as they did. But when it comes down to it, perhaps it was for the best. Do you know what I mean?"

"Yes, I think so."

"There's a little restaurant here in the summer now," he said, motioning with his head to a house we passed.

"Looks nice," I said.

As we were walking I cried a soundless stream of tears. I no longer knew why I was crying, I no longer knew what I felt or where all this was coming from.

We stopped by the old skerry harbor, where all the sailors' houses had been renovated and everything sparkled with affluence and prosperity. The horizon in the distance was razor sharp. Blue sky, blue sea. White sails, laughter from somewhere, footsteps on a gravel path. A woman was watering a flower bed with a large green can. The spray from the sprinkler glinted in the sunlight.

When Gunnar parked his car outside the house in town it was five o'clock and all the trees were rustling in the breeze wafting in off the sea.

"We'll stop by tomorrow," Gunnar said. "Then we can give you a hand here. I suppose there might still be a little left to be done."

He smiled.

I nodded, we went inside. After all the light and air outside, the state of decline in the house, which in a way I had become used to, was evident again. As soon as we were upstairs I went back to cleaning. This time I turned my attentions to the two living rooms beyond the kitchen. The bench, the dining-room table, the chairs, all in 1930s' style with vaguely Viking carvings, the coffee table, the white wall paneling that had been installed in the eighties, the windowsill, the veranda door, the staircase. Both rooms had wall-to-wall carpets on the floors and I vacuumed them, but it didn't make much of a difference; tomorrow I would have to buy a detergent for them, I reflected, dumped out the dirty water, and called Tonje.

She'd bought a plane ticket so she could join me. I updated her on what was going on, I would be meeting the priest the next day, and there was so much left to do, but I would manage. I said I missed her and wished she were here. The former was true, the latter wasn't. I had to be alone here or with Yngve. The funeral was another matter entirely, she had to be there. She said she thought about me all the time and loved me.

After we got off the phone I called Yngve. He wasn't going to come to Kristiansand until the funeral, it was too complicated with his children, but he would do what he could from there. Phone relatives and let them know, keep in touch with the undertaker, all the things I found difficult.

Gunnar and Tove came over the next day. Tove helped Grandma take a bath, found her clean clothes and cooked while Gunnar and I washed and scrubbed and threw things out, me in as minor a role as I could manage, after all he had grown up in this house, it was his mother, I was the son of the man who had ruined everything. For Grandma the spruce-up had worked wonders, she seemed to come out of herself, suddenly I saw her going downstairs with a bowl of water in her hands and a cigarette in the corner of her mouth. Tove, who was cleaning the coatroom, laughed and winked at me. She looked like a brewery worker! she said.

At two I went to the church's office in Lund. Entered a long corridor, peeped through an open door, a woman was sitting behind a desk, she stood up and asked what I wanted, I told her, she showed me to the right door, I knocked and went in.

The priest, a middle-aged man with kind eyes, shook my hand and we sat down. I didn't have much confidence in Norwegian priests, I remembered the Coke-machine analogy from last spring, and the sole reason I wanted

Dad buried in a churchyard was tradition, the dignity of it. He was damn well going to have God's words read to him. It was therefore with some skepticism that I started speaking to this priest. I wanted a traditional ceremony with psalms, a sermon, earth thrown on the coffin, as few personal details as possible, as much distance as possible. I wanted Dad's life to be seen in that perspective, not the close-up, not the man children feared and who later drank himself to death but the broad view, a human who was born on earth, pure and innocent, as all are at birth, and who lived a life as all humans do and died his death.

But it didn't go like that. After we had discussed the practicalities, we started talking about what he should include in his eulogy.

"Who was your father?" he said.

I said he had studied in Oslo, worked for many years as a qualified teacher at an ungdomsskole in Arendal, married Sissel, had two children, Yngve and Karl Ove, divorced and remarried, lived and worked for some years in Northern Norway, had a daughter, moved back down south and died, fifty-five years old.

"Who was your father to you, Karl Ove?" he said.

I didn't like his attempt to gain intimacy with the use of my name, yet I longed to succumb. It was a terrible technique he had, I knew that of course, because he didn't know me from Adam, I met his gaze though, and in it I saw he was not an idiot, not a redeemed ignoramus, I saw warmth and understanding. He was no stranger to people drinking themselves to death, I recognized that, nor was he a stranger to people being bad, and he was no stranger to the notion that this was not the end of the world, actually it was the world.

"I was afraid of him," I said. "I was always so incredibly frightened of him. Well, in fact, I'm frightened of him now too. I've seen him twice this week and I'm still not convinced he's really dead, somehow. I'm frightened he's going to come and . . . lose his temper with me. It's as simple as that. He had a hold over me and he has never let go. I'm glad he's dead. Actually that is what I feel. It's a huge relief. And this weighs terribly on my conscience. He didn't mean to do this or be like this."

I looked at him.

"What was your brother's relationship with him like? Is it the same for him?"

"I don't know. I don't think so. I think Yngve hates him. I don't. But I don't know. He was always much worse to Yngve. He could reach out to me, try to make amends, but Yngve didn't want to know about that. He rejected him."

"You say he didn't mean to do this. Why do you think he did it then?"

"He was tormented. He was a tormented soul. I can see that now. He didn't want to live the life we lived. He forced himself. Then he got divorced and wanted to do what he really wanted, and it was even worse, he started drinking and at some point he lost his grip. He simply didn't give a damn then. At the end he was living with his mother. That was where he died. He drank. Actually it was suicide. He wanted to die, that I'm sure of."

I started to cry. I didn't care if it was in front of a stranger. I was beyond all such considerations. I cried and cried and I poured my heart out, and he listened. For an hour I sat there crying and talking about Dad. When I was about to leave, he shook my hand and thanked me, looked at me with his gentle eyes, and I cried again and said it was me who should thank him, and as I left the place, along the corridor and down the stairs, through the housing estate to the main road, it was as though something had let go, as though I was no longer carrying this, what I had been carrying, myself. We had only talked about Dad and me, but the fact that he had been there and listened, as he had to be there and listen to countless people who unburdened themselves to him, from the depths of their difficult lives, meant that it hadn't only been Dad and me we'd talked about but life: this was how this life had turned out. Dad's life, it had turned out like this.

Tonje arrived, I hugged her tight, we rocked back and forth, arms wrapped around each other.

"It's good you're here," I said.

"I've missed you so much," she said.

The house had been cleaned, it was still run-down, but as clean as it could be. I had washed all the plates, cutlery, and glass, I had set the table and there were flowers everywhere. Yngve, Kari Anne, Ylva, and little Torje had come. Dad's brother Erling and his wife and three kids were there. Grandma sat on a chair at the dining table, which we had moved into the other room. She was going to bury her eldest son today, I couldn't look at her, at those vacant staring eyes. But an hour earlier there had been a glint in them, when Yngve showed her Ylva, and she had tousled her hair.

I looked at Tonje.

"Could you do my tie?"

She nodded, we went into the kitchen, she put it around my neck and – ta-da – there it was, all done. It was the same tie I had worn at the wedding.

She took a step back and studied me.

"Does it look OK?"

"It looks very good," she said.

We rejoined the others, I made eye contact with Yngve.

"Shall we go then?"

He nodded, a few minutes later we were off. The sky was white, the air was warm, we closed the car doors and walked toward the chapel. One of the undertakers came over to us and gave us the program. Yngve glanced at it.

"The name's wrong," he said.

The undertaker stared at him.

"I'm very sorry," he said. "But, regrettably, there's no time to change it now."

"It doesn't matter," Yngve said, catching my eye. "What do you think?"

"I agree," I said. "These things can happen."

Nevertheless we both had our own opinions about the name we didn't bear ourselves. He had invented it, as his grandmother had invented ours.

Gunnar and his family arrived. Alf's daughter came with Alf, who hadn't changed and must have been eighty-something now. He was senile, she led him with a kind but determined hand toward the entrance.

I took Tonje's hand and we went in.

The first thing I saw was the white coffin.

Are you in there, Dad? I said under my breath. Is that where you are, Dad?

We sat down. Tears were streaming down my cheeks. Tonje squeezed my hand hard a couple of times. Apart from the family, which was tiny, there were three other people present.

I dreaded it, I knew what was awaiting us.

Behind me came a sound from Erling's son. A pure high note. The note continued and concluded with a sudden plummet, and I realized he was crying, because then it came again, he was sobbing, and it was heartrending, his little soul had seen the coffin, and it was enough, now he was crying for all he was worth.

The service commenced. The precentor we had hired was old, his voice was cracked and the cello sonata he played was not exactly a virtuoso performance, but it was apt, life was not perfect, only death is, and this was life watching death, the boy crying over the coffin.

The priest spoke. He talked about Dad's life and about those who were present today to take their leave of him. He said it was vital to have a focus. If you don't, you fall by the wayside. It was vital to focus on your children, on your nearest and dearest, on what is important in our lives. If you don't do that, you lose sight of everything and then you have nothing. No man is an island.

Yngve cried, and when I saw that, him sitting there and shaking, his face distorted into grimaces, him raising it to the ceiling and opening his mouth for air, I sobbed aloud with sorrow and joy, sorrow and joy, sorrow and joy.

We stood up and each laid our wreath on the coffin.

Stood in total silence before him with our heads bowed.

Farewell, Dad, I thought.

When we sat down and the cellist played Bach in his rusty cracked way I cried so much I thought I was going to split in half, my jaw hung open, wave upon wave of the very deepest emotions, those which only appear when all else has gone, washed through me.

After it was all finished Yngve hugged me, we stood crying on each other's shoulders and then, walking across the gravel, watching cars pass in the distance, an old couple walking through the cemetery, a gull sailing through the air above us, it was over. At long last it was over. I took several deep breaths and there were no more sobs.

The couple I didn't know came over to us. They introduced themselves as the parents of Rolf, Ann Kristin's husband. They said Dad had been such a fantastic teacher and Rolf had talked about him with such enthusiasm. We thanked them for coming and they walked over to their car.

"Who's that?" Yngve said, nodding discreetly in the direction of a woman. She wore a hat with a veil that concealed her face.

"No idea," I said. "But all self-respecting funerals have a woman no one recognizes."

We laughed.

"Well, the danger's over now," Yngve said, and we both laughed again.

Close family returned to Grandma's house, smørbrød were served, no speeches were given or commemorative words said, I wished it had been otherwise, sitting between Yngve and Tonje, but that would have meant doing it myself, and it would have gone badly, I couldn't have done it. Afterward we sat outside on the veranda, Alf said there was a man on the roof and I realized he was back in time, long, long ago, when he had been here and there had been a man on the roof. That was good. It was a day when both Dad and his father had been alive.

The novel had been out for a few weeks, nothing had happened, when one morning the telephone rang. Tonje, who was having breakfast, picked it up, I was in bed, though not sleeping, and I heard her say she would see if I was awake.

I went into the living room, put the phone to my ear.

"Hello, Karl Ove here."

"This is Mads from Tiden. Have you read Dagbladet today?"

"No, I was asleep."

"Then I think you should go out and buy it right away."

"Is there a review?"

"Yes, you could say that. I won't say any more. Go out and we'll talk later!"

I put the phone down and turned to Tonje, who was standing beside the table finishing off her tea. She ran her hand over her beautiful lips and smiled.

"There's a review in Dagbladet today," I said. "I'll run out and get it."

"Did he say what was in it?"

"No. He was being secretive. But I would guess it's good."

She put on her jacket in the hall while I got dressed in the bedroom. When I came out she was hanging over the handlebars of her bike.

We kissed fleetingly and she cycled down the hill while I walked up, beneath the heavy trees, continued along the road and up the slope to the hospital. A sallow-looking man was checking the magazine shelf, a fat woman sat in a wheelchair by the cash register with a purse in her lap, she wanted Hjemmet.

I stopped by the Verdens Gang and Dagbladet stand.

At the top, to the right of the logo, there was a little picture of me. Sensational debut, it said.

Well, that was good. At least I had won the bet with Tonje.

I took a newspaper, paid and went toward the entrance, opened it at the culture section. The review was a two-page spread. Rottem had written it. He compared me with Hamsun, Mykle, and Nabokov.

Well, that was good. It could hardly have been better in fact.

I shoved the newspaper under my arm and walked back home, made myself a cup of tea, sat down at the table, and lit a cigarette. Then I called Tonje. She had just seen it and was deliriously happy for me. Personally, I wasn't especially happy. In some strange way I had expected it.

Later that morning a journalist from Dagbladet called, he wanted to interview me as a follow-up to the review. We agreed to meet at Hotel Terminus at two.

It was raining, I decided to catch the bus instead of cycling to town, and then walked up to my barber, whom I had originally chosen because the place couldn't have been less hip and because the guy who owned it, a young, energetic guy, was so nice.

"Hi," he said as I walked in.

"Any chance of an appointment? Like now?"

"In ten minutes," he said. "Take a seat in the meantime."

Was that all there was to it?

Outside the window, people passed by clutching at swaying umbrellas. The barber finished the customer, an elderly man, he seemed pleased, on the floor lay his dead white hair. When the door shut with a jangle I sat down in the chair, the cape was whirled around me, I said I wanted it short, as usual, and he began to cut.

"I've got an interview afterward," I said. "So I have to look as good as possible."

"What have you done now?" he said.

"I've had a novel published. It's received good reviews, so now they want to talk to me."

"Is there any money in it? How many copies have you sold?"

"I don't know. It's just come out."

"What's it about then?"

"All sorts of things."

"Any murders?"

"No."

"Love?"

"Yes, actually there is some."

"No good for me then. My wife just moved out."

"Has she?"

"Yes."

There was a silence. His scissors snipped away above my head.

"Over your ears? Shall I shave your neck?"

"Perfect."

It was only after I'd paid that I started feeling nervous about the interview. I had done one already, on the day of the press conference, Dagsnytt 18 had called me and asked if I would go on the program. It had been live, sitting on the sofa outside the studio I was so nervous I could barely swallow the coffee I was passed. Tomm Kristiansen, who was the TV host, had come out and said that unfortunately he hadn't read my book.

"So I'm going to ask you questions about what it's like to make your debut, that sort of thing," he said. "On the cover it says the book's about male shame. Could you say a few words about that, do you think?"

"I didn't write the blurb," I said. "I didn't know it was about shame until I saw it."

"We'll find something else to talk about then," he said. "It'll be fine."

Right afterward I was shown in. Kristiansen sat with his headset on, scribbling on a piece of paper in front of him, I put on the headset in front of me, I could hear the segment before mine.

Then he introduced me.

"There's a big pedophilia case in Belgium at the moment," he said. "You've written a novel about a teacher who has a sexual relationship with a girl of thirteen. Would you say you've jumped on a bandwagon?"

I eyed him with horror. What was he actually saying?

"No," I said. "I wouldn't. This has nothing to do with Belgium."

I noticed that I could in fact speak and my nerves vanished.

"You're making your debut now. How has this process been? Do you feel your publishing house has failed to take you into account, by deciding on the blurbs and things like that?"

"No, I don't feel that. I chose the picture for the front cover, for example."

"Yes, it's a photo of a naked girl. Why did you choose that? Is it meant to be provocative?"

"No, no. It's relevant to what the book's about, actually."

I was bathed in sweat after the interview was over, and also a little indignant, all I had done was write a novel, you would have thought I had killed someone, judging by his questions.

The present interview, however, wasn't live, and it would probably be slanted toward the book's good review, so I had nothing to fear. Nevertheless I was nervous, and on my way there, through the rain-glistening streets, with all the car lights diffused in the gray daylight, I considered what I was going to say. Inside the café someone stood up, I guessed he had to be the journalist, his name was Stang, we talked for more than an hour and it went fantastically well, I talked and talked, about literature, Norwegian and international, about my own book, what my aim was, well, it was to escape from the minimalistic, into the maximalistic, something bold and striking, baroque, Moby Dick, but not in an epic way, what I had tried to do was take the little novel, about one person, where there is not much external action, it is all internal, and extend it into an epic format, do you understand what I mean?

He nodded and wrote, wrote and nodded.

I was excited when I bought Dagbladet the next day.

But the interview was short, it said I was proud of and pleased with the review, and that I had read Dagbladet ever since I was twelve years old.

I cycled up to the university and knocked on the door of Eirik's office.

"You've read Dagbladet ever since you were twelve, I see," he said, and laughed. "And that's something to boast about!"

I sat down on a chair and he could see I was actually pretty shattered by the interview, I came across as an idiot, a completely deranged fool, "proud and pleased," my God, I was so ashamed that I didn't know where to look.

"Probably doesn't make the slightest bit of difference," he said.

"No, maybe not," I said. "But everyone will read it. What a fool I am!"

"You aren't a fool, though, of course," Eirik said. "Take it easy now."

"I'm beginning to wonder," I said. "I did say what he's written in the review."

"A touch more subtlety is required for interviews, that's all," Eirik said. "Then it'll be fine."

Eirik was the type who had something to say about everything. Not in any vague or ungrounded way, he was well read about everything between heaven and earth, and for me he was a boon during these months, in the same way that Espen and Tore had been before, because he had read the novel and I used what he said about it shamelessly, such as it was an "autogeography," in all my interviews, of which there were now more and more. I sat down in Hotel Terminus and talked or I invited them home and sat at the living-room table and talked, and when Tonje came home I talked about everything I had talked about. Reading these same interviews, I burned with shame. I lay awake at night squirming at the thought of what an idiot I was. If nothing happened for a few weeks it felt like a complete void. I wanted more, and when more came it was always terrible. At the same time I was also being invited to a variety of events. I went to Kristiansand for a reading with someone called Bjarte Breiteig and someone called Pål Gitmark Eriksen, they had also made their debuts that autumn and held Tor Ulven in the very highest esteem, it turned out after a few minutes' conversation. They were so enthusiastic and in tune with each other that I saw them as literature's answer to Joe and Frank Hardy. As we were about to set foot on stage there were four people in the audience. I knew one, he was one of my old gymnas teachers, but when I went up to him afterward he said he was there because he was good friends with the family of one of the other writers. I did a reading at Hotel Terminus, everyone I knew in Bergen had come, the salon was packed, but I had to perform without a microphone or a stage, I stood in the middle of the floor, it was like reading to people in your sitting room at home, and when I did there was a passage in which the main protagonist, Henrik, sees someone mimicking him, I began to blush because I imagined everyone would be thinking I was Henrik and the description of the mimicry was a description of me while I was reading. I blushed, lost my rhythm, squirmed like a worm on a hook, and with friends present, they must have thought I was an even bigger loser than they had ever imagined because this was public, this was where I really had to sparkle, and all I could think of was that the mimicry was becoming a mimicry of me now and read faster and faster to finish.

After the reading someone in the audience put up his hand. This was a so-called "literary salon," this was normal practice.

"Now Knausgaard may not be the world's greatest reader," he said, "but I have to tell those of you who haven't read this novel yet: it is really good."

He had round glasses and big old-style radical hair and wanted to help me. But the reading comment smarted because I had been hoping all my thoughts had been confined to my own head.

Afterward he came up to me. He had an idea for a film and was wondering if I would write the manuscript for it. He explained what the idea was, producing lots of documents and pictures, I said it was extremely interesting and very topical, while inwardly I consigned him to hell, never to show his face again.

I also did a reading at a Sunday event in Bergen, the town's leading lights were gathered, the stage acts were a potpourri, among them was a revue artist who directed traffic off a ferry to music, people were screaming with laughter. There was one number with seminaked women dancing with top hats and sticks. Then there was me. I had bought myself a nice new Hugo Boss suit. Tonje had instructed me categorically to say a few words before I began reading. I stepped onto the stage.

"I'm going to read a piece about death," I said.

Some people in the audience started giggling. They didn't stop, not even when I was reading, and it spread. Death, ha ha ha. I could understand them, I was a self-important pretentious young writer who thought he knew something about the big issues in life.

I attended what was termed a "book-bath" in one of the Vestfold towns, with a crime writer who had also made his debut that year, I puffed myself up and spoke as if I were Dante to the twelve or thirteen people who had turned out. Afterward the crime writer refused to exchange books with me.

What was the point of all this? Flying all over Norway to read for ten minutes to four people? Talking smugly about literature to twelve people? Saying stupid things in the newspapers and burning with shame the day after?

Had I been able to write then this might not have mattered. But I couldn't, I wrote and deleted, wrote and deleted. On weekends we often used to visit Tonje's mother or brother, go to Café Opera, Garage, or Kvarteret, unless we went to the movies or rented videos. The social scene was different now from when we'd been students. A lot of them had moved away and those who remained worked or were not as flexible as they had been. People had started treating me differently, now that I "was" someone, and I hated this. The meaning of everything had disappeared, that was what had happened.

In March my novel won the Critics Prize. When they called and told me, I had just got myself entangled in a minor e-mail nightmare, at first I had written something stupid, then I had tried to repair the damage, and then it had become even more stupid and impossible to repair, a third e-mail was out of the question. This was all I could take in. Tonje told me to pull myself together, this was a big prize, imagine if I'd been told this two years ago, and I agreed, but it didn't help, what would he think when he received the second e-mail?

I invited Yngve and Tonje to the award ceremony, they were sitting at a table at the back when I stepped up to receive the prize. The little storm of camera clicks that met me was fantastic. Geir Gulliksen said a few words, I was touched and didn't know where to look. Afterward we went to Theatercafé with the publishing house people, initially I was ill at ease and said next to nothing, but luckily I warmed to the occasion. At the Savoy I met Kjartan Fløgstad, he had been nominated for the prize, my first inclination was to apologize to him for winning. Instead I asked him if he remembered me interviewing him. No, he didn't, he said with a smile, had I? He suggested we exchange books and then he rejoined his friends. By the time we got to Lorry I was well gone, and when I spotted Ole Robert Sunde at a table I immediately went over and sat down. He was with a woman. They were also good and drunk. Suddenly she leaned over to me, took my face between her hands and gave me a lingering kiss. Ole Robert Sunde said nothing, just averted his eyes. I stood up horrified and returned to our table.

In May, at the Literature Festival in Lillehammer, where I was attending a seminar with other debut authors, I met Ole Robert Sunde again. He was sitting at a table in the festival hall on the final evening. On seeing me, he shouted in a loud voice:

"There's our Knausgaard! He's good-looking, but he can't fucking write!"

My primary reaction was confusion. What was this? An insult, and not a petty one. The tone may have been jocular, but this was obviously something he had on his mind. At any rate, he shouted out the same thing on several occasions that evening. And, the second time, as I passed a few meters from his table on my way to the toilet, he shouted: "Knausgaard's writing is so ba-aad! But he is good-looking!" I didn't do anything then, either. Quite the contrary, when he beckoned to me on my return, I went over to his table. There were two women standing beside him. "Here's our Knausgaard," he said. Then, to the women: "Isn't he good-looking? Look." And he grabbed my hands. "Look at his hands! So big. And you know what that means, don't you?" The next moment he grabbed my crotch. I could feel his fingers on my dick and balls. "There's something else that's big!" he laughed. Even then I did nothing. Mumbled some comment or other, extricated myself, and left. The incident was unpleasant while it lasted, because he came so close to me, in purely a physical sense – actually he was the first and still the only man to grope me – but it didn't bother me, the only thing I felt was surprise. I knew some people considered me good-looking, so that wasn't a revelation, and as for my writing being poor . . . well, that was possible, but it can't have been that bad, after all the novel had been accepted by a publishing house and it had been published. The only new element, apart from the intimidation, was the underlying implication that there was an essential difference in the literature I produced and what Ole Robert Sunde wrote. At that time I no longer read his books, but that didn't mean I wasn't aware of his intellectual stature. My literary identity when Out of the World was published was high modernism, under the umbrella of which came such Norwegian writers as Ole Robert Sunde, Svein Jarvoll, Jon Fosse, Tor Ulven, and early Jan Kjærstad. But in Lillehammer six months had passed, my book was selling well, I had given one fatuous interview to newspapers after the other, said asinine things on the radio, been on TV, performed in libraries and bookshops, and slowly I was beginning to realize that the image I had of myself as a writer might not match the image others had. Stig Sæterbakken had, for example, called Tore Renberg and me Faldbakken & Faldbakken in a readers' column in Dagbladet, Liv Lundberg had hissed with contempt at us when we went to Tromsø for a reading and afterward we sat together at a party; everything we said during the night angered her and in the end she even went so far as to spit at us. And then there were Ole Robert Sunde's shouted insults in Lillehammer, which everyone heard, of course. That really took the wind out of my sails. I went to Kristiansand to write, it had worked once before, now I would try again. The same area, the same atmosphere, a continuation of the same novel. I managed one page, e-mailed it to Nora, who had read Out of the World before it was published and had been enthusiastic and who also had a collection of powerful poetry to her name, Slaktarmøte, she e-mailed me back and said that unfortunately she didn't think it was so good, especially the image I had worked on for so long, of a water sprinkler that waved like a hand, which she considered particularly weak.

I wondered if Hanne might still be living in Kristiansand and, if so, whether to call her. I decided not to. I gave Jan Vidar a call, it was a long time since I'd seen him, we went out, a stunningly beautiful girl, perhaps twenty-five, blond, came over to me and asked if I was Karl Ove Knausgaard. I said yes and I went home with her, she lived not very far from where I'd had a place as a sixteen-year-old, in a basement apartment under her parents' house. She was curvy and lovely, but as I stood there, in the middle of the night, very drunk, fortunately I realized what was about to happen and halted any advances, she made tea, I kept my distance and talked about Dad's death, of all things. As I left I felt like the idiot I was, but I was also happy, it had been a close call. I loved Tonje, I didn't want to ruin our relationship, it was the only blessing I had.

In the winter I went to the archipelago of Bulandet, I had rented a house on a little island where I would stay to write for three months. The island was so small that I could walk from end to end in ten minutes. The sea lay straight ahead, the winter storms were as wonderful as they were terrible. Five other people lived on the island, one died while I was there, I saw the ambulance take him one morning, it was snowing, four figures stood on the quay as the paramedics carried the stretcher on board.

I wrote nothing of any use. I went fishing every day, I read for a couple of hours, then I worked all evening and night. The results were worthless, but at some point surely it would have to flow, wouldn't it? Or was I a one-book writer? Had I shot my bolt?

Geir Gulliksen called me on my cell, he said my novel had been bought by an English publisher. I imagined English journalists coming out here to interview me, their photos of me standing with my fishing rod by the stormy sea in The Guardian, The Times, The Independent, and The Daily Telegraph.

I went up to Northern Norway and rented a run-down shack in Lofoten so that I could write. Nothing.

Then something freed up. John Erik Riley called and asked if I had anything for Vinduet. I said I would see and get back to him. I probably had four or five hundred pages' worth of openings to novels, I read through them, found one that might be usable and worked on it, as a short text, not a novel.

It was published on their website a few days later.

FIRE

Fire belongs to the group of phenomena that has never undergone any evolution. Change is therefore alien to its form, it will not be moved in any direction by the many fluctuations of its settings, it rests in its own completeness. Fire is perfect. But fire's unique feature, that which sets it apart from many of the other unchanging phenomena that exist, is that it has managed to detach itself from the tyranny of time and place. While water is doomed to be situated in a particular place forever, in some form or other, as air and mountains also are, fire has this remarkable ability to cease existing, quite simply – not only to disappear from view, to go into hiding, but indeed to allow itself to be extinguished – only to reappear exactly as before, in a new place, in a new time. For us, this makes fire difficult to understand, used as we are to regarding the world as a coherent system of continuous events, which at countless different speeds – from the tree's endlessly slow growth to the rapid fall of raindrops – progress temporally. Fire stands outside this system and that must have been why in the Old Testament the Divine revealed itself to man in the form of a flame: the form of revelation and fire are the same. The Divine has this ability to reveal itself suddenly, in its complete form, only then to disappear. The Divine also has this mysterious alien and merciless nature, which causes us to both fear and admire it. Anyone who has witnessed a house burning will know what I mean. Fire moves through the rooms and consumes everything in its path, the eerie roar of the flames, the blind will that only hours ago was nonexistent, but which has suddenly returned and wreaks havoc in front of our eyes with such abandon, you would have thought it was happening for the very first time.

But now, in this, our world of fire alarms, sprinkler systems, fire engines with ladders, breathing equipment, hydrants, hoses, and powder extinguishers, no one fears fire anymore. It has been brought under control and takes its place in the world in much the same way that wild animals in zoos do, something we look at when we are relaxing, such as a fire in the hearth or a flame on a candle; states in which its former abandon is only seen as a residue: the crackle of wood, the swirl of flames in a draft, the shower of sparks against the wall as we push the logs closer together. And the Divine? Who talks about the Divine nowadays? You can't. It is impossible to talk about the Divine without feeling ridiculous. There is now a sense of shame attached to talking about the Divine. And as shame is based on a disparity between two entities – most often the person you are to yourself in relation to the person you are to others – it would not be unreasonable to assume that the Divine's somewhat comical status is due to the fact that it is out of sync with the era we live in and thus joins the succession of past customs and objects that time has left behind, such as airships, top hats, polite forms of address, the chamber pot, and the electric typewriter. Things disappear, new things appear, the world slowly changes. Then we wake up one day, we rub the sleep from our eyes, draw the curtain aside and look out: clear air, bright sunshine, sparkling snow. We amble into the kitchen, switch on the radio, start the coffee machine, butter some bread, eat, drink, take a shower, dress, go to the hallway, put on a hat and coat, lock the door, and set off in this Østland dormitory town toward the station, which every morning is crowded with commuters. They stand on the platform with rolled-up newspapers under their arms and bags in their hands, strolling up and down in the cold, yawning, staring at the clock, peering down the railway line. Then, when the train thunders into the station, they form small queues in front of the doors, board the carriage, find a seat, fold up their coats, place them on the luggage rack, and sit down again. Oh, the tiny pleasures of commuting! Take out a ticket, place it on the armrest, unfold a newspaper, and start reading as the train slowly glides out of the station. Occasionally raise your eyes to look out: the blue sky, flashes of sun on the hoods of cars driving along the road across the river, the smoke from farmhouses in the valley, snowcapped mountains. The sudden noise as the door is opened, the bang as it is closed again, the conductor's voice approaching your seat. You give him your ticket, he scribbles his mark, you carry on reading. The next time you look out you have entered a forest. Dark green spruce trees huddle together on both sides of the track. Their branches exclude the light, but you think it is the opposite, they are preventing the darkness from rising, as if remnants of the night are still here, along the snow-covered ground beneath the trees in the forest you are speeding through. Sometimes the forest expands into copses, you see fences, glistening wires, small piles of timber. Then, as you turn your head back and look down at the newspaper on your knees, the train crashes. The carriage where you are sitting folds like paper, you find yourself pinned up against the seat in front and lose consciousness. When you come to a few minutes later you can't move. Diesel from the locomotive has sprayed into the carriage, you can hear the roar of the flames, passengers screaming, you try to free yourself, but to no avail. In the snow beneath the rails passengers from the rear carriages > file past. You can hear the flames approaching your seat, you are trapped and can only wait until the fire reaches you. Outside, flakes of ash settle on the snow. Soon the first ambulances arrive. You can smell melting plastic, you can smell burning diesel. You sit there unable to move, in the escalating heat, until it becomes unbearable and in your helplessness you pray to your God, the Almighty, the Creator of Heaven and Earth, whom you have never been closer to than at this moment, for this is how He reveals himself to us now, in his purest and most beautiful form: a blazing train in the forest.

So should I be writing short pieces?

For lack of anything better, I started there.

I wrote one about Dad. Yes, almost everything I did was about him, in one form or another, countless were the variants I had of two brothers, Klaus and Henrik, who traveled back to their hometown to bury him and went around cleaning the dreadful house where he had died. But this one came to nothing. I didn't believe in it.

Days passed, months passed, it was two years since I had made my debut, I had produced nothing, one night I was in the sitting room, drunk, and decided to fly to Kristiansand as soon as it was morning, I had received some e-mails from a girl who lived in the skerries off Kristiansand, in one she had written that she wasn't wearing anything, when I was drunk that was enough for me, and I was capable of this kind of stunt, even if I was broke, you just paid with a credit card. But the closer the morning came, the more sober I became, it was a crazy idea, typical of how I thought when I was drunk and I went to bed, where Tonje had been asleep all this time, while I had been going la-la in the sitting room.

Darkness descended.

I had everything I wanted. I was a writer and lived off writing, at least until my stipend ran out, I was married to a beautiful woman whom I loved and who let me do as I pleased. She didn't object when I said I was going to be away for two months, she said nothing when I went out at night and came home plastered at five in the morning, and she never threatened to leave me, even though I had been depressed for two years and obviously hated myself.

How could that be?

It wasn't the whole picture. I was good for her too, she needed me, and we had a good life together in Bergen, both when we were alone and when we were together with others, the circle of family and friends around us, so if I was filled with inner despair, it had nothing to do with life as it unfolded around me, with the trivial incidents that make up all lives and can suddenly shine bright in the dusk of meaninglessness: the door goes, she comes home, bends over and takes off her shoes, looks at me and smiles, her face is magical and childlike. She pours paint from a five-liter can into a small receptacle, climbs up on a chair and starts painting the molding over the window, wearing a workman's overalls stained with paint. She snuggles up to me on the sofa, we watch a film, tears run down her cheeks, I laugh at her and she laughs through her tears. There are thousands of such moments, lost the second they occur, yet still present because they are what form a relationship, the particular way we stayed together, which was the same as everyone's, though different, it was her and me, no one else, it was us, we dealt with everything that came at us as well as we could, but the darkness in me thickened, the joy in me evaporated, I no longer knew what I wanted or what to do, only that I was standing still, I was stuck, this was how it felt, as though I wasn't formed on the inside, it was only a mold shaped by everything on the outside. I walked around like a kind of imprint, a multitude of incidents and activities pressed tight against a mold, completely hollow on the inside. At night, when I was out, the longing for something else was all that existed, I could do anything and in the end I did. I was at Café Opera, there were lots of people I knew, there was a party afterward, I drank steadily and was completely out of it, but it helped to drink, I got into the mood, sat talking with Tomas, whom I had met a few years earlier and immediately liked, but didn't often speak with, we just exchanged a few words in passing every once in a while, in one of Bergen's bars. At five we decided to take a taxi to his place and continue drinking there, him, a friend, and me. While I was waiting for the taxi a woman from the party came down to the front door, she must have been in her midthirties, she had looked at me several times during the course of the evening, I had been evasive, I hadn't looked at her, hadn't spoken to her, but now this was different, I went over and asked if she would like to come too, she said yes, the taxi arrived, we got in, she sat close to me, I had my hand on her thigh, but sat still otherwise, the other two didn't notice what was going on, in the town center we tumbled out of the taxi and went up to Tomas's apartment, at the top of a large building, I had been there several times, always at night, always drunk. There was a balcony outside where once, with many others, we had watched two people fucking in the backyard, she had been lying over the hood of a car, he had stoked away from behind, I had gone in to chat with someone, had a bit more to drink, gone back, they were still at it. When at last they finished we applauded. He had bowed to us while she'd grabbed her clothes and sped off. Tomas was a writer, his face was handsome and sensitive and very distinctive, as soon as you saw him you realized he wasn't like anyone else, he was an exception, boundlessly generous and kind, deeply serious and passionate about what he was doing, independent in that rare way, you only find a handful of such people in every generation. He had done some boxing and fencing, he surrounded himself with women, in an enthusiastic boyish fashion, and he was the only person apart from Tore I knew who had read À la recherche du temps perdu. His style was elegant, he sought perfection and beauty, and in that, as in almost everything else, he was my antithesis. He led tonight, he opened the door and let us in, put on music, produced some whiskey, we were going to discuss Proust, and I did, but not for long, I was beyond everything, all I had in my head was her, who was also there, seated some distance away, I wanted her, so I went over to her, she sat on my lap, we kissed, my hands were all over her, I didn't care that all this was going on in front of Tomas and his friend, this was everything now, she was everything, I lifted her and stood up, took her hand and went into the bedroom, Tomas's bedroom, I closed the door and tore off her clothes, pulled the two sides of her jacket apart without bothering about the buttons, kissed her, undid her skirt and flung it off, pulled down her tights, she was nearly naked now, I unbuttoned my trousers and let them fall, threw myself on top of her, out of my mind with desire, without a thought for anything else, no, somewhere I was thinking I want this and I'm doing it, this is me who wants it, why shouldn't I do it? She groaned and I shouted, I came, I got up to go, she lay there watching me and told me not to go, she wanted more, I thought OK, lay down on her again, but it was no good and I got dressed, went into the living room without a second look, grabbed my jacket and went down into the street, flagged down a taxi, gave our address, paid him five minutes later, unlocked the door, let myself in, undressed, and got into bed beside Tonje.

When I awoke I was in hell. It was completely dark outside. Tonje was in the living room watching TV, I could hear it. My clothes, which lay in a pile beside the bed, smelled of perfume. I smelled of sex. The thought of what I had done, the guilt and the shame and the angst, were so great there was nothing else. It was bottomless. I was paralyzed, I couldn't move, I lay there in the darkness knowing the only way out of this was death. I hadn't moved since I woke up, it was as though the darkness was pressing down on me, it hurt so much I wanted to scream, but I lay there, motionless, perfectly still, from the living room came the sound of the TV, and then she walked through and stopped in the open doorway.

I lay with my eyes closed, breathing heavily.

"You still asleep?" she said. "It's almost six. Can't you get up so we can enjoy some of the day?"

"I'm really worried," I said. "I was so drunk."

"Poor you," she said. "But why don't we walk down and rent a film? I can make pizza."

"OK," I said.

"Good!" she said.

She left, I sat up in bed, still drunk. I took my clothes with me into the bathroom, put them in the washing machine with some other clothes and switched it on. Then I had a shower. I was in hell, this was hell. But I would manage. If I could get through today, and the next day and the one after, I would be fine.

I should go in and tell her, I thought. This was too much for me to bear. Her feelings were genuine and pure, she was honest in what she did, and then she was with me, who was so bad and did the worst things. If I told her what I had done she would leave me. I couldn't risk that. Better to lie for all eternity. Lying was something I was really bad at, but now I would have to. I would have to lie every single day for the rest of my life, but I would manage, I would.

It was good we were going out, the telephone was here, and it was conceivable that both Tomas and the woman might ring.

We set off downhill to Danmarksplass, where the big video shop was.

"Was it fun last night?" she said.

I shook my head.

"No, not really. Pretty run of the mill. But there were lots of people I knew there."

She asked who and I told her.

"You didn't get involved in anything, did you?" she said.

I flushed with shame and horror, my face was scarlet, but I forced myself to continue walking at my usual speed and held my head still, it was dark, she couldn't see.

"No, no," I said.

"But why did you come back so late? It was eight when you came in."

"I went back to Tomas's place after the party, me and a friend of his. We drank whiskey and discussed literature. That, in fact, was pretty good."

We rented two films and bought the ingredients for a pizza. When we returned the light on the answering machine was flashing. I hadn't considered that. It was worse because it would be played through the speakers, into the room, so if the message was about what happened she would hear.

She went into the kitchen, organized things, started frying the ground beef, and I pressed the button on the answering machine, hoping she would be too busy to notice.

It was Tomas. He didn't say anything specific, only that we could talk if I wanted.

"Who was it?" Tonje said, standing in the doorway with the spatula in her hand.

"Tomas," I said. "He just wanted to catch up."

I deleted the message and went in and sat down on the sofa.

The next day she went to work as usual. I called Ole, I had to talk to someone, I couldn't deal with this on my own. We arranged to go to the Film Club at Verftet, where they were showing a David Lean film.

Most of our friends in Bergen were shared, I couldn't tell any of them about this. But Ole, who had got divorced and moved back from Norwich, was outside the circle. Yes, he knew Tonje, they liked each other, but primarily his relationship was with me. He was still translating Samuel Johnson, mostly for himself out of interest, he had dropped out of university and was training as a nurse instead. Once, he had taken me down through all the subterranean corridors beneath the hospital, I was going to write about them, and I was far more fascinated by them than I anticipated. It was its own little world down there under the ground. Ole and I went to see the Lean film. It was about infidelity, I sat in my seat in agony, I was in hell. Afterward we went for a beer at Wesselstuen and I told him everything. What I wanted to know, what I needed his advice about, was whether I should confess and trust she would forgive me or keep my mouth shut, pretend everything was fine and let it pass of its own accord, I hoped it would.

"Don't even think about saying anything," Ole said. "What purpose would it serve? Then she would have the burden as well. You would be putting the responsibility on her. But it's yours. You did it. You can't undo anything, you did it. In this sense, it doesn't matter whether she knows or not."

"But then I would be deceiving her. I would be lying to her."

"You have deceived her. Words and actions are not the same thing."

"No, you're right," I said. "But this is just the worst experience of my life. I have never hurt so much. It's absolutely indescribable. It's so painful it feels as if it would be better to shoot myself."

"Well, do you have a gun?"

"Ha ha. It's all I can think about. It's always there, from the moment I wake up till the moment I go to sleep. There's nothing in my head except what I did. And then Tonje. . ."

"It'll pass. It sounds cynical, but it will pass."

"I hope so," I said.

But it didn't. Whenever the telephone rang, fear flared up in me. I took out the phone plug as often as I could without arousing suspicion, at least in that way I could have some kind of peace, knowing no one could call. When we chose films in the video shop I always read the blurb to see whether there was anything about infidelity, if there was, I made up some excuse for not wanting to see it. I carefully scrutinized the TV listings, so I knew what I could see and what I couldn't. If there was any infidelity I did something else. But despite this sometimes the topic cropped up, people were talking about it and then my head burned with shame and I tried to distract attention by changing the subject. I was stiff and unnatural, it was strange she didn't notice, but I presumed the idea that I might do something like this was so far from her perceptual world that it never occurred to her. My bad conscience was a constant, my sense of guilt toward her a constant, whatever we did, I was false and a liar, a cheat, a bad person, and the more affectionate she was with me, the closer she came, the worse I felt. I acted cool, but everything had been destroyed, everything had become a game.

We bought some property. Someone Tonje worked with wanted to sell, we got it cheap, it was in Minde, near NRK. It was a three-story detached house, built in the early 1900s, we bought the top two floors, one measuring a hundred and ten square meters, where we lived, and a smaller apartment in the loft, which we rented out. I polished the floors and oiled them; Tonje painted and wallpapered. We took the doors off their hinges and stripped them, we started to get quotes for the bathroom, which we wanted renovated. Afterward we would tackle the kitchen. We liked the place, it was a bargain. I had a spacious office, there were also two living rooms and a bedroom, a balcony, and a large garden. Life was normal, the future was ours, we began to talk about children. I couldn't write, three years had now gone by since my debut, I had nothing to show for it and probably never would have. But I kept trying, lowered my head and typed away. Every time the telephone rang a chill went through me. It would never disappear. Whenever I laid eyes on Tonje or she smiled at me I was overcome by pangs of conscience. But they passed, I managed, days passed, perhaps in the end they would go. Hans and Sigrid had come back to Bergen, we spent a lot of time with them, took a flight to London together, had meals at each other's places, and with their friends, this was a social circle, this was a life. Hans and Sigrid moved into a house high above Sandviken, I went there one day to give Hans a hand with painting, it was September, the sky was clear and blue, in the fjord a lifeboat was practicing a maneuver, an enormous shower of spray shot up skyward and it glistened in the sun. It was one of those days when everything was open and the town lies there, in the middle of the world, beneath a vast sky and you think life is worth living. Suddenly Tonje called, she said we had to turn on the radio, there had been an attack on the World Trade Center, a plane had flown into one tower. We did, we stood there painting in the sunshine as reporters tried to describe what was happening and what had happened. I couldn't visualize anything, it was all so unclear, Hans said it was probably Bin Laden, which was the first time I had heard his name. I went home, Tonje sat watching TV, they showed images of the plane flying into the tower again and again and then the building collapsed. We watched all evening. The next day we flew to Paros, where we would be for a week. We buzzed around on a moped, Tonje on the pillion with her arms around me, we swam and read, made love and ate out in the evenings, wandered around the wonderful streets, one day we went to Antiparos, where I had been thirteen years before and I remembered everything and laughed: On that island out there I had sat writing a novel in my notebook, I read Ulf Lundell and had ambitions of being a writer. All on my own out there, and when I went for a swim I was overcome by a sudden fear of sharks. Here, in the Mediterranean!

Oh, it was great. But at home things continued as always, autumn passed, I couldn't write, Tonje worked, I gave a start whenever the telephone rang, expecting only nastiness. Several times someone had rung without speaking, that kind of thing goes on of course, but it was impossible for me not to connect it with what had happened almost a year before.

Then, in February, I had a dream. I dreamed that I was standing in front of a bull, it was buried in the sand and struggling to get out. I had a sword in my hand. I slashed at the bull's neck. Its head fell off, but the bull kept fighting, it tore its way out of the sand and I woke up.

Something terrible was going to happen. I knew it was. The dream had told me.

But what?

My first thought was the woman who lived above us, she was young and had a permanent job, so we didn't see much of her, but as she was in the house I thought the attack might come from her, she would report me for molestation or something, because she had become unstable and was fixated on me. I'd had this obsession for a while, it was totally without justification, rooted in my own bad conscience and mangled self-image, but with the dream as well I could imagine it happening.

The whole day passed. I worked in my study, Tonje came home, we ate, I went to my study to read, I had an armchair there, a little table with an ashtray and a cup of coffee, bookshelves circled the room, one of my greatest pleasures was to sit looking at all the books, taking them out, browsing. Now I was reading Burton's The Anatomy of Melancholy. It was just after eleven, the house was silent, the streets outside still. I put a CD on the ministereo I had bought, Tortoise, I lit a cigarette, poured some coffee.

From the sitting room came the sound of the phone ringing, I just heard it, as if from a distance.

I switched off the stereo.

If someone was calling so late, it meant something had happened.

Someone must have died. But who?

Tonje opened the door.

"It's for you," she said.

"Who is it?"

"He didn't say. Some friend or other I haven't met because he made a joke."

"A joke?"

"Yes."

I got up, went into the living room and picked up the phone. Tonje followed.

"Hello?" I said.

"Is that the rapist Karl Ove Knausgaard?"

"What are you talking about?" I said. "Who is it?"

Tonje had stopped, she was standing by the wall looking at me.

"You know damn well what I'm talking about. You raped my girlfriend a year ago."

"No, I did not."

"But you know what I'm referring to?"

"Yes, but it wasn't rape."

As I said that I glanced across at Tonje. Her face was white. She was staring at me with large eyes. She almost stumbled back against the wall.

"Yes, it fucking was. And unless you admit it we'll come over to your place right now. If you don't open the door, we'll smash it in. If you don't admit it then, we'll smash you in. We'll beat your face to pulp. Now, writer, do you admit it?"

"No. It wasn't rape. We went to bed together, I'll admit that. But it wasn't rape."

Tonje's eyes stared and stared at me.

"It damn well was. She woke up with her clothes torn. How do you explain that? She's right here."

"It wasn't rape. Whatever you say and whatever she's told you."

"Then we're on our way up there."

"Let me talk to her."

"If you admit you raped her."

"It wasn't rape."

"Well, then you can hear it from her own mouth."

Seconds passed. I looked up. Tonje had left the room.

"Hello," she said from the other end.

"Your boyfriend says it was rape," I said. "How can you say that? You were up for it as much as I was."

"I don't remember anything. I woke up with all my clothes torn. I don't know what happened. It might not have been rape. But this has been terrible. So I told him and he wanted to drive up and get you. I managed to stop that. But they're out of their minds."

"They?" I said.

"Yes," she said.

Apparently there were two of them, one was her ex-boyfriend, the other a writer I didn't know but I had met many times.

"He says you aren't as good as everyone makes out," she said.

"What's he got to do with this?"

"He's a friend."

"OK," I said. "I can't have it said about me that I've raped someone. It wasn't rape. Tell them it wasn't rape."

"It wasn't."

"Are they still coming up here?"

"I don't know what they think now."

"The best would be if we meet," I said. "You, your boyfriend, and me. So that we can talk about it."

"OK," she said.

"What about tomorrow? Two o'clock in the café by the decorative art museum?"

"Yes, that's fine. I want to talk too. I've called you a few times, but your wife has always picked up."

"See you," I said, and hung up.

At that moment Tonje came into the room, she must have been waiting. She glared at me.

"We need to talk," I said.

We sat in my office. It was as though I had stepped into a zone, the light was all white, nothing existed beyond it. We talked about what had happened. I told her about the night in detail. Why didn't you say anything? Tonje kept saying. Why didn't you say anything? Why didn't you say anything? I apologized, I said I hadn't meant it, I asked for her forgiveness, but we were both in a completely different place, this wasn't about forgiveness, this was about what we had together, which had been so wonderful that it was ruined. The way all of this had come out, the brutal and uncontrolled manner of it, had given her a shock, she was in shock, her face was still ashen, and she wasn't crying, she was just attempting to grasp the significance of it. I was also in shock, the white light seared out everything else, all that was left was the terrible deed. I told her it wasn't rape, of course, she said, I know, that's not what this is about. For me though it was also what this was about, anything could happen, she could go to the police, they might come here and arrest me. No one in the world would believe me, I would be sentenced, as a rapist, the worst thing that could befall me, the greatest ignominy, for all the future, for the rest of my life. What was more, I was in the public eye, if the press got hold of it I would be hung out to dry on every single front page in the whole country. I didn't give that any thought then though, as we sat talking in my study, it was what I had done to Tonje that counted. She didn't cry, but she had withdrawn, she was deep inside herself, shaken to the very bottom of her soul.

The next day I walked into town, which had totally disappeared, it had been erased, the thought of what I had done was all that existed.

They weren't in the café. I waited for an hour, they didn't come.

I rang Tomas and brought him up-to-date. He was furious. He said he knew Arild, her ex, he was a criminal, a drug addict, he was nothing to be afraid of, but if you like, Karl Ove, I can go and pay him a visit and frighten him so much he'll never contact you again. I'll knock him senseless if necessary. Should I? Let's wait a bit, I said, and see what happens. If he contacts me again you could maybe have a word with him. I'll do that. You can count on me. That kind of person is just evil.

When I returned, the apartment wonderfully illuminated by the glow of the winter sun, I heard Tonje running water into the bath. I didn't want to disturb her, I went into the living room and looked up at the mountain opposite.

The sound of running water stopped.

A long drawn-out, heartrending sob came from her.

The despair in her sobs was so great I cried.

But I couldn't console her, couldn't help her. They never called again. I never heard any more from them. But the relationship was ruined anyway, and perhaps it had been from the night I did what I did, nevertheless we decided I should go away for some time. I called the people I rented the house from on Bulandet, the year before, it was empty, I could move in right away, and I did, caught the boat to Askvoll, then to Bulandet, the westernmost point in the country, far into the sea, that was where I was going to be.

I didn't write, I fished, slept, and read. I was distraught, not temporarily but deeply, that was how it felt, it didn't get better, it didn't change, every day I awoke to bottomless despair. It was purely a matter of endurance. That was all I focused on. I had to endure. I read Olav H. Hauge's diaries and that was an enormous solace, I had no idea why, but they were, for the few hours I read them I had peace. Every time the ferry docked I stood by the window and watched to see if anyone got off, perhaps Tonje will come, I thought. We hadn't arranged anything, all we agreed on was that we needed time to ourselves, each in our own place, and I came here. I didn't know if our relationship was over, if she wanted to separate or if she was yearning for me and wanted us to continue. I bore all the guilt, I didn't want to burden her, I kept away, she would have to work out what she wanted to do herself. I watched the ferry and hoped. But she didn't come. Once, I was convinced it was her getting off, I jumped into my boots and dashed over to meet her, but I immediately saw it wasn't and walked back.

Espen rang, he was going to Bergen, I longed for someone to talk to, caught the ferry, met him, we had a few beers, I slept in his hotel room. While we were out we met one of Tonje's friends. She looked as if she had seen a ghost when she spotted me. The following day I returned, and in a strange way it felt like home, this tiny little island far out in the sea, the yellow 1950s house on the promontory where I was staying. I loved the sky there, it was so vast and dramatic, and I loved the few days when there was sun and tranquillity. I loved standing on the quay and looking down into the compelling clear green fresh water where long strips of seaweed stood vertically and fish swam past and crabs moved sideways. Starfish, mussels, the whole rich subaquatic world. A plastic bag could drift out, deep in the water. I also loved to gaze at the quay, the small warehouses, all the equipment, all the yarn and all the buckets and boxes and cans. But most of all I loved the sky, the way the clouds slid through the darkness at night, like ships on their way to land or towered up before a storm, which always came from the west and made the entire house shake and quiver and gasp and throb.

On all my fishing trips I saw things, once an otter that was resident in the vicinity; it had made a little slide in the snow and kept diving down it every so often. Sometimes I saw it swimming toward me, a little black head just above the surface of the water. One night it ran at full speed across the veranda outside my house. I liked the otter, I was happy when I saw it, it was like a friend.

One morning the whole island was covered with birds. They made an unparalleled commotion. Then they took off, there were several hundred of them, a cloud rising into the air, they circled around the island a few times then slowly landed, like a carpet. At night they stood still in the darkness. I thought about them before I went to sleep, the silence of the living is quite different from the silence of the dead, and awoke to their din early the next morning.

Winter turned to spring. I didn't have a television, didn't have any newspapers, ate nothing but fish, crackers, and oranges, and all I thought about, when I wasn't thinking about Tonje, was that I had to be a good person. I had to be a good person. I had to do everything I could to be a good person. I had to stop being a coward, stop being evasive and vague, I had to be honest, upright, clear, sincere. I had to look people in the eye, I had to stand up for who I was, what I thought, and what I did. I had to treat Tonje better, if we were still together. I mustn't be grumpy, mustn't be ironic, mustn't be sarcastic but rise above it and always keep the bigger picture in mind. She was an exceptional person, absolutely unique, and I mustn't take her for granted.

Most of all I wanted action. To do something. But what?

I considered committing suicide, simply swimming off into the sea, it gave me a fine tingling feel, it had an appeal, but I would never do it, giving up wasn't in my nature. I was the kind to endure. No one had said you couldn't become a better person through endurance.

I wrote letters to Tonje, but didn't send them. I didn't receive any, didn't hear anything, and eventually I returned.

We hadn't seen each other for three months. I called her from the hill below the house.

"Karl Ove, have you come back?" she said in that voice of hers which was so intimate.

"Yes," I said. "I'm outside."

"Are you here?"

I unlocked the door, went up the stairs, she came into the hall, behind her was a colleague. Oh, fucking hell, I thought, has he moved in? Are they together?

They weren't. He had come by to fix the sliding door in the bathroom for her. She was thin and seemed sad. I was also thin, and there was no joy to be found in me.

We talked for days. She wanted to continue, I wanted to continue, and we continued. House, friends, family, Bergen. I wrote during the day, she worked for NRK. Everything was as before. The summer came and went, Christmas came and went, we talked about having children, but didn't take the final step. One evening I received a phone call from a stranger. He said he had been married to the woman I had been unfaithful with. They had children together. Now he wanted sole custody of the children. There was going to be a lawsuit. He wondered whether I would like to testify. He said that she and her boyfriend had done the same to a priest, she'd had sex with him, he had called the family and told them about it. The priest had been forced to resign, this man said, I didn't know what to believe, at first I thought it was some kind of trap, someone was recording the conversation, but he seemed genuine. In the end, I said I couldn't help him. When I told Tonje about this she said it would have come out immediately, all the media checked events in the courts, if I had said yes, as I had considered doing, the papers would have run the headline "Famous Norwegian Writer (33) Accused of Rape" with enough information for readers to know who was meant.

I clung to my writing, sat in my study from morning till night, nothing. Journalists had stopped calling ages ago, on the rare occasion one did, it was to ask whether I would be interested in contributing to an article about writers' block or one-book writers. But in February 2002 something happened. I had started another short text, located it in the nineteenth century but let everything that exists now, exist then, and the scene was Tromøya, yet it wasn't, a completely different story emerged, and in this parallel world, which resembled ours but wasn't, I had Yngve, Dad, and me taking a boat to Torungen one summer's night. I described the night as I remembered it with one exception: the seagull Dad shone his flashlight on had a pair of small, thin, armlike growths beneath its wings. They had once been angels, I had him say, and then I knew: this is a novel. Finally, a novel.

I was so excited. Suddenly I was full of energy, went shopping and made food and talked about everything under the sun, full of initiative with regard to Tonje, we could go there, do this, everything was possible again.

Tonje went to a seminar in Kristiansand, I had the whole day and night to write in, she came home three days later, wanted to go straight to a party, her band, made up of NRK staff, was going to play, she asked if I wanted to go with her, but I had to write, she went alone. After an hour I regretted my decision and went anyway, saw her playing the drums, I was moved for some reason, but when I went over to her afterward and she was packing up the drum set, she was evasive, wouldn't look me in the eye, and wouldn't talk. I knew that side of her, something was bothering her.

She carried the cymbal stands along the corridor, I had the snare drum in my hands, and I asked her to tell me what was up. I know there's something, so tell me what it is. I can see something's eating you.

"I wasn't going to tell you," she said. "But since you ask I will. I've been unfaithful."

"In Kristiansand? Just now?"

"Yes."

I looked at her. She looked at me.

I was angry. The thought that she had given herself to another man was terrible, but I was relieved, too, now it wasn't only me at fault.

When we got home we sat in my office as we had done a year earlier. I was no longer in a state of shock, since what had happened, what she had done, was no more than an extension of what I had done, but it was as terrible.

"Why did you do it?" I said. "I was so drunk I didn't know what I was doing. But you never do anything on impulse. You knew what you were doing."

"I don't know. I think it's because you were suddenly so happy. Suddenly you were walking around beaming with happiness. You've been depressed for four years, ever since the autumn your father died and your book came out, and it's been so hard. I've tried, I've tried everything. And then you start writing and you're happy again! That just told me so much. It feels as if I have nothing to do with your life. It feels as if I'm on the outside. That was the last straw, and I thought, well, what the hell. And then I did it."

I put my face in my hands.

I looked at her.

"What do we do now?" I said.

"I don't know."

We went to bed, early the next morning I packed a suitcase and traveled up to Yngve's, he had moved to Voss. I was there for two days, talked to him, he thought I should stay with her. We were even. Tonje was a fantastic person, I shouldn't leave her.

I caught the train back to Tonje, we talked all night, I had decided to leave. I wanted to get away from everything. We kept everything open, it wasn't finished, nothing was definitive, but we both knew it was over, at least I did.

She accompanied me to the train station.

She embraced me.

She cried.

I didn't cry, I put my arms around her and told her to take care of herself. We kissed, I got on board, and as the train eased out of the station I watched Tonje walking down the platform and into the town alone.

I was on the night train to Oslo, everything I did on the journey was meant to keep me from thinking. I read one newspaper after another, afterward I read a novel by Ian Rankin, the first crime novel I had read for twenty years, until I was so tired I would fall asleep the instant I closed my eyes. In Oslo I bought another Rankin novel, changed trains, destination Stockholm this time, boarded, and started to read.

That was how I left Bergen.

Amusing episodes coexist alongside weighty, meditative, and essayistic passages on art and literature… Those who have come this far in the series will not be disappointed by Book Five; it is a pleasure to witness the gradual emergence of a dedicated artist over the course of a decade.

Publishers Weekly (Starred Review)

How wonderful to read an experimental novel that fires every nerve ending while summoning in the reader the sheer sense of how amazing it is to be alive, on this planet and no other.

JEFFREY EUGENIDES, The New York Times Book Review

In exposing himself as a bundle of contradictions, Knausgaard allows us to see ourselves.

BLAKE MORRISON, The Guardian

He does recapture the world, somehow; that's the thing, and it gives these strange, boring, hypnotic, luminous books almost a religious feeling, something like immanence. It's astonishing. If you haven't already, read them now.

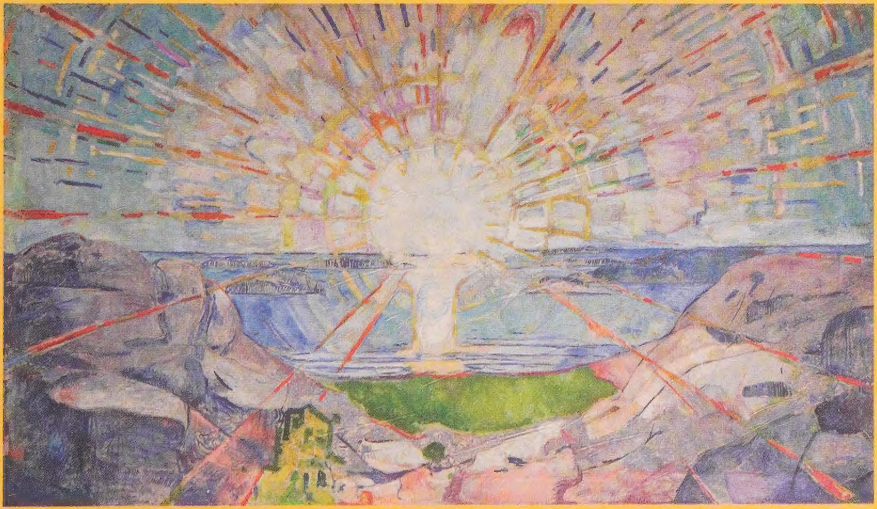
My Struggle

BOOK SIX



Translated from the Norwegian

The full breadth and achievement of Karl Ove Knausgaard's monumental work becomes evident in this final installment of My Struggle. In Book Six, Knausgaard grapples directly with the consequences of his transgressive blurring of public and private. His vulnerabilities and ambitions are exposed. Book Six depicts life in all its complexities, from the painful fallout surrounding the publication of the earlier volumes, to the emotional balm that his close friends provide, to the vivid texture of his days as he faces a marital crisis with his children around him. The book is an exploration of literature itself and of the profound – and at times startling – connection between writer and reader. Knausgaard also includes a lengthy contemplation of Hitler and his Mein Kampf, which not only directly confronts the implications of his own work's title but feels particularly relevant (if not prescient) amid rising public support for authoritarianism globally. My Struggle: Book Six offers a culminating dive into an atmosphere that has beguiled readers around the world and reveals Knausgaard to be one of the most groundbreaking artists of our time.

My Struggle

Part 1

In mid-September of 2009 I went up to Thomas and Marie's little retreat between Höganäs and Mölle, he was going to take some photos of me for the forthcoming books. I had rented a car, a black Audi, and headed north along the four-lane motorway in late morning with an intense feeling of happiness in my chest. The sky was clear blue, the sun shone like it was still summer. To my left the Öresund lay glittering, to my right yellow fields of stubble and meadows stretched inland, separated by stone walls, streams lined by leafy trees, sudden woodland. I was struck by a feeling that such a day wasn't supposed to happen, and yet there it was, an oasis of summer in the midst of autumn's paling landscape, and the fact that it wasn't meant to be like that, that the sun wasn't meant to shine so brightly, the sky wasn't supposed to be so saturated with light, tinged my joy with a sense of unease, so I tried not to think about it in the hope that it would pass of its own accord, sang along to the chorus of "Cat People" as it came through the speakers at the same moment, and took pleasure at the sight of the town appearing on my left, the harbor cranes, factory chimneys, warehouses. These were the outskirts of Landskrona, gliding by as Barsebäck had glided by only a few minutes earlier, the nuclear power station's characteristic and ever-ominous silhouette rising in the distance. Next up was Helsingborg, and from there it was another twenty kilometers or so to Thomas and Marie's place.

I was running late. First I had sat for a long time in the parking garage, in the roomy Audi's temperate interior, wondering how to start the ignition, unable to bring myself to go back to the rental office and ask in case they took the vehicle away from me once I had revealed such towering ignorance, and so I sat and pored through the handbook, flipping backward and forward through the pages, finding nothing at all about how to start the engine. I studied the dashboard, then the key, which wasn't a key at all but a card made of black plastic. I had unlocked the doors by pressing on it and wondered now if the ignition worked by some similar system. I searched the steering column in vain for a diagram. But there, wasn't that a slot of some sort? Maybe that was it?

I inserted the card and the engine purred. The next half hour I spent driving around the center of Malmö looking for the right road out of the city. By the time I eventually drove down the entrance ramp and onto the motorway I was nearly an hour behind schedule.

As Landskrona disappeared behind the low fold of the glacial ridge, I fumbled for my mobile on the seat next to me, found it, and pressed Geir's number. It was Geir who had originally introduced me to Thomas, they had met in a boxing club where Thomas had been working on a photo book about the sport, while Geir had been writing a dissertation on the same subject. They made an odd couple, to put it cautiously, but held each other in the highest regard.

"Hi there," said Geir.

"Hi," I said. "Can you do me a favor?"

"Sure."

"Could you give Thomas a call and tell him I'll be an hour late."

"Will do. Are you on the road?"

"Yes."

"Sounds good."

"It's fantastic, for a change. But listen, I've got to pass a truck now."

"And?"

"I can't talk on the phone at the same time."

"Someone ought to investigate your multitasking skills sometime. Catch you later, then."

I hung up, changed gears, and passed the long white semitrailer truck, which swayed gently in the turbulent air. Earlier in the summer I had driven the whole family up to Koster and nearly had two accidents on the way, one due to hydroplaning at high speed, which could have ended very badly indeed, the other not quite as drastic, but frightening nonetheless; I had changed lanes in a traffic jam outside Gothenburg without seeing a car coming from behind, and we only avoided a crash because the other guy was so quick on the brakes. The angry blast of his horn cut straight into my soul. After that I took a break from driving, and felt a little fear every time I thought about it, which was probably a good thing, but still, even passing a truck had become an ordeal, I had to force myself to do it, and any long drive filled me with anxiety for days afterwards, like a hangover. The fact that I had passed my test and was actually allowed to drive a car was something my soul cared little about, it lagged behind and was still living in the days when it had been a great recurring nightmare of mine that I got behind the wheel of a car and drove off without knowing how. Ridden with angst, negotiating the bends of Norway's roads with the overhanging threat of the police catching up with me any minute, I would be sound asleep in bed somewhere with the pillow and the upper half of the duvet soaked in sweat.

I left the motorway and joined the narrower main road to Höganäs. The warmth outside was visible in the air, something about the substance of light and sky, they seemed veiled in a way, and the glitter the sunshine sprinkled over everything. The world was wide open, that was the feeling of it, and everything shimmered.

Ten minutes later I swung into the parking lot outside a supermarket and got out. Oh, such a rush of well-being in the air, it seemed pervaded by the blue of the sea, though without being hot in the way the air is hot in summer, there was a hint of coolness and sedateness about it. As I crossed the asphalt toward the supermarket, whose flags hung flaccidly from their poles, the feeling the air gave me reminded me of smoothing one's hand over marble on a sweltering hot day in some Italian town, that coolness, as subtle as it was surprising.

I bought a box of raspberries to give them, and a packet of cigarettes and some chewing gum for myself, put the raspberries on the passenger seat, and started the ignition again. The narrow road, lined by the hedges of small whitewashed cottages, led down toward the sea only a few hundred meters from the supermarket. Thomas and Marie's place was right at the bottom, with the sea to the west and a vast green field to the east.

Thomas came across the lawn in shorts to greet me as I got out and shut the car door. He gave me a hug, one of the few people who could do so without it feeling too intimate. I wasn't sure why. Maybe it was down to the simple fact that he was fifteen years older and, although we didn't actually know each other that well, had always been sympathetic toward me.

"Hi, Karl Ove," he said.

"Long time, no see," I said. "What a gorgeous day!"

We crossed the lawn. The air was completely still, the trees stood completely still, the sun hung suspended above the sea, sending its scorching rays out over the landscape. And yet all the time the same coolness in the air. It had been ages since I had felt such calm.

"How about some coffee?" said Thomas as we paused at the rear of the house where the previous summer he had made a timber deck that stretched like the deck of a ship from its outer wall to the thick, impenetrable hedge that cast its motionless shadow a couple of meters back toward the house.

"Yes, please," I said.

"Great, have a seat and I'll get you some."

I sat down, put my sunglasses on again, and leaned my head back to soak up as much sun as possible while I lit a cigarette and Thomas filled a receptacle with water from the tap in the little kitchen.

Marie came out. Her sunglasses were pushed up onto her forehead, and she squinted at the sun. I told her I had read about her in Dagens Nyheter that morning, there was a piece about an art controversy she was involved in. I had forgotten what it was exactly they had written about her, despite racking my brains, but fortunately she didn't ask, saying only that she would check it out at the library, she was on her way there anyway.

"Has your book come out yet?" she asked.

"No, not yet. It'll be out on Saturday, though."

"How exciting!" she said.

"Yes," I replied.

"See you later, then," she said. "I take it you're staying for lunch?"

"Yes, that'd be nice!" I said back, and smiled. "By the way, I brought Linda's manuscript with me. I'll give it to you later."

Marie had been a supervisor at the writers' school in Biskops-Arnö and had agreed to read the manuscript of a novel Linda had just completed.

"Fine," she said, and went inside again. Shortly after, a car started at the front of the house. Thomas came out with two cups of coffee and a plate of muffins. He sat down and we chatted for a bit before he went and got his camera and took a few photos as we continued talking. The last time I had been to see him he had been reading Proust; he still was, he said, just before I came he had been sitting there reading the part about the grandmother's death. That's one of the finest passages, I said. Yes, he said, getting up to photograph me from a different angle. I thought about what little I remembered about the grandmother's death. The way it came out of nothing. One minute she had been getting into a carriage to take her through the Jardin du Luxembourg and the next she was struck by a brain hemorrhage from which she died only hours later. Or was it days? The house milling with physicians, the all-consuming anguish that bears down during the first phase of grief, apathy continually interrupted by the unrest that comes with hope. All out of the blue, the shock of that.

"Great," said Thomas. "How about if you move your chair over to the hedge there?"

I did as he suggested. When he was done he went inside to study the images away from the light. I went and got more coffee in the kitchen, glancing at the photos he was clicking through on the camera screen as I stepped past.

"These are quite good," he said. "As long as you don't mind having a long nose."

I smiled and went outside again. Thomas wasn't out to make me look good, nor to capture some particular expression, rather the opposite, so I understood, he wanted me the way I looked when I was relaxed, without posing.

He came back out with the camera and sat down in the sun.

"Are we done?" I asked.

"Yes," he replied. "They've come out nicely, I think. I might take a couple of full-lengths, though, a bit later on."

"Great," I said.

A low murmur of voices came from the other side of the hedge. I crossed my legs and looked up at the sky. There wasn't a cloud in sight.

"I was at the hospital visiting one of my best friends before we came down here," he said. "He's broken his neck."

"How terrible," I said.

"Yes. They found him in Gullmarsplan. No one knows what happened, he was just lying there on the square."

"Is he conscious?"

"Yes. He can talk and is quite lucid. But he can't remember a thing about what happened. He doesn't even know what he was doing in Gullmarsplan."

"Was there alcohol involved?"

"Not at all. No, it's an illness he has. Similar things have happened to him before, he can pass out in his apartment and wake up again without knowing where he is. But this time the consequences were more serious. I'm worried he might not pull through."

I didn't know what to say and nodded. We sat there in silence for a while. Thomas looked at me.

"Like to go for a walk?"

"Yeah, why not," I said.

A couple of minutes later he closed the gate behind us and we tramped off across the grazed pastures that sloped gently down toward the stony beach, where waves rolled lazily in from the sea. Some longhorn cattle stood and stared at us from the top of a small hill. We were only about fifty meters away from some houses and the busy road that ran behind them, but it felt as if we were walking on a deserted heath. Maybe it was the sea, and the way the pasture ran all the way down to the beach. Normally in these parts land like this was the most valuable of all and rarely given over to grazing.

"There are some old bunkers from the war up there," said Thomas, pointing toward some low concrete structures a bit farther ahead. "We're very close to Denmark here, of course."

"We had some where I grew up," I said. "But they were German."

"Really?" he said, lifting his camera to take a photo of me in profile against the sea.

"We used to play there when I was a boy," I said. "The bunkers in the woods were especially fascinating. Just the fact that they were there! This was the late seventies. The war had only been over for thirty years or so."

It was windier here in the open, but the waves that lapped the shore were low and lethargic. The cattle had begun to graze again. There were cowpats deposited everywhere they had been, some soft and mushy, others dry and shriveled.

"We've got something of a rarity over there," said Thomas. He gestured toward a small pond in a boggy area of reeds and moss, sheltered from the sea behind a rise in the landscape.

"And what's that?" I asked.

"You see the pond there?"

I nodded.

"There's a species of toad in it not found anywhere else in Sweden. It lives right here. In that little pond."

"Really?"

"Yes. They've got a few in Finland too, apparently. The European fire-bellied toad, it's called. If we're lucky we might be able to hear them. Their call sounds like little bells. I heard a program on the radio once where they recorded the ones here and compared them to the Finnish ones. Let's go see if we can hear them."

We trudged over to the edge of the pond. There wasn't a sound to be heard apart from the wind buffeting our ears and the gentle rush of the sea.

"No," he said. "Sometimes they're just quiet. They're in decline too. In the old days, not so long ago actually, this whole area was underwater. Then the houses got built, and the water has retreated since then."

"How come they only live here?"

"No idea. It seems they used to be found in a number of other spots as well, then they started to die out, apart from here. I suppose the conditions here must have suited them particularly well."

"How strange."

"Yes. A shame you didn't get to hear them! The sound they make really is rather special."

We walked on to what had once been a little fishing village, now a summer retreat. All the old cottages had been done up, the gardens meticulously kept, shiny new cars in the driveways. We followed the road that ran between them, and after a short while we were sitting once more in the little back garden we had left an hour before. Thomas got some more coffee going, Marie was preparing lunch.

Shortly after, as we enjoyed our omelettes with fried potatoes, bread, and beer, we talked about Jon Fosse. Marie translated his plays into Swedish and had just finished one that was to run at Stockholm's Royal Dramatic Theatre that autumn. Fosse is a writer who has gone from describing the world the way it appears, the social-realist nightmares of small, unapproachable states-of-affairs in his early novels, brimming with neuroses and panic, to describing the world the way it is in essence, dark and open. From the world the way it can be inside the individual, to the world as it is between us, this is the line of development in Fosse's work. The turning toward God and the divine follows on from that. Anyone investigating the conditions of our existence must sooner or later investigate that too. The human domain has both outer and inner boundaries, in the space between them lies our culture, which is what makes us visible to ourselves. In Fosse's work it is subdued and almost indefinite, open to outside forces, the wind and darkness, which seem to rise and fall in the people he writes about. In that respect there is something premodern about them, in that all the things with which we fill our time, newspapers and TV programs, the vortex of politics, news, gossip, and celebrities that make up the world we live in, or mine at least, are something Fosse's characters stand outside. The simplicity of his later work prompts some to speak of minimalism, its darkness eliciting comparisons with Beckett, but there is nothing minimalistic about Fosse's work, rather it is essentialistic, and not in any way Beckett-like, Beckett being hard, ironic, without hope, his darkness is cold and filled out by laughter, whereas Fosse's darkness is warm, comforting, without laughter. Perhaps because he has come to that point from within, rather than going the other way like Beckett?

I could express nothing of this to Thomas and Marie because, as with most of the books I read and the art I look at, I relate to such things through something other than thoughts. Fosse is like this, Beckett like that, I know that, but then it stops there.

"How's it going with your uncle?" Thomas asked. "Is he still angry? Last time we talked you said he was taking you to court."

"Nothing's happened yet," I answered. "The book's at the printers, so if there's going to be a court case it'll be after it comes out. He's threatened to go to the papers as well. That's what I'm most afraid of, in a way. That they get hold of a story."

"But if he doesn't want anyone to read what you've written, then that wouldn't be the best way of going about it. It wouldn't be rational," said Marie, lifting her fork to her mouth.

"True, but rational doesn't come into it."

I pushed my plate away and leaned back.

"Thanks," I said. "That was delicious!"

I needed a cigarette but held off until they had finished eating.

Thomas looked up at me.

"Smoke, if you want," he said.

"Thanks," I said. I lit up and gazed out at the dark blue ribbon of sea above the green hedge, the way it glittered on the horizon, where the sunlight erased everything like a bomb, and the sky, lighter in color because of the haze, rose up.

It was such a fine day.

They started to clear the table, I left my cigarette in the ashtray and gave them a hand, putting the plates on the counter next to Marie, who began to rinse them in the sink. She was pushing sixty but came across a lot younger, the way so many writers do; only now and then, in the briefest of glimpses, did her true age become visible in her face. The impression of the face and the face itself are two different things, interwoven, a bit like those drawings that look like one thing if you look at the shading and another if you look at the other parts, perhaps, apart from the fact that a face is so much more complex. Not only does it change from hour to hour depending on the moods that ebb and flow behind and all around it, but also from year to year depending on the kind of relationship you have to it. My mother's face, for instance, appears mostly unchanged to me, what I see is "Mom," the way she has always been, but then she can turn her head slightly in a certain way and all of a sudden, like a shock, I see that she has become elderly now, a woman approaching seventy with perhaps no more than ten years left to live. Then she can turn again and say something, and once more all I see is "Mom."

I sat down again outside. The cigarette was still burning, I put it between my lips and sucked so hard it made the filter hot. I looked up at the sky, then at Thomas as he came out with the box of raspberries in his hand.

"We used to hear nightingales here," he said, sitting down at the other side of the table. "Not that many years ago either."

"What happened?" I asked.

He shrugged.

"They just vanished."

Driving home an hour later, the sun hanging low over Denmark on the other side of the strait, I thought about those vanished nightingales. It was the perfect beginning for the novel I was going to write when My Struggle was finished. An elderly man, full of years, potters about in his garden on the Swedish island of Gotland, reads in the shade, goes for long walks in the woods or along the endless beaches, retires early to bed in the evenings. It's summer, the sun beats down in the day, the vegetation is dry and scorched, and he'd is all alone with not a living soul for company. He thinks about a conversation he had more than thirty years before, sitting in the sun at a cottage on the Öresund coast, during which his friend Thomas, long since dead like so many of his friends are, told him the nightingales had vanished. It was the first he'd heard of it. Not long after, he saw a TV documentary about bees vanishing in the United States. From one day to the next they were gone, no one knew where, whether they had found some new place to go or simply died out. One Sunday, out with his family in the great beech woods outside the town where he lived at the time, they had seen hundreds of dead bats scattered everywhere on the ground. The newspapers carried reports of similar occurrences, flocks of birds falling from the skies, huge shoals of fish floating dead in the sea. Something was happening in the world and no one knew what. The fish, could it have been a volcanic eruption under the sea, gases rising and killing them off? Or was it caused by man? The birds, was some sickness running rampant among them? But then why would they fall down at the same time? Was it some kind of stress? The wild salmon disappeared, some suggested farmed salmon were to blame. Certain species of butterfly vanished – had there been a change in the environment so rapid that they had been unable to adapt? And then, in the space of a couple of summers, the great bird colonies stopped coming to their nesting grounds along the coast to the north. This time no one could even hazard a guess as to the reason why.

Every night before he goes to bed he writes a few pages in a notebook, mostly for his own sake, his days out there on the island being so alike that without his notes everything would merge seamlessly into one. He notes down the things he does, the way he feels, what he sees, and now and then events from his past life, which in that way emerges unsystematically.

That was the idea I had, and I elaborated on it in my mind as I headed south. In order to have the afternoon to myself I had taken the morning shift with the children, fed and dressed them and got them off to the nursery, and it was with that thought in mind that I had driven up to Thomas and Marie's when I did, it would give me some time left over to spend sitting at a café in Helsingborg. I took a left, passing at first through a semi-industrial area that gradually transformed into detached residences followed by long rows of linked houses on both sides of the road, eventually going down a steep hill, at the bottom of which was the town center, the harbor glittering in the light of the low-hanging sun.

I had been there once before with Linda and the children, it had been our first trip after I passed my driving test. Being a registered bad debtor, I was unable to borrow money or even rent a car in Sweden, so Linda had made the reservation in her name, it was a bulky, unmanageable vehicle which looked like a minibus. We came crawling into the town, my heart thumping in my chest, it was all I could do to steer properly, but at the same time I felt buoyant, driving gave me an immense feeling of freedom, as though being motorized solved all my many problems. Now I knew there were parking spaces at the far end of the expansive quayside area and I drove slowly in that direction.

An enormous cruise liner lay at anchor off the pier. It looked like it could carry several thousand passengers. I locked the car and ambled off. On the other side of the strait, surprisingly close, was what I realized must be the castle at Elsinore. The thought that I was looking at Hamlet's home made my spine tingle. I tried to eliminate everything that had since appeared in the world in the way of cars, boats, and buildings, to see only the castle in the landscape, to think of how enormous the distances were at that time, how little space people occupied within the world, how vast the gaps between them, and gazed across at the place where the young prince, broken with despair at the death of his father, seemingly at the hands of his uncle, had perhaps lain on his back in bed, staring up at the ceiling, tortured by the colossal meaninglessness that had come between himself and all things, his friends Rosencrantz and Guildenstern, seated on a bench in the courtyard, casting their long shadows across the cobbles, drunk on light and boredom.

I stood there staring toward the castle for a moment before turning and walking along the quayside toward the town. Here and there, tourists were leaning over the railing, peering down at the cool blue of the water. Maybe there were fish swimming around, or maybe it was the deep itself that fascinated them.

The town center was situated at the foot of a steep ridge; this was the only town in Skåne I had seen with hills and rises like this. It gave a completely different sense of space. I entered the pedestrian street, at the bottom of which was a park; there, beneath tall, shady deciduous trees, I spotted a pavilion, and a few minutes later I was able to sit down and order a coffee. The other people at the tables were speaking English with American accents, they must have come from the cruise liner.

I looked up at the treetops. The leaves were not yellow, but their green was not quite as fat and pastose as it had been in summer, it was drier now, and paler. All around me the sounds of the town swirled in the air. Tires rolling against asphalt, a rumble of car engines, footsteps, voices, laughter.

Hamlet was written at the close of the sixteenth century. The earliest edition still in existence is from 1603. A few years ago I would have thought of that as being a long time ago. I didn't any longer. The seventeenth century was only a few generations away. Goethe, for instance, must have run into people who had been born in the seventeenth century. To Hamsun, Goethe would have been someone who died a generation before he was born. And to me, Hamsun was someone who died a generation before I was born.

No, the seventeenth century wasn't long ago at all.

A waitress in a black apron crossed the road carrying a tray. The café itself was housed in a building on the other side. She skipped up the two steps to the pavilion, halted, and placed a cup of coffee, a small jug of milk, and a thin paper sachet of sugar on the table in front of me. I handed her thirty kronor and told her to keep the change, det var greit. She didn't understand and began to rummage in her apron for coins. I held up my hand and said it didn't matter. Tack, she said, and wheeled away.

The coffee tasted bitter, it must have been standing for ages. It wasn't what people were drinking in the hot weather.

I lit a smoke and looked out at the rooftops across the way, a zinc-clad chimney reflecting the glare of the sun, though without its movement, making the light seem like it was emitted by the zinc itself, an inexhaustible source. The gray-black slating that surrounded it, the fire escapes disappearing down into the backyards on the other side.

Everyone's life contained a horizon, the horizon of death, and it lay somewhere between the second and third generations before us, and the second and third generations after us. We, and those we lived with and loved, existed between those two lines. Outside were the others, the dead and the unborn. There, life was a chasm without us. That was why a figure like Hamlet could be so important. He was a work of fiction, someone had made him up, given him thoughts and actions and a space in which to act, but the point was that fiction was no longer a valid dividing line, a valid distinction, the moment one stepped beyond the horizon of death. Hamlet was neither more nor less living than the historical figures who had once occupied the earth; in a certain sense anyone from then was fictional. Or, since Hamlet was made of words and ideas, the others of flesh and bone, was it only he and his life form that could overcome time and mortality?

Does he rise now in his chilly chamber? Does he climb the narrow steps out onto the roof, to the parapets? What then does he see? The blue waters of the Öresund, the green land on the other side, the low-lying expanses stretching away and beyond. What thoughts does he have? Shakespeare told us. The earth appears to Hamlet as a sterile promontory. The air, this most excellent canopy, this brave o'erhanging firmament, this majestical roof fretted with golden fire, as he describes it to his two friends Rosencrantz and Guildenstern, is to him but a foul and pestilent congregation of vapors, man but a quintessence of dust. This was what he saw over there at the castle. The English word vapor is the same one as was used of the darkened mind, and the space that opens out there, between the mind's and the world's darkening, appears like an abyss.

I took my mobile out of my jacket and pressed Linda's number. She answered right away.

"Everything all right?" I asked.

"Fine," she said. "We're in the park. The weather's gorgeous! Heidi refused to walk, but we worked it out. When will you be home?"

"Soon. I'm in Helsingborg. It'll take less than an hour from here, I suppose. There's the car to take back, though, and then I'll have to walk. Do you want me to get some things on the way?"

"No, I think we've got everything."

"OK," I said. "See you. Take care."

"Bye," she said, and we hung up.

I sat for a while with the phone in my hand and gazed up the road. Two women wearing skirts and sandals and carrying bags made of some lightweight material came walking along the sidewalk. Behind them a man on a bike, a child squeezed into the kid's seat against his back. Both had helmets on, the man wore glasses and a suit. I thought about Heidi and smiled. She invariably wanted to be carried. If it was up to her she would never walk a single step. She had always been like that, right from the start. I was so close to her then, after she was born. Vanja was jealous and claimed Linda's attention as much as she could, while I carried Heidi around until she was eighteen months and John came along. It stopped then, our closeness to each other. Every now and again I felt a twinge of sadness about it. But that was how kids were, everything came in phases, and phases came to an end. Before long they would be grown up, and the children they used to be, whom I had loved, would be gone. Even seeing photos of them from as recently as a year before could make me feel sadness at the fact that the children they were then no longer existed. But mostly they took up so much of our lives now and whirled up our days with such intensity there was no room left for such feelings. It was all here and now with them.

Not without relief, I dropped the car key through the mailbox of Europcar an hour later; that both I and the car were still in one piece after a long day on the roads was by no means to be taken for granted. The sun shone against the tall black spire of Saint Peter's church above me, while the street beneath my feet was shadowy and cold as I walked along. I went as fast as I could, feeling guilty as always about being away from the family, or rather about leaving

Linda to deal with the children on her own. I couldn't help it. I strode on, past the Hansa arcade, past Hi-Fi Klubben and Orvars Korvar, the hot-dog joint, before crossing over to the canal that ran through the little park, past Granit and Designtorget, across the bridge and onto the pedestrian street at the end of which towered the yellow-white Hilton hotel. The streets were busy, the tables outside both cafés were full, young girls chatting in pairs or small groups, some teenagers being boisterous, and a couple of men my own age, rather more subdued in body language and dress. All sat soaking up this unexpected summer's day. I felt calm and excitement at the same time; it felt good, but underneath was anxiety.

Our apartment was on the little square across the road from the Hilton. A steady flow of people from early morning to late evening passed our entrance door, which was tucked in between a Søstrene Grene store and a Chinese takeaway. On the square itself there was a fountain, the trickling sounds of which went on through the night, and a big octagonal fast-food stand that blared out soulful pop and eighties' hits to its customers, mostly people from outside town, who sat at the tables stuffing themselves with grilled sausages and hamburgers, with bulging carrier bags at their feet. The benches a bit farther away were occupied by homeless people. Ours was the top apartment, on the sixth floor, with a balcony running its whole width at the front. Once, Vanja threw a lighter over the railing, and it had hit the ground and exploded, just missing a couple of passersby who leaped into the air and glared up at us while I waved my hands in apology, trying to tell them it was an accident and hoping they weren't going to get angry.

I glanced up at the railing, so high above the sidewalk, and got my keys out of my pocket. This involved another memory, for tucked in behind the plastic window tag attached to the key ring was a photo of Vanja and me, the two of us together on a boat, we were on our way to look at dolphins on the Canary Islands, she no more than three years old, holding my hand and wearing a white hat and a look of anticipation. I tapped the orange key card against the panel next to the door, there was a click, I pushed the door open and went inside, pressed the button for the elevator, and checked my phone while I waited. No calls, but I knew that already. The only people who would call my cell were Yngve, Mom, Tore, Espen, and Geir Angell. Each followed their own pattern, and none of them was due to call just yet. I spoke to Yngve and Mom about once a week, Mom on a Sunday evening usually. Espen I spoke to about once every couple of weeks, Tore maybe once a month. With Geir it was about twice a day. That was pretty much my social life outside the family. But it was enough, and it was how I wanted it.

The elevator arrived, I stepped inside and pushed the top button, studying myself in the mirror as I slid slowly upward through the dark and narrow shaft that ran through the middle of the building. My hair had grown long over the summer and I now had a beard of sorts. My beard growth had never been impressive, the cheeks always seemed to remain bare, so every time I looked at myself in the mirror I kept wondering if it looked stupid or not. It was hard, if not impossible, to decide, there being no obvious criteria to apply. If I asked Linda she would just say it looked fine. Did she mean it? Impossible to tell. And obviously I couldn't ask anyone else about so intimate and vain a matter. So a couple of weeks earlier I'd shaved it off. When I showed up at the nursery the next day, Ola, the only other person there of my age, father of Benjamin, Vanja's current best friend, and a head of faculty at Malmö's university, had stared at me and asked if there was something different. Hadn't I had some facial hair or something? He was being funny, not referring to it as a beard, and it made me think shaving it off had been the right decision. But then, on the Friday, I picked up some of the photos we'd taken that summer. I sat with Vanja, Heidi, and John at the café at Triangeln where we went every Friday after nursery, they had ice cream while I sat with a coffee, and we looked through the photos together. One was of me standing on a beach over in Österlen with John on my arm. I looked unusually good, I thought to myself, there was something about the beard and the sunglasses that made me seem . . . well, so masculine. And with John on my arm to complete the picture, I looked like . . . well, dammit, yes, like a dad.

There and then I had decided to grow the beard back. Only now, on my way up between floors, I wasn't so sure. I was going to Oslo the next day to do interviews for the launch of the first book. This forced me into considerations about shirts, jackets, trousers, shoes, hair, and now beard. For the past few years I hadn't been bothered about that sort of thing, hardly giving a thought to the clothes I wore, simply grabbing something to put on if I happened to be going out, which was basically only when I was taking the children to nursery or picking them up again, or if we went out somewhere with them on the weekend. I was living in a city where I knew only a handful of people and didn't care much about what they might think. This gave me a sense of freedom and allowed me to run around in baggy old pants and big grubby coats, awful woolly hats, and sneakers, but now, from the end of summer on, with publication approaching and my first interviews in five years having all been arranged, it was a different situation altogether.

I turned automatically as the elevator approached the sixth floor, after three years I knew exactly how long it took to ascend, stepped out onto the landing with its clutter of kids' stuff – two strollers, toddler roller, Vanja's scooter, and Heidi's bike with training wheels – and opened the door of the apartment.

Coats and shoes dumped on the floor, toys strewn all over, TV sounds from the living room.

I took my jacket and shoes off and went inside. Heidi and Vanja were snuggled up close in one chair, staring at the TV. John, standing in the middle of the floor in his diaper with a toy car in his hands, looked up at me. Linda was sitting on the sofa reading the newspaper.

The rug was bunched up, cuddly toys lay thrown about the entire room, as well as a number of books and plastic toys, felt pens and sheets of paper they had been drawing on.

"How did it go, all right?" Linda asked.

"Yes, fine," I said. "Nearly bashed the car when I was getting gas. You know, that cramped underground place. Apart from that, fine. Thomas and Marie say hello."

"Did you give her my mansucript?"

I nodded.

"How are we doing, girls?" I asked.

No reaction. Their little blond heads were motionless as they stared at the TV. In the same chair: apparently they were getting along today.

I smiled, they were even holding hands.

"Daddy basement?" said John.

"No," I replied. "Daddy's been driving a car today."

"Daddy go to basement!" he said.

"Are you hungry?" Linda asked. "There's some leftovers out there."

"OK," I said, and went out into the kitchen. The dishes were still on the table, the girls' plates almost untouched, they hardly ever ate at dinner, never had. To begin with, Linda and I had argued about it, I wanted discipline when it came to meals and felt they should sit at the table until they had eaten up, whereas Linda held the opposite opinion, that when it came to food everything should be as free as possible, with no compulsion. What she said had seemed right to me, it sounded awful to talk about forcing them to eat, so ever since then we had let them do as they wanted. Whenever we came home from the nursery and they started going on about being hungry they had a slice of bread, an apple, some meatballs, or whatever was left over, and when dinner was ready and on the table they could sit there for as long as they felt like. Usually, that was no more than a few minutes during which they prodded a bit and took a few small mouthfuls before sliding off their chairs and toddling off into the living room or their own rooms, leaving Linda and me to eat at opposite sides of the table.

I piled up a plate with macaroni and meatballs, Sweden's national dish, cut a tomato into bite-sized wedges, squirted some ketchup over it all, and sat down. The first year we lived in Malmö I talked about it with one of the other dads from the nursery. How did they cope at mealtimes? They never had any trouble at all, he said. She always sat nicely at the table and cleaned her plate. How on earth did they manage that, I wanted to know, biking up alongside him on our way out to Limhamnsfältet to play football as we did every Sunday morning. She knows she has no choice, he said. How does she know that? I asked. We broke her will, he said. She sits there until she's finished, it doesn't matter how long it takes. One time she sat there until late. Sobbing, and shouting all sorts of things at us. Wouldn't touch a thing. But after a long while it sank in, she ate up and could leave the table. Three hours, I think it took! Since then there's hardly been an issue. He looked at me and beamed. Did he realize what he was telling me about himself, I wondered, but said nothing. It's the same whenever she throws a tantrum, he went on. I've noticed Vanja gives you a bit of trouble every now and again. Yes, she does, I said. How do you tackle that? I hold her still in a firm grip, he said. No drama, just hold her still until it passes. It doesn't matter how long it takes. You should try it, it works like a dream. Yes, I said, I certainly need to think of something.

The odd thing about that conversation, I thought to myself as I spooned the barely warm food into my mouth, was that I had gauged him – or rather both parents – to be alternative, meaning soft. He carried the youngest around in a sling, the way dads like him were supposed to, and on a trip we were on with the nursery I had overheard him talking about the advantages of it as opposed to a BabyBjörn baby carrier. They were more than ordinarily concerned that food should be healthy and additive-free, their kids' clothes were as far as possible made of natural fiber, and they were among the most active at parent meetings. So the fact that such uncompromisingly Victorian parenting methods should suddenly be revealed in their case came as a surprise to me. Or maybe it completed my understanding. I had always wondered how come their eldest daughter, who often played with Vanja, was always so reasonable and cooperative. She never spent a second in her stroller and walked everywhere they went, as opposed to Vanja, who could start pestering me to get in behind Heidi as soon as we were more than a few meters away from the nursery gate.

There had been occasions every now and then when I'd seen no alternative but to break her will, and of course eventually I had succeeded, but never without feeling awful afterward. It couldn't be right, surely. On the other hand it was good for her to sit and eat with us, good for her to walk, good for her to get dressed herself, good for her to brush her teeth and go to bed at a resonable hour.

Once, Vanja had been at their place, it was her first ever sleepover. I went to pick her up the next day, they said everything had gone fine, but I could tell from Vanja, who kept wanting to be as close to me as possible, that it hadn't been quite without problems. There had been a minor episode, he said, but we sorted it out no trouble, didn't we, Vanja? What happened, I asked. Well, she asked for more dinner, but then after we'd given her some she wouldn't eat it. So she had to sit there until she until she did.

I stared at him.

Was he mad?

No, he was already rummaging around to find her socks for me and I said nothing, even though I was furious. Who did he think he was, assuming he had the right to force my child to adhere to his ideas? I took the socks he handed me, helping Vanja put them on as she stretched out first one foot then the other, before giving her her coat, hoping and praying she was going to put it on herself so I wouldn't have to do it for her under his critical gaze.

Linda was enraged when I told her what had happened. By then I had changed my mind about it, it wasn't that bad, besides it was probably good for her to see that different people had different rules.

"That's not the point," Linda said. "They're criticizing us, aren't they? How dare they. Who do they think they are? You should hear how smug she is. You wouldn't believe it."

"They invited Vanja to do a fun run with them in the woods, I forgot to mention it," I said. "It's next weekend, in the Pildammsparken."

It was the sort of activity we never would have got involved in on our own. Vanja was excited at the prospect. She'd get to stand behind a starting line with a number pinned to her chest, and to run with a lot of other kids along a path through the woods, and when she crossed the finish line she would get a medal and an ice cream.

It fell to me to take her to the start, along with her friend from the nursery and her friend's mother, while Linda looked after Heidi around the finish line. Vanja was proud of her number, and as soon as the starter shouted Go! she took off as fast as her little legs could carry her. I trotted along beside her under the trees, with all the other moms and dads. But after a hundred meters or so she slowed down, then came to a complete standstill. I can't, she said. Her friend and her friend's mother were of course well ahead of us by then. They stopped, turned around, and waited. Come on, Vanja, I said. They're waiting for us! Let's run! And so we ran, Vanja in that wobbling way of hers, me loping along like an elk; we caught up with them and we all ran side by side, until her friend and her friend's mother once more began to edge ahead of us and we again fell behind. She ran like the wind, that girl. Vanja panted heavily at my side and came to a halt. Can't we walk a bit, Daddy, she asked. Yes, of course we can, I said. Just for a little bit though. They waited patiently for us until we caught up with them again, and we forged on together for another hundred meters perhaps, before the gap between us opened up again. Come on, Vanja, I said. Not far to go now. You can do it! And Vanja gritted her teeth and ran on, maybe it was the finish line that lay ahead and the ice cream she knew would be waiting for her that gave her renewed energy. Her friend was about twenty meters in front of us, she was a good runner with a light and effortless step, and if it hadn't been for us she would have been over the finish line well before. She turned and waved to Vanja, but then as she turned again she stumbled and fell headlong onto the path, where she sat clutching her knee and sobbing. Her mother stopped and bent over her. We were approaching now, and as we came up to them, Vanja was about to stop too. Come on, Vanja! I said. You're almost at the finish! Run as fast as you can! And Vanja heard me and ran as fast as she could, past her friend, whose knee was grazed and bleeding, with me alongside her, past child after child she ran, as fast as the wind and over the finish line!

Behind us her friend got to her feet and limped on. An official hung a medal around Vanja's neck, another handed her an ice cream. I won, Mommy! she shouted out to Linda, who came smiling toward us pushing the pram, with Heidi at her side. Only then did I realize what I had done, and blushed like I'd never blushed before. We ran past her! So we could be first! While she, the little girl who had stopped and waited for us along the way, sat bleeding on the ground!

Back at the finish, it was now her turn to receive her medal and ice cream. Fortunately, it seemed there were no hard feelings on her part. Her father came toward us.

"Looked like you really wanted the win there!" he said with a laugh.

I blushed again, understanding that he didn't realize it was true. That he would never in his wildest fantasy think that a full-grown adult could behave in such a way. He was making a joke out of it precisely because it was unthinkable that I should have urged my daughter on so she could win over his daughter, and to have done so in such an unsportsmanlike way. They weren't even four years old yet.

The girl's mother came over and said the same thing. Both of them took it for granted that it was Vanja who had pressed on and that I hadn't been able to stop her. They could understand a four-year-old not being able to show empathy with a friend her own age. But the idea of a nearly forty-year-old man being equally incapable was naturally beyond their imagination.

I burned with shame as I laughed politely.

On the way home I told Linda what had happened. She laughed like she hadn't laughed for months.

"We won, that's the main thing!" I said.

Two years had passed since then. John had been only a month old, Heidi nearly two, Vanja three and a half. I remembered it so well because we had taken so many photos that day. John with his big baby head and narrow, wrinkly baby eyes, kicking his slender bare legs, waving his slender bare arms in the stroller. Heidi with her wide eyes, short little body, and fair hair. Vanja with her delicate features and her character's singular blend of sensitivity and fervor. Then as now I was unable to fully grasp the connection between us, mostly I looked upon them as three little people with whom I shared my home and life.

What they had, and what I had lost, was a great and shiningly obvious place in their own lives. I often thought about it, the way they woke up every morning to themselves and their world, which they would inhabit all through the day, taking everything as it came with no questions asked. When we were expecting Vanja, I had been worried my gloominess might rub off on her, I had even mentioned it to Yngve once, who had said that children are basically happy, it was their point of departure, and so it had turned out, always they strove toward gladness, and as long as no complications arose, they were forever happy and buoyant. Even when that wasn't the case and for some reason they were feeling sad, despairing, or upset, they never removed themselves from who they were, but accepted everything completely. One day they would look back and ask the same questions as me, why had things been the way they were then, why are they like this now, what exactly is the meaning of my life?

Oh, my children, my beloved children, may you never think such thoughts! May you always understand that you are sufficient to yourselves!

But most likely that won't happen. All generations live their lives as if they were the first, gathering experiences, progressing onward through the years, and as insights accumulate, meaning diminishes, or if it doesn't diminish, it at least becomes less self-evident. That's the way it is. The question is whether it has always been that way. In the Old Testament, where everything is expressed through action and the narratives are closely bound up with physical reality, and in the ancient Greek epics, where lives unfold in similarly concrete fashion, doubt never comes from within, as a condition of the individual's existence, but always from without, by some external occurrence, for instance a sudden death, and is thus bound up with the conditions of external, earthly life. The New Testament, however, is different. How might we otherwise explain the darkness in Jesus's soul that eventually drove him to Jerusalem, there to close door upon door until only the last and simplest remained? His final days can be interpreted as a way of eliminating all choices, so that responsibility for what was to happen, his slow death on the cross, would not be his, since he would be directed there, so to speak, by the will of others. The same thing occurs in Hamlet, his soul too is darkened, he too approaches his demise with open eyes, in such a way that it appears governed by fate and thereby inevitable. In the case of King Oedipus it is fate, he is genuinely oblivious, but for both Hamlet and Jesus it is a choice they make and a direction in which they choose to go. Oedipus is blind, Hamlet and Jesus see with open eyes into the darkness.

I got up, rinsed the plate, and put it in the dishwasher. We had been given the plate by the same couple when they were moving house and didn't need it anymore. They had actually helped us a lot. What had we done for them in return?

Not much. I always listened patiently to whatever they talked about, asking questions and making an effort to seem interested. I had introduced him to our Sunday football. And I had given him a signed copy of my previous novel inscribed with a dedication. Two days later he told me he had given it to an uncle "who was interested in books." But it was for you personally, for goodness' sake! I thought to myself, though I said nothing; if he hadn't grasped the fact on his own I wouldn't be able to explain it to him.

This was how it was having children, you found yourself thrown together with complete strangers, people who were sometimes impossible to understand. Once he told me he and his wife liked to talk in the evenings in such a way that I understood that their talking to each other was something out of the ordinary, impressive even. After that I would often make a point of suggesting to Linda that we should talk. It became a joke of ours. Most likely they had similar ones about us. Nevertheless we kept on seeing each other right up to the time they moved, me especially in fact; I spent countless afternoons with him at different playgrounds, listening to all his ideas about how the world and everything in it hung together while our kids were playing.

On one such occasion he had a book with him by someone called Wolfram, which he would leaf through. It seemed to be about certain recurring patterns, in everything from leaves to river deltas, and contained a lot of line graphs. My first association was to Thomas Browne and his seventeenth-century treatise on the quincunx figure, the pattern on the five side of a die and its occurrence in nature, then to something I had only just read, in the book Geir Angell was writing, about how all complicated systems – society, share markets, weather phenomena, traffic – sooner or later break down because of instabilities brought about by the systems themselves. I found this idea striking, since the patterns these breakdowns form are the same in artificial systems as they are in nature. The sky was blue, and as wide as it is only at the sea, and although the sun hung low the air was still warm. The play area with its sand and its meticulously designed play structure, so typical of Sweden, was surrounded by an area of trampled-down gravel with a broad though shallow paddling pond in the middle that some of the children kept throwing armfuls of leaves into. Beyond the gravel there was a lawn, and beyond that an area of houses. The green grass took on a sheen in the sunlight. I said it looked interesting, that patterns occurring in different fields could be so fundamentally alike. He nodded and started talking about evolution. He said the complicated organisms and complex systems all around us are in actual fact quite simple, and that this had to be understood in the light of the huge period of time in which they have developed. A million years, he said, is so much time we're incapable of grasping it. So try thinking of twenty million years. Or sixty million. But time in itself is simple. The principle of evolution is simple too. It's all about optimization, the best way of going about a matter. In other words, the most efficient. Everything in nature strives for efficiency. When the ice opens up, the crack travels by following the points of weakness. When glass breaks it's the same thing. The cracks follow the weakest points.

"But there's no will in it," I said. "It's pure mechanics. A law of nature."

"Law?" he replied. "Forget laws for a minute, they'll only distract you. What's important is what happens. A glass breaks at the point where it breaks most easily. A branch snaps at the point where it snaps most easily. It's the optimization that's the thing. Leaves need sunlight, yes, so they seek the most efficient way of getting some. If the branches have to lift them higher, then the branches will lift them higher. If you place obstacles in the path of ants, what happens at first is confusion, but the confusion is only temporary, because if you go back after a while you'll see that the ants are now following a new path which is the shortest route around the obstacles. They optimize. The ants don't know it's the shortest route, in the same way as ice is oblivious to the fact that it cracks along the path of least resistance."

He leaned forward, placing his hands on his knees, shaking his head slightly until his hair was the way he wanted it. His daughter was sitting on her haunches in front of the twenty-centimeter-high wooden fence that penned in the play area, lining up little stones along the top of it. The sun shimmered against her waterproof yellow trousers. Vanja was climbing on the red play train. On her knees, she turned and looked at me. The wind blew her hair in front of her face, she pushed it back, the wind blew it forward again. I waved to her and glanced around to see what Heidi was up to. There she was, sitting on the little bench inside the train. Her posture was exactly the same as his, bent forward with a hand on each knee. Little person, I thought to myself, something Linda would say so often about her. Then she got up and stuck her head out the window, and watched the other children as they carried their bundles of leaves to the pond from under the tree on the lawn.

I leaned back on the bench. Under the trees that lined the park some fifty meters away, a chunky woman came along pushing a bike at her side. The trees above her head swayed gently in the wind, filling the street below with shifting nuances of light and shade. On a balcony no bigger than a box or a cage, a few meters up on the front of one of the apartment buildings behind the trees, a man and a woman stood looking out, each with a glass in their hand. From the gateway below, two men appeared lugging a table between them. A third man, who had been waiting on the sidewalk, flicked a cigarette onto the ground, climbed into the back of the van that was parked there, then emerged again with a gray blanket bundled in his arms. In the blue sky above them a plane angled steeply upward, impossible to separate from the white trail it left behind.

The world is old, yet simple, I thought to myself, and everything in it stands open.

It was as if my soul lifted as the thought occurred to me. But then a yell went up from Heidi and my eyes darted in the direction of the play train. She was lying on her stomach in front of it with her face in the sand. I dashed across and picked her up, scanning her face for blood, but she had been lucky, it didn't look like she had been hurt at all. Three times that month she had fallen badly, twice banging her mouth hard, once on the edge of the table and once on the tabletop, there had been blood everywhere and we had had to take her first to accident and emergency then the dentist. For some time following these accidents she would put her hand to her mouth whenever she fell, it didn't matter where the hurt was coming from. This time, though, nothing had happened. I hugged her tight, she put her face to my chest and sobbed, but soon she lifted her head and began to look around her and I was able to put her down again. When I returned to the bench and sat down next to him he was immersed in his book. A sudden movement in the upper corner of my eye caused me to look up. It was a leaf falling to the ground. Or rather, not falling at all. It was twirling, round and round, like the rotor blades of a helicopter, descending gently through the air.

Thinking about this made me remember something I had read some months before, it was a passage in a Swedish book called Linjen that brought together a dialogue between Heidegger and Jünger in which the latter had written something about patterns that had made a deep impression on me at the time and melded into some other thoughts I had with such intensity and fervor that I had jotted it all down on one of the blank pages under the heading "The Third Realm" with the idea of it forming the basis of a new novel.

I couldn't remember what exactly I had written and so I went into the living room to look for the book again. Linda put her newspaper down as I came in.

"What time are you leaving tomorrow?" she asked.

"The flight's at seven," I said. "So about five-ish."

"Are you nervous?"

"A bit. It'll be worse tomorrow, though."

My eyes passed over the spines of the books on the shelves. The ones on the bottom shelf had all been shoved in, some so far they had vanished into the depths. It was John's doing, and I had long since stopped bothering to pull them out again after his ravages, he was only going to shove them back again, probably within a matter of hours. Let's have a look . . . H, H, H . . . there! Jünger/Heidegger, Linjen.

"Bath!" said Vanja.

"Speak in full sentences when you speak," I told her.

"Bath!" she said again, and looked at Linda.

"Can I," I insisted.

"Can I have a bath?" she said.

"Are you up to it?" Linda asked me.

"Yes, of course," I said. "But then will you put them to bed?"

She nodded.

"Wait just five minutes," I told Vanja, beginning to leaf through the pages of the book that was now in my hand. The passage in question wasn't from Jünger's text as I had thought, but from an entry in his diary quoted by Anders Olsson in his afterword.

> On our way back along the shore we discovered a bank of shells. None of the mussels and clams that had been washed up there was bigger than a bean, many were smaller than a pea – but what we saw was the universe itself, with its ovals, circles and spirals, in the space of perhaps a foot. Obelisks, Gothic and Roman arches, serrations, lances, tacks, crowns of thorns, olive trees, turkey wings, tooth marks, rakes, spiral staircases, kneecaps . . . And all shaped by waves.

"Bath now!" said Vanja.

"Are you a little baby tonight, or what?" I said.

"Bath!" said Vanja.

"Bath!" said John.

"Let me just look at this book, then we'll go and have a bath," I said. "Five minutes."

I leafed forward to the final, blank pages and read what I had written.

The body, the blood
the biological the clear, open the sacred the obscure

Animals that can be controlled
Albertus Seba
America, discovered, but left in peace

That was all.

The way I remembered this, it had been a detailed noting down of concrete ideas, a universe in which the novel would be set, but it was nothing other than the usual affinities I felt to certain words and the associations they awoke in me. "The body, the blood," "biology," "the atom bomb." And Lucretius's On the Nature of Things had been appearing in my notes ever since the midnineties.

But it was a novel. It was. A world described through the material and the mechanical, sand, stone, shells, atoms, planets. No psychology, no feelings.

A story that was different from ours, though similar. It was to be a dystopia, a novel about the final days, told by a man alone in a house, in the midst of a dry, warm landscape in late summer. And I had an ending ready, I had told it to Linda, who had lit up, it was sublime, amazing. It was!

"OK, do you want your baths now?" I said, returning the book to the shelf.

The girls slid down from their chairs and skipped off to the bathroom.

"Yes!" cried John, and toddled after them.

Even before I caught up with them, the girls had pulled off their clothes and were standing naked in front of the bath. I took the yellow Jif bottle from the shelf under the mirror, unscrewed the green top, and squirted the bottom of the bath with detergent.

"A shark!" said Heidi, peering over the edge. It was the shape made by the dribbles of detergent that fascinated her.

"Is that what you think it looks like?" I said.

She nodded.

"If a shark comes you have to hit it on the nose," said Vanja. "To scare it away."

She demonstrated what she meant, batting the air with her little fist. I wet a sponge under the tap in the sink and wiped the bath clean, then rinsed it with the showerhead, watching the water as it took with it the yellow detergent, which here and there dissolved in tiny clouds, pressed the rubber-edged metal plug into the drain, turned the mixer tap on, put my hand into the thick gush of water to gauge the temperature, and straightened up.

"OK," I said. "Everybody in!"

As Vanja and Heidi climbed into the bath I helped John off with his clothes. He stretched out an arm, his other hand was clutching a rubber duck. I took his arm out of the sleeve and he changed hands.

"That's right, John!" I said, and pulled the sweater over his head, tossing it in the direction of the laundry bin, from which our dirty clothes seemed to be advancing like a plant, unbuttoned his trousers, took them off, tore open the tape of his diaper and lifted him into the bath, where he immediately began splashing with both hands.

"I saw a witch today on the street, Daddy," said Heidi.

"It wasn't a witch," said Vanja. "It was an old lady."

"But what if she was a witch?" I said, crouching next to the tub.

"There's no such thing as witches," said Vanja.

"Are you sure about that?" I said.

She looked at me and smiled.

"Yes," she said. I could see part of her was going to say no.

"Imagine if I were a wizard," I said.

"You're just an ordinary daddy!" said Heidi.

I laughed and got to my feet. The water reached their tummies now. They loved bathtime, all three of them, and always had. I wondered why. Maybe it was the sudden switch from one element to another? Heidi gripped the side of the bath with both hands, then put her feet up on the other side to make a bridge. Look, Daddy! she cried, and let herself go with a splash, showering me with bathwater in the process.

"Stop that!" I said firmly. "You can hurt yourself! And look at me, I'm soaked!"

She laughed. John laughed too. Vanja made to repeat the stunt.

"No, you don't," I said.

"Just once!" she pleaded.

"OK, then," I said, and stepped back out of range. The splash was even bigger this time; the floor was awash.

They howled with laughter. When John decided to try I took his arm and held him back. No, no, I said. Yes, I want to, he said. No, I said. Yes, he said. Yes, I said. No, he said. And with that the danger was averted.

"C'mon, let's get your hair washed," I said.

"John first," said Vanja.

"OK," I said. "Did you hear that, John?"

"I won't," he said.

"Yes, you will," I replied, putting my hands on his shoulders and pressing him gently back into the water. At first he resisted, then when I kept pressing he wailed and started to squirm. I let go.

"All right," I said.

He shrieked. I took the shampoo bottle with the pictures from the Pixar film Cars on it that he had chosen himself in the supermarket and squirted the thick red liquid into my palm. When I'd finished washing their hair I ordered them to stand up, took three cloths off the pile on the shelf, put soap on them and washed all three of them between their legs. It felt like an assault, that was the thought that came to me every time. Imagine if someone came in and saw what I was doing, what would they think? A perverted father rubbing the crotches of his daughters? It was a thought only a man who had witnessed the incest hysteria of the eighties was capable of thinking, I knew that, but all the same it didn't help, the feeling was there and couldn't be ignored, and when they sat down again and I rinsed the cloths, wrung them and hung them over the radiator to dry, I was as relieved as ever that no one had come in and seen me.

"Pull the plug out, Vanja," I said.

"A bit longer, Daddy!" she pleaded.

I shook my head.

"It's way past bedtime already."

"Snälla, pappa," said Vanja. Please, Daddy.

"Snälla, pappa," said John.

"Not tonight," I told them. "Come on. If you won't, I'll do it myself."

Vanja sighed and pulled the plug out. The water began to subside around them. When she was younger, Vanja had been afraid of the little whirlpool at the drain, I understood she thought it was alive, and no sooner had I pulled the plug than she would clamber out of the tub as fast as she could, as if pursued by some terrible peril. Neither Heidi nor John had ever liked it much either.

I held my hand out to Vanja. She took it and climbed out. I dried her with a big bath towel, draping it over her shoulders before she ran off. I did the same with Heidi, relishing the feeling of drying them, the way they stood still and waited for me to finish, a bit like the way a horse will stand still to be groomed, I imagined. John sat down in the bath again, amusing himself with the plug, putting it back in the drain and pulling it out over and over again.

He protested as I lifted him up, kicking his legs like a reluctant cat, only then to stand still like his sisters when I put him down and toweled him dry.

I wiped the floor with his towel, hung it up on the rack above the bath and followed them into the living room, where Linda had got Heidi and Vanja into their pajamas. The big bath towels were two heaps on the floor.

"I'm just going to pop out to check my e-mail," I said. "OK?"

Earlier that summer our Internet had stopped working, maybe it was because we hadn't paid for it, or maybe there was some technical problem. Whatever the reason, I had solved the issue by conducting all my e-mail correspondence from an Internet café close to the square.

"Fine," she said. "I was thinking we might need something for breakfast in the morning. Maybe you could get something while you're out? Milk, perhaps. And some bread."

"I wasn't thinking of shopping," I said.

"OK. Don't, then," she said.

"No, it's all right," I said. "It's not a problem. Milk and bread."

The air outside on the square had a nip about it and I zipped up my jacket before going over toward the Internet café a bit farther up the street on the other side of the road. I went there at least twice a day, there was a lot going on at the moment, with manuscripts flying backwards and forwards between me and the publishers, and furthermore I had sent a copy to all the people I had written about, and responses were coming in all the time. The first book was all finished and would be back from the printers in two days. The second book was in its final stages, now it was to be edited, then proofed, and everyone I had written about would be given a chance to read it. The mere thought made me feel like I was burning up inside. Despair, guilt, and anxiety were the emotions that flared, and the only way I could keep them at bay was by the thought that as yet no one knew, nothing had happened, but it helped less and less, the day was approaching when I would have to give up the manuscript to Linda and she would begin to read what I had written about our life together. The only thing she knew was that I had written about us. She had no idea what or in what way. She had said that I had to include all the fluctuations and not keep anything back, that the worst thing that could happen was for me to portray her as dull, dreary, weak, what in Swedish she called a mes, and every time I said I was dreading her reading it she would reassure me and tell me everything was bound to be fine. There's nothing to be afraid of, she said. I can handle whatever, as long as it's true. But Linda was a romantic at heart, she accepted the despondencies and conflicts of day-to-day life as long as the idea prevailed of there always being something else to fall back on, our love for each other, our lives together. In the space of only a few minutes she could go from shouting her head off at me to declaring that she had never loved anyone the way she loved me, whereas I was completely the opposite, storing up and accumulating grievances and frustrations, which then lay like a sediment inside me, fossils of emotions, darkening my mind increasingly until eventually I became as hard as stone, unreceptive to reconciliation and tenderness. I had written about this and had no way of knowing if she could forgive me for it, since it was from that perspective she was being seen.

Why had I written such things?

I had been so despairing. It was as if I had been shut away inside myself, alone with my frustration, a dark and monstrous demon, which at some point had grown enormous, as if there was no way out. Ever-decreasing circles. Greater and greater darkness. Not the existential kind of darkness that was all about life and death, overarching happiness or overarching grief, but the smaller kind, the shadow on the soul, the ordinary man's private little hell, so inconsequential as to barely deserve mention, while at the same time engulfing everything.

If I was going to write about it I would have to tell the truth. Linda agreed with me on that. But she didn't know the nature of that truth. It was one thing having an idea what her husband was thinking in his darkest moods, but quite another to read about it in a novel. And our life together was what the novel was all about. Her life, Linda's, and mine, Karl Ove's. It was what we had – in fact, it was all we had.

Oh, I was so completely in the shit. To have to hand her the manuscript and say, here, read this, it's being published in a month.

I stopped at the crossing and waited for green. The big shopping mall next to the hotel had just closed; at this time of day there were fewer people about, apart from at McDonald's and Burger King, where groups of young people, mostly immigrants, hung around outside. Many of the city's immigrants hailed from Iran, thereby belonging to the people once known as Persian, an army of whom under Xerxes had invaded Greece almost exactly twenty-five hundred years before.

Only a few weeks previously I had read a novel by Eyvind Johnson, Molnen över Metapontion – The Clouds over Metapontion – published in 1957. It was one of the purest works of modernism I had read, certainly from that part of modernism that had been interested in the classical age, such as Ezra Pound's The Cantos, Hermann Broch's The Death of Virgil, and James Joyce's Ulysses, or, for that matter, Paal Brekke's Roerne fra Itaka – The Oarsmen of Ithaca. Like all these works, Johnson's opened up a space between the then of the ancient classics and the now of the moderns, though it was perhaps even more concerned than they were with the time that lay in between. The novel began in southern Italy just after the war, and what went on in it there at that time, which to a large extent revolved around a Swedish writer's journey in the footsteps of a French archaeologist he had encountered in a German concentration camp, alternated with events that had taken place in the same landscape four hundred years before Christ. A landed estate, an estate owner, his slaves, one of whom escapes and gets caught up in a military invasion cutting deep into Asia, all described in the minutest detail. Particularly lucid and exciting were the author's portrayals of the passage of such huge numbers of men through increasingly foreign land, from the coasts of the Mediterranean to as far as Babylon. But the most foreign thing about the book for me wasn't the history of the ancient military campaign or the slave quarters, which were so far away in time that the reader couldn't help but sense the author's efforts to make them come alive, but rather the Italian village of 1947. The landscape is barren and without event, such occurrences as take place being small and almost indiscernible, and while I knew that another kind of writer, a Latin, say, like García Márquez, Vargas Llosa, Cela or, why not, Cervantes, would have been able to bring forth the exact same landscape with a patent and natural intensity, the people who populated it quivering with love and longing in such a way that we would not have doubted that the place in which we found ourselves was the center of the world, Johnson's very distance to what he describes, his remoteness to his characters, their work and their emotional lives, is crucial in respect to what perhaps was the focus of his efforts, the chasm of time that separates us from ancient history and the sense of meaninglessness that arises on that account. Nothing happens here, people are mere guests in a landscape that is like the seabed in an ocean of time. Occasionally, a tension occurs, for instance the war two years previously, whose truth, however, is no different, a fact that becomes apparent in the passages depicting the ancient military campaign, devoid of any suggestion of greatness, heroism, or historical momentousness, continually deconstructed into its individual parts, a creaking wheel of oak, dust kicked up by horses' hooves, the individual's dreams of riches, the individual's denigration of defeat and flight. But this is a novel, a program. What isn't a program is the depiction of postwar Italy, since it is affected to such a great extent by a mood that is already alien to us but to which the novel is proximate and conversant with, unlike Antiquity. When I read the book, the Italy of 1947 in fact felt more foreign to me than the Italy of the centuries before Christ, presumably because the latter was based on literature I knew, whereas the former was based on nothing other than life as it occurred at that time and which is barely to be found anywhere else than here. We are so endlessly far away from it, and yet our parents and grandparents were alive then. No era can surely have undergone such radical transformation as our own, the second half of the twentieth century has so little in common with the first, it seems as if they occurred in different worlds entirely.

My eyes found the steps leading down to the Internet café. A new rush of anxiety surged inside me. For a month now I had been receiving the most abhorrent e-mails because of the novel I had written, and I knew there would be more, though not where they would be coming from. It was the same with the phone; every time it rang I froze. True, it had been that way ever since the night I had been called by a person demanding to speak to the rapist Karl Ove Knausgaard, but that was seven years ago and the alarm I had felt at the time had paled together with the recollection; with the book it all came back with renewed force, what I had written had to do with other people, their reactions were beyond my control, and what I had done to them, they could do to me, I knew that; everything I had ever done could be used against me. As long as it was private, as long as it stayed between them and me, I could handle it. But it was terrible, I was crippled with fear every time I checked my e-mail, every time the phone rang, so much so that I could hardly move, would sit paralyzed in a chair or lie paralyzed in bed for hours at a time, and yet I knew it would pass, sooner or later I would have battled my way through it and would be able to see things in their true proportions. But if it got out . . . If someone went to the papers . . . I knew I wouldn't be able to cope.

The light changed from red to green, I crossed over, and the wind blew my hair into my eyes; I swept it back, folding it behind my ear, a motion of the hand that I knew looked feminine but nevertheless had to be done, hurried over the road, descended the three steps that led down to the Internet café, pushed the door open, and went in. The place was almost completely dark inside apart from the glow of computer screens in a row along the walls, most of them taken up by youths absorbed in games. They shouted out to each other as they played, presumably it was the same game, nearly always soldiers on a mission into some hostile world, whether it was a city, a deserted factory area, a desert landscape, or a forest.

The guy at the first station turned his head.

"Tjena!" he said. "Where have you been all day, writer? We've been waiting for you!"

"Hello," I said. "Have you got a computer for me?"

"Nineteen's for you."

"Thanks," I said, then went and found number nineteen, pulled out the chair, and sat down.

I opened the browser and typed in my WebMail address. During the few seconds it took for the page to open, I held my breath. Then the column of names appeared before my eyes, the unopened messages in bolder script, and I took them in at a single glance.

Nothing bad.

An inquiry from a TV program, one from a bookshop in a shopping center in Sørland, one from a bookshop in Oslo, and one from a folk high school in mid-Norway. I wrote to Silje at the publishers, who had passed the messages on to me, asking her to decline the invitations politely. She had also sent me a change in my itinery for the following day, Aftenposten had pulled out, and Bergens Tidende was sending a different journalist than originally announced, so my schedule now looked like this:

The schedule was much the same as when my previous novel A Time for Everything had come out five years before. Lumping everything together meant I didn't have to spend more than a single day on the media. Dagbladet and Dagens Næringsliv had interviewed me in Malmö a few days previously, Aftenposten had pulled out, VG wasn't interested, so everything was covered.

Originally, Bergens Tidende had been sending Siri Økland, and it was a shame she wouldn't be coming, we had been literature students together in Bergen twenty years ago, and although we hadn't known each other then we always said hello, and that, together with the fact that we were of the same generation, made me feel secure. If I felt insecure in an interview situation I hardly ever said anything at all, they had to drag the words out of me, it was never any good. Prior to my previous book coming out, Dagbladet interviewed me in Stockholm. I hadn't talked to anyone about the book and felt uncertain as to what it was actually about and how good or bad it was, and added to that the photographer had been present during the entire interview, it had taken place at Saturnus, he said he knew Tore Renberg well and sat there staring at me with a half smile on his face that had me on edge the whole time, making me hear everything I said the way I thought it sounded to him, pure lunacy, Noah's Ark and Cain and Abel, angels and the divine, so after a few minutes I shut up, muttering a simple yes or no in reply to her questions, my cheeks blushing madly if I did make some attempt at a reasoned response. All I could think about was whether I could ask her to send the photographer away so I could talk more freely, but I didn't have the nerve, and there was not much else I could do.

Before the interview got under way I'd leafed through Gombrowicz's diaries; it was the fifth time I'd tried to get into them, the fifth time I'd read the first ten pages without getting any further, and that same afternoon I put the book away. But the woman interviewing me had noticed I had it with me and made a little aside of it. "Knausgaard reads Gombrowicz," a caption said. It haunted me for years after. I was contacted several times by newspapers and journals wanting me to write something about the Polish author for their pages. I, who had read only the first ten pages of his diary, and none of his novels or plays, was now thought to be a Gombrowicz expert. The horror of this was compounded whenever I happened to run into Dag Solstad, since Solstad held Gombrowicz very much in esteem, he was one of his favorite writers, and because I hadn't confessed to not having read him the first time he mentioned him to me I had to keep pretending to him that I was a Gombrowicz aficionado. Once, he came over and told me he had just attended a Gombrowicz seminar in Stockholm and had been expecting to see me there. Oh, but I'd had so much going on at the time, though obviously I would have loved to have gone. Had it been interesting? And so on.

I closed the browser, got to my feet, and left a ten-kronor coin on the counter as I passed, pulled open the door, and went up the steps, out into the swell of twilight, which was pierced only by the headlights of dark, sleek cars and the gentle hum of their engines.

The children were all still awake when I got back. Pappa, Pappa, they shouted out as soon as they heard the door open. I took off my shoes, hung up my jacket, went to their room, and stood in the doorway.

"Go to sleep," I said.

"But we can't," said Vanja, their spokesman in such cases.

"It's boring! Can't we stay up just a little bit longer? Just a teeny-weeny bit?"

"No," I said. "It's way past your bedtime."

Heidi, who had the top bunk, drew herself up onto her knees.

"Kram," she said. Cuddle.

I went up to her and she wrapped her arms around me and pressed her cheek as hard as she could against mine.

"Också kram!" said John. Me cuddle too.

He was lying on his back in his crib, clutching his pillow in his hands. He dragged it around with him wherever he went and it was the first thing he asked for when he came home from the nursery. Pillow, want pillow!

"You'll have to stand up if you want a cuddle," I said.

He did as he was told. I kissed him on the ear and he giggled. He was the only one of them who was ticklish.

"Vanja?" I said.

"Only if we can stay up!" she said.

"But it's not for my sake!" I said. "It's for yours!"

"OK then," she said, and leaned forward. I cuddled her, rubbing my hand up and down her delicate spine.

"Little treasure," I said. "Sleep time now, OK?"

"OK. But don't close the door!"

"I won't," I said.

She was slightly afraid of the dark, not much but enough for her to want some light when she went to sleep. Once, when we had been at Linda's mother's in the country, Vanja must have been about eighteen months old at the time, she had a nightmare. She cried, and when Linda asked what the matter was she said she had dreamed about the swimming pond. We were puzzled, but the explanation came a few months later. On a visit to a zoo we paused at a glass-fronted enclosure and looked in at a splendid monitor lizard. When Vanja laid eyes on it she recoiled and cried out in fright, Swimming pond! Swimming pond!

Now she lay in bed gazing up at me.

"Night night," I said.

"Night night," she replied. "Daddy?"

"What?"

"Who's tucking me in tomorrow?"

"Don't think about that now. Go to sleep."

Vanja preferred Linda to do everything, and for me to do as little as possible. For her, the height of joy was Linda tucking her in two nights in a row. That was just the way it was, I ranked second and always would, unless someone else came and took my place. But I didn't mind, Linda was closer to them and it was as simple as that.

I went into the living room where Linda, who was watching television, turned her head and looked up at me.

"I forgot to pick up milk and bread," I said.

"Doesn't matter," she said. "Aren't they asleep yet?"

"No."

"What are you going to do tonight?"

"Pack a few things. Decide what to wear tomorrow. How about you?"

"I don't know really. I'm a bit tired. I think I might have an early night. In fact, that might not be such a bad idea, with you not being here tomorrow."

"No," I said. "It's only two days though. And your mother's coming."

"I know, I didn't mean it like that. It's no bother."

I went into the bedroom and picked out two shirts, a couple of sweaters, some T-shirts, two pairs of pants and two suits, took the whole pile with me to the mirror in the hall and began trying things on. The children were giggling in their room, I started to get annoyed, went in, and turned the ceiling light on. They were all piled up together in Vanja's bed. I took hold of John by a foot and an arm, snatched him up, and lifted him back into his bed, turned around and repeated the procedure with Heidi, all without a word and so firmly it verged on the unreasonable.

"That's it," I said. "Now go to sleep. Do you hear me?"

"Yes, Daddy," said Vanja. "But they all crept up to me. I couldn't stop them."

"All right," I said, and turned off the light.

"Mean Daddy!" said John.

I said nothing, closed the door, and went back to trying on clothes. A pair of black Lindeberg jeans, a blue Ted Baker shirt, and the gray Ted Baker jacket. Then there were the shoes, a pair of Fiorentini+Baker, bought in Edinburgh a few weeks before like the rest of the gear. I'd been taking part in a literary festival there, Yngve and Asbjørn and a couple of their friends had traveled over to see me, but when it came down to it, just before I left the hotel to walk up to the venue, I asked if they'd mind not coming after all. They must have thought it a bit off, the festival was the whole excuse for their trip, but they didn't seem to mind that much and traipsed off to get something to eat instead. Most likely they were just as afraid as me that I was going to make a fool of myself. At least, I'm sure Yngve was, he identified with me. Onstage I was interviewed together with a Dutch author about fifty years old, who dressed eccentrically, spoke perfect-sounding English, and had written a novel based on Dante's The Divine Comedy. His name was Marcel Möring. He looked after me the whole time we were onstage, noticing how nervous and uneasy I was about the situation, and afterward as we sat down ready to sign books, each with a glass of wine in front of us, and he had a queue of people lined up at his table, all praising him for his perfect English and telling him how fascinating his book sounded, whereas my own table was completely ignored, he whispered politely that he had started out in exactly the same way and that as a rule nothing ever took off abroad, but it didn't matter, the important thing was this, the chance to gallivant around the world and meet new people. He gave me his card and vanished into the night with his young wife, while I sloped off to a pub to meet up with the other Norwegians. The next day Yngve did me the favor of going shopping with me, unlike me he always had a good eye when it came to clothes. If he gave the nod, I bought it; if he shook his head, I put it back.

I turned and twisted uncomfortably this way and that in front of the mirror, the trousers didn't quite go with the jacket, and wasn't it a God-awful cliché anyway, authors in suits? How boring was that?

I went back to the closet and stared at my other jackets.

There was an anorak-like thing, which I thought was nice, but it probably wasn't right for a book-launch interview.

Suddenly there was a commotion going on in the children's bedroom, one of them was crying, another screamed. I stormed in and turned the light on.

"That's enough! Back to bed, all of you!"

It was John doing the crying, Heidi the screaming. Vanja was in the middle with her hands covering her ears. I snatched John from the huddle, this time more firmly than before, and plonked him down in his crib, where he sat clutching the bars like a prisoner in jail, howling and sobbing. John hit me! Heidi yelled. I picked her up and put her back in her own bed.

"John's still little. Besides, I'm sure there was a reason. Now go to sleep. You too, John," I said, turning toward him.

"Mean!" he replied between sobs. I went up and crouched down at his crib.

"I'm not mean at all," I said. "But you're going to sleep. I won't have you wandering around anymore. You can see what it leads to, you end up hurting yourself. Now lie down."

Oddly enough he did as he was told. I turned off the light, closed the door again, and went back to trying on clothes, item by item, in every conceivable combination. Linda could get annoyed with me about it, I knew that, she disliked anything that resembled vanity. I could spend more time figuring out what to wear than what I was going to say to an audience. But once I knew I was going to be on view, I became obsessive about it. It didn't matter if the clothes were cheap or expensive, new or old, it was the ceremony of it, shirt on, shirt off, the stubborn self-appraisal, good, not good, awful, better, or maybe this one instead?

After half an hour, constantly aware of what Linda might be thinking, I went back into the living room.

"Can I wear this?" I asked.

"Absolutely," she answered. "Du ser jättefin ut." You look good.

It was what she always said, but I needed to hear it nonetheless.

A hefty thud came from the children's room, a thump against the wall.

"What's the matter with them tonight?" said Linda.

This time it sufficed to open the door. John scuttled immediately back across the floor and Heidi scurried up the ladder to her bunk.

"I mean it this time," I said. "Once more and I'll be really angry with you."

They lay quite still and peered out with wide eyes. I went into the bathroom, found the scissors, and began to trim my beard.

There was a little patter of feet in the hall. It had to be either John or Heidi.

"Back to bed, this minute!" I shouted.

"I can't sleep!" said Heidi, appearing in the doorway.

"Come on," I said, lifting her up and carrying her back to bed. I stood for a minute behind the door, before opening it again to see Heidi on her way down the ladder.

"Back to bed!" I said firmly. "It's sleep time!"

"But I can't sleep," she said. "I'm awake!"

"I know what we can do," said Vanja. "We can hold hands and close our eyes and fly away to ketchup land!"

"OK," I said. "As long as you go to sleep, then."

And they did, they held hands, closed their eyes, and were quite still. Ketchup land was something they had heard about at the nursery, so I assumed, not really wanting to know since it filled me with such a sense of unpleasantness, ketchup being red, red being blood, blood being dead. And there they lay with eyes closed . . .

I went back to the bathroom and picked up where I'd left off with my beard. Again there was a patter of feet in the hall, whoever it was scurried past into our bedroom. I flung the door open to see Heidi climbing onto the bed. She turned toward me.

"Back to bed!" I shouted. "At once! I've just about had enough. Come on. Off to bed with you! You're NOT staying up. DO YOU HEAR ME?"

She took one look at me and burst into tears.

Oh, Heidi!

"I was only getting a book!" she sobbed. "Grown-ups can't get mad at children!"

I felt so sorry for her I almost started crying myself. Fortunately she didn't react with rage, as so often before – in such cases it was impossible to comfort her. No, she simply wept, and I lifted her up, held her little body close to mine and carried her back to her room, switched on the light and told them I would read them all another story. Heidi snuggled into my arms, Vanja sat up and buttoned up the coat of one of her many cuddly dogs, listening with one ear, while John messed around on the floor playing with whatever toys he happened to find. I read them a story about the Moomin who wakes up in winter while his parents are still hibernating, he can't wake them up and so he goes off on his own. Heidi twisted about, wanting to know this and that – Why are they laughing at him? It's not nice to laugh at other people. What's he saying there, Daddy? – while Vanja snorted at such childish questions and John immersed himself with his own projects on the floor, which now involved something he could press to make a loud noise like a siren.

By the time we reached the end of the story and I turned the light off again, they had finally settled down. I went in to Linda, who was watching the news, and said I wondered why they were so difficult tonight. She said Heidi had slept two hours after nursery school, and John had slept until late too. I sat down, put my feet up on the table, and stared at the television.

We went to bed an hour later. Kissed each other goodnight, turned off the light. I was nervous and realized right away it would be a while before I could fall asleep. I was nervous about the next day, the round of interviews that lay ahead, but not for the old reason, the way it normally was, the horror of having to talk and take up space, and be quoted on everything I said, the horror of making a fool of myself; this time I was scared about what I had written. The novel, which would be out in two days, and which had been given the title My Struggle 1, had been written in solitude. Apart from Geir Gulliksen and Geir Angell, no one had read any of it along the way. A select few had been aware of what I was writing about, among them Yngve, but they knew none of the detail. After a year like that, where the only perspective that existed was my own, the manuscript was ready to be published. Four hundred and fifty pages, a story about my life centered around two events, the first being my mother and father splitting up, the second being my father's death. The first three days after he was found. Names, places, events were all authentic. It wasn't until I was about to send the manuscript to the people mentioned in it that I began to understand the consequences of what I had done. I sent it out in late June. Yngve had to be first. There were things I had written about him that I had thought and felt but never articulated. As I sat down at the computer and attached the document to the e-mail I had written to him, I felt like dropping the whole thing, calling the publishers and telling them there would be no novel this year either.

I sat there for half an hour. Then eventually I clicked send and it was done.

The next day we went to the beach at Ribersborg, it was Sunday and there were lots of people there, we found ourselves a spot by the pier leading out to the open-air baths of the Kallbadhus. The structure dated back to the first decade of the twentieth century and was built on poles a hundred meters from the shore. John was asleep in his stroller. Vanja and Heidi paddled for a while at the water's edge and collected shells, Linda and I sat farther up the beach watching. After about half an hour John woke up and we took them to the bathhouse café, finding a table outside next to the railings at the end, the water glinting and glittering all around us as we sat with our ice cream. It was almost like being on a boat. We had the bridge to Denmark on one side of us, the Turning Torso skyscraper on the other, and the Barsebäck nuclear power plant visible in the haze to the northwest.

I saw all of this: people swarming on the long city beach and on the wide footpath behind it, cyclists and roller skaters whizzing by, the row of concrete blocks from the fifties or perhaps the sixties, the city's final bastion against the sea, that great light-catcher, calm and in no way dramatic here in the strait facing Denmark. The couples and the families sitting all around us, summer-clad and tanned, the big sky above us whose blue had no end until evening, when it would fade to gray and the first stars would seem to emerge from the space beyond, making visible its enormous distances. My own children sitting on their chairs with their short legs sticking out in front, absorbed in their own little worlds; ice-cream wrappers, dripping lollipops, and ice-cream cones. Linda, now and then wiping their mouths with tissues, her eyes almost hidden behind her sunglasses. I saw all of this, though as a film, something of which I myself was not a part, my thoughts and feelings being somewhere else. It was Yngve I was thinking about, though not actively, it was more like he just kept appearing in my mind. He was my brother, we had grown up together and I had leaned on him nearly all my life. We had been so close that instead of accepting his weaknesses or shortcomings the way I accepted my own, I identified myself with them and took on responsibility for them, however indirectly, in the feelings that ran through me whenever he did or said something I wouldn't have done or said myself. No one knew this, not even Yngve himself, because how could I ever express such a thing? Sometimes you're not good enough for me?

What was to be gained by telling things the way they were, representing my own feelings toward him? Compared to what I could lose? He could say fuck you, I want nothing more to do with you.

What would I do then? Remove it all? Or keep it and lose a brother?

I would keep it and lose a brother.

There was no doubt about it.

Why?

Was I mad?

Both Vanja and Heidi had bitten off the bottoms of their cones and were having a job licking up the ice cream that was now melting and dripping from two different places. John had chosen a popsicle, in principle it was easier, but he was so little he was having problems too. His fingers and chin were red and sticky from all the juice. But they were all immersed in what they were doing, which was good.

"What are you thinking about?" asked Linda.

"Yngve," I answered.

"It'll be all right, I'm sure it will," she said.

"That's easy for you to say," I said.

What I had written about Linda was much worse. But all I could do was take things one at a time.

A new wave of horror and shame washed over me.

Home again, I was checking my e-mail about twice every hour. It was Sunday, so my in-box stayed empty all day. Yngve was at Mom's in Jølster, which I was glad about, it would give him the chance to talk to her about it, which might soften his reactions, so I thought. We put the children to bed and sat for a bit on the balcony, and I checked my e-mail one last time before going to bed: nothing.

The next morning his reply was in my in-box.

Your fucking struggle, said the subject line.

I stood up without reading it and went out onto the balcony, sat there smoking and looking out over the city, cold and despairing.

But I had to read it.

His words were there, whether I read them or not.

I could put it off until evening, but that would only prolong my suffering, and the result would still be the same.

I stubbed my cigarette out and got to my feet, went inside into the living room, walked past the kitchen, where John was sitting in his chair with a spoon in his hand while Linda was reading the newspaper, into the bedroom, sat down on the chair, moved the cursor to the text line, two clicks and there it was.

> Just wanted to scare the hell out of you, but the last few days have been rather intense, seeing my life pass backward and forward in front of my eyes on account of your book and me going through old papers and letters here, yours and mine.
> I don't quite know whether to go into the book or our lives and the relationship we have to each other, the latter definitely needs to be treated differently than it has been until now, or maybe not? As far as the book goes, there are passages that are extremely unpleasant for me to see down on paper, even if I can see why you've included them.
> The part with you, me, Ingar, and Hans really made everything go black for me. Obviously, I've seen you feel ashamed of me in certain situations, and still do see that. It's hard, because it touches on aspects of myself that I'm painfully aware of – the way I can sometimes not be there inside myself; the way I can criticize things that I haven't thought of myself; preferring the role of someone who reads Adorno rather than actually reading Adorno. Mediocrity combined with poor self-awareness and big ambitions doesn't come out very well. But reading it again it doesn't seem as bad . . . it's about you, not me. Which I suppose doesn't leave much room for the times I've been ashamed about you!

"We rarely looked each other in the eye." Is it as bad as it's made out to be here? Do we look at each other any less than other people?

And Yngve and Espen not getting along? That's simply not true from what I can see . . . I thought it was Tore and Espen who didn't like each other?

I'll read the rest over the next few days. Maybe you can give me a call?

Yngve

I went out into the hall and called him up. There was a slight feeling of uncertainty between us. He told me again about how he'd felt reading what I had written, but he wasn't angry, it was more like he was accepting some personal criticism, and that created a buildup of pressure in the situation that I found almost excruciating, because he had no reason to. Not looking each other in the eye, the fact that we never shook each other's hand, or physically touched at all, were things we were unable to talk about, it was out of the question, but when, a few weeks after this phone conversation, he came to see us in Malmö with his two kids, Ylva and Torje, he looked me straight in the eye and put out his hand as soon as I opened the door. No irony, no subtleties, he wanted to make amends. My eyes grew moist and I had to look down.

After Yngve had read it, I put off sending it to the others I had written about. I was dreading it all summer, until eventually at the beginning of August, only a month before publication, I mustered up the courage. I sent an e-mail to Jan Vidar asking how he was and received a reply within a few hours, he and his family were doing fine, he was going off on a fishing trip with some friends of his the next day, it was a thing they did together, Finnmarksvidda in the summer. I hadn't been in touch with him for years, the last time I saw him was when I had been in Kristiansand beginning a new novel after my debut, Out of the World. It was nearly ten years ago. In the book that was coming out now he was one of the most important characters. We had been best friends from when we were thirteen until we were seventeen, or thereabouts, after which we drifted apart. They had been significant years. We'd moved from Tveit, I was new at the school, he came up to me and we made friends, spent all our time together, not least with the band we went on to form. When I started writing about that time I found it all to be so much closer to me than I had imagined. The atmosphere of our house, the woods at the back, the river below, all the things we did together, which basically wasn't much at all, and yet it had been everything. The person Jan Vidar had essentially emerged for the first time when I sat writing about it all in Malmö more than twenty years later.

I had Googled him, and besides a number of hits to do with angling competitions where his name appeared, a band came up in which he clearly played. Several of their songs were online. I listened to them. They were a blues band. He was the guitarist, and his solos were really good. What had happened? We had been awful back when we played together. Since then my playing had not developed in the slightest, it was still exactly the same as when I was fifteen. But he had turned into a virtuoso. Because I hadn't seen him in all those years it seemed baffling to me. In my mind he was still seventeen.

I sent him the manuscript and hoped for the best.

I sent it to another old friend too, Bassen, he appeared only fleetingly but had been an important figure for me then and we had kept in touch for some time, I still had his number. He read through it right away and had no objections to the use of his character and name, and yet the conversation I had with him was unsettling, he said there would be trouble and that I shouldn't rule out the possibility of proceedings. That hadn't occurred to me, and we talked about it for quite a while. He was a criminologist with Statistics Norway and knew what he was talking about. My first thought was that he was exaggerating, but something about the gravity in his voice told me otherwise. Sued? Action for damages? For writing about my own life? If anyone reacted negatively I would alter their names, it wasn't that big a deal.

Another important character was Hanne, my first real love, once the light of my life, my everything. It had not worked out for us back then, and apart from a brief encounter in Bergen, we hadn't seen each other since. She too was viewed from my immature perspective, which moreover was suffused with infatuation and conceit.

I tried to get hold of her address, but couldn't find it on the Internet, and she wasn't in the phone book either. I called Bassen again, the three of us had been in the same class together, he dug out a number he thought might be hers, I called it, no one answered. I tried again, several times, but there was never anyone in.

Tonje, to whom I had been married, hardly appeared in the book, only fleetingly in the parts concerning my father's death, but I sent it to her too, explaining that there would be five more books coming out and that I anticipated her playing a more significant role in one of them than was the case here.

Finally, I sent the manuscript to my uncle Gunnar. He was ten years younger than my father, which meant he had been little more than a boy when his elder brother had married and his first child came along. From growing up I remember him as a young man in his twenties, very different from Dad. Gunnar had long hair, he could play the guitar, and he had a boat fitted with a twenty-horsepower Mercury motor. Once, he managed to get Yngve the autograph of IK Start footballer Svein Mathiesen, it was a big thing and it wouldn't surprise me if Yngve still has it. Gunnar was a person Yngve and I looked up to, someone we always hoped would be there whenever we went to visit Grandma and Grandad in Kristiansand, or be with them when they came to visit us. By the time I was in my teens, he was married and had his own family, lived in a neat row house, and spent his free time in summer out at the cabin Grandma and Grandad had bought in the fifties and which he gradually took on. He was a joker with a line in puns, in that way he was like Yngve, and he was responsible, the last ten years of our grandparents' lives it was he and his wife who were on hand to help them with whatever they needed. As Dad began to let go of me and everything else, Gunnar's role in my life changed. Presumably he remained the same, but my attitude toward him changed. In my mind he had sussed me out. At that point I'd started writing for local papers and had become visible in a way I sensed he disliked, and at the same time I'd become wayward, ditching school, drinking, occasionally smoking pot, an outrageous transgression I for some reason believed Gunnar to be aware of, unlike everyone else around me, and this rubbed off on the way I related to him. In the years after I left home, at the age of eighteen, I didn't have much contact with him, but the few times I visited him it was obvious to me that his children had complete trust in him, there was no sign of terror in their eyes when they looked at him, and I respected him for that. When I came into my twenties, with Dad becoming increasingly alcoholic, Gunnar became the representative of all that was orderly and proper, to which I, unlike my father, aspired, and as such I made Gunnar a kind of father figure, as well as a kind of superego. If the kitchen was littered with empties, I would think, What would Gunnar say if he came in now and saw this? If I had been absent from lectures for a few months, I would think, What would Gunnar have to say about this? Every time I did something excessive, Gunnar would appear in my thoughts. It had nothing to do with the person he was, it was something I had constructed, and yet it was by no means completely without foundation: during the summer when I was writing what would be my first novel I stayed for a while at Mom's in Jølster, I was twenty-eight years old, and one afternoon when I was visiting my maternal grandmother's sister Borghild and chatting with her about what life on the farm there had been like in the old days, since I was thinking of using it in my novel, Gunnar had been to see Mom and taken her to task for me being such a slacker and a layabout who was never going to make anything of himself. Because my father was no longer able to take responsibility for me, my mother needed to step up, he said, and at the very least stop encouraging me in my starry-eyed dream of becoming a writer. But there was a solicitude in that too, I thought, and my feelings were divided: on the one hand I wanted to write and was willing to make any sacrifice in order to do so, and moreover I was drawn toward the avant-garde, ever since my teenage years I had despised all that was conservative and staid; on the other hand, the avant-garde filled me with anxiety, and the pull toward the conservative, the staid, and the secure was at least as strong; it was a big part of why I got married and went to university at all. My father couldn't care less about me, so when Gunnar came and condemned the life I was leading, I felt there was something good in that too: at least he cared about what became of me.

Perhaps he felt divided too. When Dad died in Grandma's house and I went down to Kristiansand and cleaned up and took care of the funeral arrangements, he invited me out to the cabin one day for a break, and we went for a walk together across the meadows and among the trees, he told me what Dad had meant to him, and it felt like he wanted to get closer and share it with me. Later that summer he had gone to see Mom again, they spent a holiday every year at a place only a couple of hours from where she lived, and on that occasion he had been full of praise for Yngve and me, how well we had handled the situation when our father died. Only a few weeks later my first novel came out, and when it did everything went back to as it had been before. My father appeared in the book, and my father's brothers too, not ostensibly, but clearly enough for those close to the family to realize who the characters were modeled on. When I sent a copy to Gunnar I included a letter in which I put down a few words about my relationship to Dad and my respect for Gunnar as a father, sensing I suppose how he was going to take it and hoping it would soften his reaction. He was furious about the book, but instead of calling me on the phone or writing me a letter, he phoned my mother and let her have it. She refused to take responsibility for what I did or wrote, telling him I was a grown man and that she wasn't going to interfere. Six months later, however, he called me, the book had won the Critics Prize, I was staying at a hotel in Oslo and had just accepted the award when a man called, introducing himself by a name I didn't recognize. The voice, though, was familiar, and after a few seconds I realized it was Gunnar, he had introduced himself using the name I had given to one of the father's brothers in the novel. He wanted to congratulate me, and apart from him asking if we were having a drink to celebrate, it was a pleasant enough conversation. After that we met at Grandma's funeral and at the division of her estate, and then one summer when I was at Mom's together with Linda, Vanja, and Heidi he was suddenly standing there at the door, he just thought he would say hello, he said, would you like some coffee, I said, no, thanks all the same, he said, we're on our way south, just passing through, but come in at least, I said, but no, really, it was quite all right, so we stood there in the garden, exchanging pleasantries for perhaps three or four minutes before he got back in the car and drove off. Linda and the children were upstairs asleep, I said I could wake them so he at least could see my children, but he didn't want that either, it was too much trouble, then after they'd gone Linda and I laughed about the whole thing, since he had obviously only stopped by out of a sense of obligation and nothing else.

So that was the situation when I had to send him the new novel. I knew he wasn't going to like it, and the thought of him reading it scared me. But there was no way round it. So on the last day of July 2009, a month and a half before the novel was due to be published, I sat down in front of the computer and wrote him a note.

Dear Gunnar,

It's been a long time. Hope everything's good with you and the family. I was in Kristiansand this spring at a playwriting seminar and was intending to stop in and see you, only then there was a funeral in Ålesund I had to fly up to – Sissel's sister Ingunn had died – and my schedule was just too tight. Sissel's brother-in-law Magne, who was married to Kjellaug, died too in the spring, so it's been a rough year for Mom. Here in Malmö, though, things are well, all three children are in nursery school now, and Vanja will be starting school in the autumn, so the worst of our toddler years will soon be over.

The reason I'm writing to you now though is a different one. The fact is I've written six autobiographical novels – three coming out this autumn, three in the spring – all dealing with different parts of my life, and basically all names and events included in them are authentic, meaning they describe actual occurrences, though not in any great detail. The first of the books will be published at the end of September – the first part takes place in Tveit in the winter and spring of 1985, which is to say the time Mom and Dad split up and Dad began his new life with Unni, and the second deals with the days in Kristiansand following his death. You appear briefly in the first part, giving me a lift down to a friend's house on New Year's Eve, and briefly in the second, when you and Tove come to the house and lend a hand cleaning the place up. As such, it's a positive portrayal, obviously, because that's the way I think of you, so that's not the difficult or painful part of it – this lies in the fact that I am laying bare the private life of our family, something neither you nor anyone else in the book has asked for. On the other hand, this is a book about me and my dad, that's what it deals with, my endeavor to understand him and what happened to him. To do that I have to go to the core, the inferno he made right at the end, in which he destroyed not only himself and the house but also Grandma's final years, besides harming everyone else close to him. Why did he do that? What made him do it? Was it something he had inside him all the time when we were growing up? I don't know if you realize this, but my father has had me gripped in a vise all my life, even after he died, and if I am to tell my story, that's where I have to delve. The fact that this story also involves other people, among them – and perhaps especially – you, torments me severely, but at the same time I've been unable to see any way around it. The rot and repugnance the book describes all comes down to Dad, no one else was to blame, but I can't describe any of it without reference to the context in which it took place. That's the way it is. Right now I'm sending the manuscript to everyone who plays a part in it. Yngve has read it, and Mom as well. Now I'm sending it to you, attached to this e-mail. If you would like your name to be changed, and your background made anonymous, I am of course willing to do that. It wouldn't be difficult, but the real problem lies elsewhere: that something you would prefer left alone, out of sight, is now going to be held up on display. Again, I'm sorry about that, but he was my father, the story I tell is my own, and unfortunately it looks like this.

All the best,
Karl Ove

During the next couple of days I checked my e-mail several times an hour. Whenever the phone rang I felt stabs of anxiety. But nothing was forthcoming. I took this to be a good sign, he was reading the novel and thinking about what to say and how to react. Either that or he was away at the cabin.

It wasn't until the fifth day that I heard from him. As soon as I saw his name in my in-box I stood up and and went out onto the balcony, sat there for a while, smoking and gathering courage. The children were at the nursery, the sounds of the city rose toward me. The worst that could happen, I thought to myself, was that he would be angry with me for writing about the things I'd written about. But that would pass. All I had to do was take it, and it would pass.

I couldn't undo what I'd already done. Not only had I made the decision that it was what I wanted, but I'd also worked under the banner of that decision for more than a year. The will of one person couldn't change that.

That was what I thought. But it wasn't what I felt. I felt like I did when I was a little boy and had done something wrong. I was afraid Dad was going to come and be angry with me. There was nothing worse in all the world. After I left home and became an adult, the fear remained, it was with me all the time, and I did everything I could to keep it from breaking out. Dad was no longer around, and my fear of his rage had been transferred onto others: I was twenty years old and scared stiff of other people being angry with me. It never went away. When I left everything behind and moved to Stockholm at thirty-three, the fear was still inside me. Linda, whom I met soon after, was temperamental and often unreasonable in her outbursts, and yet I allowed myself to be intimidated completely, even the slightest raising of her voice was enough to fill me with anxiety, and the only thing I could think about would be to make it go away. Even as a forty-year-old, sitting on the balcony on a morning in August 2009, I was scared of someone being angry with me. Whenever I gave anyone reason to be, I became so terrified and despairing and so full of anguish, I never knew how I would ever get over it.

This fear of people being angry with me was the child's fear, it didn't belong in the adult world, where it was unprecedented, yet something inside me had never made that transition, never become adult and hardened in that way, so the child's emotions lived on in the adult. The adult, which is to say I, was completely at the mercy of the child's emotions, sometimes it hurt so much I could hardly bear it, knowing as I did that I was an adult and acutely aware that the feeling and everything to do with it was deeply shameful. Why was this? If my sense of self had been strong and whole, if I'd been more assured, I would have been able to say to myself that I did this and I'm accountable for it, and if anyone has another opinion that's their business, not mine. If they wanted argument, I'd give them an argument. But my sense of self wasn't at all strong or whole, I wasn't at all assured, and my self-confidence was completely built around what other people might think of me. My own thoughts and opinions didn't matter in that respect. I was still living in the world Dad had set up for me, where everything I did basically came down to not doing anything wrong. What was wrong was not defined by any set of rules, but was instead a matter of what he at any given time decided was wrong. These circumstances I transferred to my adult life, in which they no longer existed apart from inside me. But Dad was dead, he'd been dead for eleven years. I knew all this, but knowing didn't help, the feeling wormed its way through and did as it pleased. The only thing I could do was to meet it head-on and stick it out.

I stood up and went into the bedroom where the computer with the Internet connection was. I opened the e-mail. It was short, and nothing to be concerned about.

Hi Karl Ove.

Would you please send me an e-mail address for your contact(s) at your publishing house.

Gunnar

I read it through a few times, trying to make out what lay behind the words. He hadn't started with "Dear," as I had done, but if he was fuming about something then surely he wouldn't have written, "Hi Karl Ove." The fact there was a period after my name indicated a lack of enthusiasm, otherwise there would have been either an exclamation mark – which I didn't think was in his nature – or a comma, or else nothing. A comma or nothing would have been neutral and objective, a period was making a point, stern and unpermissive. His use of "please" pointed in the same direction. "Please" was formal, more formal than the uncle–nephew relationship warranted, so my understanding was that he didn't care for the manuscript. At the same time, it was a marker of politeness, which might indicate that he wasn't fuming at all, I thought, otherwise wouldn't he just have dispensed with courtesy altogether? The fact that he hadn't put anything before his name, either "Best regards" or "Yours" or something equally friendly, indicated the same thing as the opening, that this was a formal, matter-of-fact kind of inquiry on the computer screen in front of me. I knew he'd never cared for me, that he saw me as an attention-seeker, someone who wanted to be different for the sake of being different, who believed himself to be more than he was, and moreover without any sense of responsibility or order, and I took the content of his brief e-mail to be more indicative of that than of what he thought about the novel. Wanting the addresses of my contacts at the publisher was a good thing too, it seemed to say he would be putting any objections to them rather than to me personally. More than anything else, I was afraid of any direct contact with him. If he was going to be writing to the publisher, it would hardly be to rip into them.

I typed the e-mail addresses and phone numbers of the director of publishing Geir Berdahl and commissioning editor Geir Gulliksen, and sent them off to him. I went back into the study. The volume of work I had to get through was enormous and I had no idea how I was going to manage it all. In April I had sent twelve hundred pages off to the publisher, the idea all along having been for a single novel, to be published in the autumn, but then it had grown, it was too long, and the way I was thinking now was it was going to be another three hundred pages or longer still, which begged the question of how actually to publish the book. I'd discussed the matter with Geir Gulliksen over the phone. Was publishing a novel that ran to fifteen hundred pages at all feasible? Everything was feasible, he said. It could also be put out in two volumes, either at the same time or with a few months in between. Although this was more rational and would moreover have the advantage of giving me a double payout of two basic fees, a matter that was far from insignificant in view of our, to put it mildly, frail finances of the past few years, I nevertheless still preferred the book to come out as a single volume. It would be a statement, something there would be no getting away from, Norway's longest novel. Geir said he would run it past some other people at the publishing house and call me back. He did so a few hours later. He said that the proposal he wanted me to listen to, as suggested by Geir Berdahl, was probably unrealistic, and that I might not like it at all, but it was definitely worth considering.

"Let's hear it, then!" I said.

"We put it out as a series of twelve. A book a month for a year. We could set up some kind of deal so people can subscribe and get the whole lot. What do you reckon?"

"It's a fantastic idea!" I said. "Absolutely brilliant!"

"Yeah, I liked it too. It'd be a bit of a challenge, though. We'd need to find the funding somewhere. I'll go ahead and look into it, then we'll see."

"It'll be like Dickens or Dostoevsky," I said. "A serial novel! I really like the serial aspect of it. Like when The Wedding Present released a single once a month for a year, then put them all together to make an album when the year was up. It's a gimmick, but why not?"

"It's not an ordinary novel. It's fitting we do something special with it. Think of how it'll affect the way it's received. How would they review it? Each book as it comes out? Or the whole work as one at the end of the year?"

"It's fucking genius, Geir! Say hello to Berdahl and thank him for me."

"I think it's good too, and I'll do what I can to make it work. It'll take time. But let's say for now I go ahead and look into it, then I'll give you a call in a couple of weeks, OK?"

As soon as we hung up I went straight into the study and set about dividing the novel into twelve. If it was going to come to fifteen hundred pages in all, then each book would have to be roughly a hundred and twenty-five pages. I searched for places where one book could end and another begin. It was the first time during the year I'd been working on the novel that I'd felt anything remotely like joy and enthusiasm. I imagined the paperback with just the title printed on it, as they used to do in the nineteenth century. Subscription coupons in the newspapers and magazines that could be cut out and sent in to the publishers, the way people did in my childhood.

Nearly three weeks went by before Geir phoned back. When he did it was to tell me they couldn't make it work with twelve separate publications, there were too many practical problems and the figures wouldn't add up. He suggested six instead. Three in the autumn, three the following spring. I hesitated, not wanting to let go of the idea of twelve and once a month, almost pleading with him to think again, he could see what I was saying, he said, but it had turned out to be impractical, we ran the risk of ruining the publishing house, as far as I could understand him. Six had been difficult too, but eventually he had managed to get them all covered by the State Purchasing Program, thereby minimizing the financial risk.

"That's unbelievable," I said. "How did you manage that? Isn't there a strict rule they only purchase one work of fiction a year per author?"

"Yes. I had to present my case. It's a very unusual project. They listened and agreed."

That decided, I had to split the novel once more. In principle, I could just put two and two together of the twelve, making each book about two hundred and fifty pages. But that would be the same length as any average Norwegian novel, and with the subscription and serial idea abandoned it would be odd to simply break the narrative in one book to pick it up again in the next. Six books that weren't independent of each other, that didn't seem good to me. I needed to divide them differently so that each became a stand-alone book in its own right, which was to say I had to end up with six novels that could also be read as a single, continuous narrative. Doing it that way, the first book came to four hundred pages, the second to five hundred and fifty, and the third to three hundred. After that I ran out of material. If I was going to do it that way, I would have to write three new books in ten months. Which wasn't implausible, I'd been doing about ten pages a day for the past six months as it was, in the region of fifty pages a week given the fact that I wasn't allowed to work weekends. Subtracting ten pages for unforeseen difficulties, I could do around a hundred and sixty pages a month. If I rounded that down to a hundred and fifty, I could spend two or three months on each book and still easily do three, even having a month in hand.

I was almost burning with impatience and expectation as I sat down at the computer and scrolled through the manuscript. It was obvious I couldn't just divide it up into stand-alone books as it was, I would have to write beginnings and endings, bridges and transitions, move and delete sections, but that wouldn't be hard, the various parts differed from each other already because of how I'd tried to write my way into the period in which each narrative took place, not least by matching my reflections as closely as possible to the age of the first-person narrator in each book. The ten-year-old reflected on sweets, the twenty-nine-year-old on pop music, the thirty-five-year-old on parenting. Oh, it was going to be brilliant! Six books! Fuck, I was going to wipe the floor with them!

This afternoon in August, as I sat down to work after having read Gunnar's short e-mail, the first book was ready for typesetting; the last thing I'd done, after receiving two reader's reports, was to turn the mainly fragmentary and disconnected account of the year I'd spent living with Dad when I was sixteen into a cohesively told story, and the only thing left to do, as far as I could see, was to alter names if any of the people I had written about so wished. The second book was largely finished, all that remained was some minor work at the end, after which Geir Gulliksen was going to read it one last time, and once I'd gone through his suggestions and criticisms, that too would be ready for typesetting. The third book still needed a good deal of work. It wasn't where I wanted it to be, it was far too anecdotal, lacking in epic sweep, and had no clear thread besides the chronology.

This was perhaps the greatest difficulty in writing autobiographically, finding out how material was relevant. In real life, of course, everything was relevant and in principle equal, since it was all there in existence at the same time – the great oil tankers at anchor in the Galtesund in the seventies, the plum tree outside my window, Mom's job at Kokkeplassen, Dad's face when he drove by in the car and I was out somewhere and saw him, the pond where we skated in winter, the smells inside the neighbors' house, Dag Lothar's mom that time she made milkshakes for us, the strange car that was parked one night down at Ubekilen, all the fish we had for dinner, the way the pine trees in next door's garden swayed back and forth in the strong autumn winds, Dad's rage if I happened to dig my knee into the back of his seat in the car, the waffles we made every Tuesday, my great infatuation with Anne Lisbeth, the footballs Mom and Dad brought back for us from a trip to Germany, mine green with red hexagons, Yngve's yellow with red hexagons, the way we stood one day and kicked them as high into the air as we could to see if they could reach the military helicopter that happened to come sweeping low over the playground. The last of these recollections alone brought with it a host of other recollections, because while they were in Germany I had stayed with Grandma and Grandad on Dad's side, and Yngve with Grandma and Grandpa on Mom's side, a week I remembered so much from, and so very clearly, in particular the days we spent at the cabin. And that was what my entire childhood was like inside me – a thick garland of memories, one on top of another. To write was simultaneously to retrieve them from my mind and put them into words, and as long as this retrieval went from the inside to semioutside, by which I mean the words as they came to me in the process of writing, there was no problem, but what the novel as a form required was that my recollections be moved one place further still, to the unfamiliar reader. Relevance was a matter of communication, establishing community out of what was one's own, and the novel was one of the forms of relevance. The poem was another, less obvious, since it was shared by fewer people. Quality was bound together with exclusiveness, and everything to do with high and low literature, popular and elitist, was all about that. The wider the reach of the novel, the greater the community it strove toward, the easier it was to grasp, and the less challenging it became, in the sense that the reader's own efforts and participation diminished. In this there was a simplification, too. A novel that was meant to say something true about reality could not be made too simple, it had to contain an element of exclusiveness in its communication, something not common to or shared by all, in other words something of its own, and there, at some point between the madman's own particular and therefore uncommunicated ramblings, meaningless to everyone but the madman himself, who found them fascinatingly relevant, and the genre novel's fixed formulations and clichés, which had become clichés by being familiar to everyone, was the domain of literature. The highest ideal for any writer was to write a text that worked on all levels at the same time. The only writers I could think of who had done that were the authors of the first two Books of Moses – Genesis and Exodus – and Shakespeare. The Odyssey and the Iliad had achieved that once, but what at the time had been broad in reach, the epic poem, was now foreign in the sense that its relevance had radically declined. Not that I thought about any of this as I wrote, the problem there being real and tangible, how to turn all these recollections, which were almost inexhaustible, into a coherent narrative? And how to do so in such a way as to remain faithful to what was mine about them?

I went back and forth through the text without being able to collect my thoughts, or even to read what I'd written, my concentration was nonexistent, the only thing I could think about was Gunnar and his reaction. After a quarter of an hour like that, I got to my feet and went out of the study. As I went through the hall I heard the elevator on its way up. Most likely it was Linda; at this time of day there was hardly any activity in the building. I stood still and waited, heard the elevator doors open, and the next moment she stepped into the hall. She was wearing her blue and white sailor dress, she had eye shadow on, and her lips were painted red. In each hand was a carrier bag, and she had her little black backpack on her back. There was a busy air of eagerness about her; she'd hardly put her bags down on the floor before she came up to kiss me, then bent down and took off her red shoes while telling me about all the things she'd bought.

"They had these filing boxes or whatever down at Granit, the ones I was saying we could use for our mail, one for you and one for me. So now we don't need to leave all those letters and bills lying around all over the place. Do you want to see?"

I nodded and she produced the two boxes, which were like little sets of drawers.

"Nice, don't you think?"

"Yes," I said. "What's in the other bag?"

"A dress from Myrorna, a shawl, and a skirt. Dirt cheap, they hardly cost anything at all."

She took the three items out and held them up against herself one by one.

"Nice, don't you think?" she said again.

"Yes," I said.

"They hardly cost anything at all," she said.

"It would have been all right even if they had," I said. "It's not that."

"What, then?"

"It doesn't matter."

"Yes, it does! Tell me. Have you had lunch, by the way?"

I shook my head.

"There's some bolognese left over from yesterday, is that OK?"

"Yes."

"Go on, tell me, then. What is it? Something wrong?"

"No, not at all."

She went over to the mirror and held the dress up against herself again.

"It is nice, isn't it?" she said. "We can heat it up in the microwave, no?"

"I'll do it."

I went into the kitchen, took the plastic container with the meat sauce out of the fridge, then the spaghetti, divided it between two plates, and started heating the first one in the microwave as I stared out the window, all the roofs in their various shades of red which seemed so close, the light blue sky above them. I've felt a twinge of guilty conscience from boyhood at being inside on such a fine day. It was one of the things Dad would never tolerate. If the weather was fine, you had to be outside, no excuses. Stupid as I was, I could wander around the neighborhood finding no one to hang out with and nothing to do, it was the holidays, people had gone away, either for the day in their boats or their cars, or else farther afield, enjoying bigger adventures. All I wanted was to be inside with my books, and as I walked aimlessly about I could make myself cry with self-pity.

"How's your day been?" asked Linda, sitting down at the table and opening the newspaper that was folded in front of her.

"I got an e-mail from Gunnar," I said.

"Oh? What did he say?"

"Nothing. He just wanted the address of the publisher. But it was enough to stop me working."

"You needn't be so worried," she said.

I took a deep breath. She looked up at me.

"What's wrong?"

"I thought you didn't like shopping," I said. "I thought you loathed it."

She stuck her tongue out at me.

"You're so stingy sometimes," she said.

"Stingy?"

"You're not begrudging me, are you? I'm feeling happy, that's all. I thought I'd get myself something for when I go away, and I've been thinking about what to do about our mail for months. Aren't you glad I've figured it out? So we can keep things neat?"

"Of course."

"Good."

She returned to the newspaper.

Then she looked up at me again.

"Anyway, you buy all your clothes from Spirit, fifteen hundred kronor for a pair of trousers. I've never said a thing about that."

"That's because it's my money."

"That we could have spent on something else. The clothes I buy cost a third of the ones you buy, if not a quarter."

"All right, yes, but that's not the point. Forget it. The last thing I want to do is argue."

"Who wants to argue? Not me."

The microwave pinged. I took the plate out and put it down in front of her. She got up and turned the radio on.

"We're friends, then," I said, and put the second plate in the microwave, set the timer to four minutes, shut the door, and pressed the start button.

"Karl Ove, I love you. Of course we're friends."

"OK," I said.

She carried on reading the paper. The news came on the radio. The microwave hummed, the green plate and its mound of spaghetti bolognese rotated sedately in its chamber. I got the knives and forks out, and two glasses, and filled a jug with water.

"Can you pick them up today?" she asked.

I didn't answer until she looked up at me.

"Yes," I said, charging the word with as much reluctance as I could. "If you can't, then I suppose I'll have to."

"Of course I can. But it was my turn this morning. So it's your turn this afternoon."

I looked down without saying anything. The microwave pinged again, I took the plate out, put it down on the table, and began to eat. Linda watched me for a moment, then put the newspaper aside before she too started eating. I was finished in a couple of minutes, the food was barely warm and offered nothing in the way of resistance, the only thing to do was shovel it in. Although Linda was still eating, I left the table and went out onto the balcony, where I sat down, put my feet up on the rail, poured myself a cup of coffee from the vacuum jug, and lit a cigarette. The basic rule of our relationship was that we shared everything. From that point of view it was only fair and reasonable that I picked the children up if she had dropped them off. But the thing was I worked in between, while she didn't. On this particular day I'd got up at four thirty to get some work done before the children woke up, after which I helped her get them dressed and ready to go, and then I'd gone back to work, during which time she had sat in a café, shopped for clothes, and bought a couple of filing boxes. If the kids took up 50 percent of the day, and work another 50 percent, then I was doing 75 percent of the total job and Linda 25 percent. Whenever we argued, I would tell her. But I didn't want to argue now, so I left it at that.

I looked out over the city. I could see what looked like the small shadow of a Mercedes logo on a wall across the street below, perhaps cast by the sun shining on a parked car somewhere, I wasn't sure, but I'd seen it before and it seemed to indicate a habit, someone who always parked in the same place. Far, far away, a crane rose above the rooftops. Since all I could see basically were rooftops, any deviation would always stick out; if a person happened to be up there for whatever reason, I would see them, even if they were several kilometers away, the dark figure of the body against the brightness of the sky.

I stubbed my cigarette out in the upturned flowerpot I used for an ashtray, swallowed the last mouthful of coffee, and went inside. Passing the kitchen I saw Linda was on the phone. I paused to hear who she was talking to. Helena, I realized after only a few seconds. She looked up at me and lifted her hand as if in acknowledgment, I smiled and carried on into the bedroom to check my e-mails. It was already a quarter to two by the clock on the computer. Half an hour and I'd have to get going.

No e-mails.

Relieved, I lay down on the bed and stared up at the ceiling. It was too late to start on anything now anyway. A faint, rather nauseating smell of food filled the air. When we first moved here I thought it came from our nearest neighbor, but after a while it struck me the smell might be coming through the ventilation system, in which case it was most likely from the Chinese takeaway down on the ground floor. I got up and opened the door onto the balcony, then stretched out on the bed again. The sounds of the city trickled into the room. I heard footsteps in the hallway. They stopped and the bathroom door was opened and then closed. The old saxophone player whose spot was by a pillar only a few meters from the entrance to our building, where the flow of people crossing the square was greatest, began to play. He always played the same thing, a minute-long fragment of some tune, presumably on the assumption that his audience was always new. That a man seven floors up had to listen to every note, not just day after day, but month after month, was something that almost certainly didn't occur to him.

Diii di daaa da dididi daaaa.

Diii di daaa da dididi daaaa.

Diii di daaa da dididi daaaa.

I closed my eyes. There was a rush of water from the toilet, the door was opened and the footsteps stopped in front of the mirror in the hall. Was she looking at herself or sifting through the letters that lay strewn over the little table against the wall?

Ba daaaa! The sound the telephone made when returned to the charger.

Had she taken the phone with her to the toilet? Or just put it down on the table as she went past, only now putting it back in its place?

She came toward me.

I opened my eyes and saw her pause in the doorway.

"I'll pick them up," she said. "After all, you're going to be on your own with them for a few days."

"No, I'll do it," I said. "I can't get any more work done today anyway. You can pack or something."

"You sure?"

"Do you want me to say it again?"

"OK, OK. You pick them up, I'll drop them off in the morning before I go."

"What time was your train again?"

"About half past eight," she said, and sat down at the computer. She was going off to visit Helena and Helena's new boyfriend Fredrik at an old farmhouse somwhere in mid-Sweden and would be gone until the weekend, when Geir and Christina were coming to stay with us. I hadn't met Fredrik, but from what I'd heard he was the complete opposite of Helena's previous partner, the charming and rather dodgy Anders. Fredrik was a fireman, an incident commander working in Stockholm, and had bought a house in the Dalarna region, taken it apart, transported it to Uppsala and rebuilt it plank by plank, and done it so well there had been articles about it in lifestyle magazines. That was all I knew. Apart from that, Heidi, who had met him once, was a little scared of him. He had let her comb his hair on that occasion, and Helena had said it meant she couldn't be that scared of him, but Heidi said she'd been scared of him the whole time, even when she was combing his hair. Helena laughed about that. Heidi loved her and would always sit as close to her as possible to be sure of her attention, and chatter on about all the things she'd been up to since the last time they saw each other. She talked to her on the phone too, and often made drawings of her. Heidi was attracted by all that glittered and shone, she loved dressing up more than anyone, five outfits a day was by no means unusual, and in Helena she had found her only truly glamorous role model.

"Are you looking forward to some time on your own?" I said.

Linda nodded without turning around.

"But I'm going to start missing you after a couple of hours on the train. Are you sure you don't want to come?"

"Positive. I've got to work. Besides, it'll do you good, not having the children around."

"I suppose so. And Helena does always look after me."

"Good, then," I said, getting to my feet. "I'd better get going."

"Are you bringing them straight home or going to the playground first?"

I gave a shrug.

"Can you give me a call if you're going somewhere? So I can come too?"

"Will do. See you later."

"See you."

We went to Magistratsparken, the place the children called the "normal park." Other parks we frequented were the "spider park" in the Pildammsparken, the "shark park" in the Möllevangen neighborhood, and Lugnet, a few streets behind where we lived. Besides these there was another playground we went to in the Pildammsparken, and one in the Slottsparken that we called the "troll's forest," as well as another one some distance away by the fire station, where we hardly ever went but which they liked because it had some very unusual apparatuses. Almost all their time outdoors was spent in these parks. The rest of the time they were inside, either at the nursery or at home. I didn't like it, it was so remote from the upbringing I wanted to give them. But there were no alternatives, we couldn't afford a house, and being registered bad debtors we couldn't get a mortgage. On the other hand, they didn't seem to be suffering in the slightest as their heads poked out from among the leaves of the tree they called the "climbing tree." I sat on one of the three benches at the other end and skimmed through a newspaper I'd bought to keep myself occupied, glancing up at regular intervals and scanning the various children at play until locating my own. Vanja could be trusted completely, and I didn't think Heidi would get it into her head to go off on her own anymore either, but John was still unpredictable, all of a sudden he'd be on his way across the grass toward the road that ran next to the park, and if I didn't keep a watchful eye out and immersed myself in my reading instead he could be gone when I looked up, and I might only discover him when I extended my field of vision and noticed his little figure in the distance toddling off toward the road.

Now, though, he was standing tugging on the swing, calling for me at the top of his voice. I got to my feet and went over to him, lifted him up and put him in the seat, drew it back, and looked him in the eye. Are you ready? I said. Yes, he said in a serious voice. I pulled him back into the air and let go, and he immediately started to laugh. Ten swings, I said, and began to count. After ten I stopped him, he protested, and once he realized I was going to lift him up he gripped the swing tight with a look of panic in his eyes. No, no, no! I put him down on the ground, where he lay on his belly, pressing his face into the sand, shouting and screaming. By the time I sat down on the bench again his tantrum had turned to tears. He cried and sobbed heartrendingly, as if he'd been orphaned and hadn't eaten for a week, and someone had smacked his bottom for good measure. I located Heidi and Vanja, lit a cigarette, and picked up the paper again. Subconsciously I must have registered the situation that would soon arise, and only a few seconds later I lowered the paper and the dad who'd been on his way toward the swing with his son held tightly to his chest now put him down in the seat. A big person launching a little person, the way a big boat launches a little boat, I thought to myself. But John was still lying underneath the swing, and he wasn't thinking of moving for a while yet. I got up and went over to him. Up you go, out of the way, I said. Other people want to use the swing. He didn't say anything, just kept on sobbing, his little shoulders shaking. I picked him up like a tortoise, lifted him a few meters to the side and put him down again. There we are, I said. You can go and play again now. I turned and went back to my bench. I felt guilty, I ought to have comforted him until he stopped crying, but for one thing the reason for his disappointment was completely disproportional to his reaction and I didn't want him to start thinking this was the right way to deal with adversity, and for another, my strategy was to intervene as little as possible when I was out with them, I wanted them to be able to look after themselves.

But it wasn't only children who had difficulty keeping things in proportion. When I thought about the way I'd dealt with Vanja and saw from the photos how little she'd been then, it was as if the bottom dropped out from under me. Had I stood yelling with rage at that little creature there? Had I snatched her up out of her stroller and put her down hard on the floor, dizzy with frustration and anger, she eighteen months old and utterly innocent of anything? It was the most painful thought I knew. How could I have done such things? What had I been thinking? How was it possible to so totally lose one's sense of reality? I didn't see how little she was, my objective view was completely absent, both she and Linda and everyone else around me were sucked inside that inner vortex where the most unreasonable things became reasonable and justified. And I didn't have anything else to compare with, that was all there was.

John had stopped crying but was still lying with his face in the sand. I reasoned I had to give him a way out. The big swing was free now, I noticed, so I put down the paper and went over to him.

"Do you want to try the big swing? Would you like that?"

"Ye-es," he said.

"Come on, then," I said. He got up and followed me, wiping his tears away with his hand and leaving dark streaks on his cheeks. The big swing was in the shape of a cradle, there was room enough for several children inside, and mine at least loved to lie there and look up at the sky as they swung back and forth at speed. As I lifted John inside, Heidi and Vanja came running across the playground toward us.

"Us too!" they cried.

"Yes, but John's with you now," I said. "So I can't swing very high, OK?"

"OK," said Vanja.

"OK," said Heidi.

I lifted them up and pulled the cradle as far back as I could.

"Are you ready?"

"Yes."

"Are you sure?"

"Yes, Daddy. Swing us now!" said Vanja.

I did as she said.

John cried out in protest.

"I don't want to!"

I stopped the swing, lifted him out, and put him down. He stretched his arms toward me. I ignored him and pulled back the cradle, and he began to wail.

"OK, if you're going to be stubborn," I said, lifting him up then holding him with one arm while I swung the girls with the other. His little body against mine felt warm and good. He put his head on my shoulder. The cradle came toward me, I sent it back. The girls were lying on their stomachs with their heads poking over the edge, staring toward the road. Their dresses and their hair flapped in the wind. All around there were children, crawling, waddling, running, and climbing, the figures of their parents poking up, some with sunglasses on and cell phones in their hands, others absorbed in their children's activities. Beyond the playground there were lawns where tall trees stood, sedate and bathed in sun, offering circles of shade to all those who had come to the park that afternoon. Most were young, nearly all were white. Many lay on their own in the grass next to a bike; the way they had rolled their trousers up and removed their T-shirts suggested improvisation, a sudden impulse followed on the way home from work. Others sat around in groups, mostly students from the gymnas or university students. Here and there a couple lay tightly entwined, completely immersed in each other. The Pildammsparken on the other side of the old football stadium attracted mainly immigrants, whole families out picnicking into the evenings, occasionally the thud of drums could be heard rising up through the sunlight, as if from the depths of a dream. The way the shadows grew with evening, and the way the sun sank down, not into the sea or the forest, but into the city, had a dreamlike quality about it, I always found myself thinking when we were there. The world dissolved when filled with sunlight, that was the feeling I had, the relationships between all things vanished, everything seemed suddenly to exist on the same level. It was the job of culture to define those relationships, establish hierarchies of connections and draw together what lay dispersed into particular, meaningful patterns. That was why we had novels, films, TV series, poems, and plays, but also newspapers, television news, and gossip magazines. That a culture originating in a sun-scorched landscape, underneath a burning sky, along the fertile banks of a river, would draw the world together in a different way and create other meaningful patterns was obvious. I had no idea what the difference consisted of, for it was so big that their language to me sounded like so much coughing and spitting, and the letters of their alphabet looked more like bushes in the desert than writing, but I had an idea that everything surely had to be impenetrable to begin with, and while it might gradually open up as the language became understood, it could never be as self-explanatory as it was to us, and presumably never become possible, nor therefore desirable, to embrace. For culture's greatest role comprised the way it worked between people, its tissue of collocations, accentuations, and self-imposed constraints was so fine and complex that most within the culture were familiar only with the particular shadings that concerned his or her own layer of society, and possessed only superficial knowledge of the others. But everything had its own significance, that was what culture was. The fabric of a pair of trousers was significant, the width of a trouser leg was significant, the pattern in the curtain hung in front of a window was significant, the sudden lowering of a gaze was significant. The particular way a word was pronounced was significant. What a person knew about one thing or another was also significant. Culture charged the world with meaning by establishing differences within it, and those differences, in which everything of value existed, varied from culture to culture. That the units were becoming increasingly bigger, and cultures increasingly similar, was a discouraging thought, at least for someone like me who was fascinated by differences and attracted by impenetrability. The wonder of Japan, a country that had been isolated for so many hundreds of years and had developed what seemed to us in every way to be such a peculiar culture, almost completely closed to us, and yet existing before our eyes. The thought of that culture dissolving into that of the West and being lost forever, to exist as a mere variation of our own, was as great a loss as the extinction of any species of animal. But the Western world was so strong, and so expansive in its nature, that it would soon have the rest of the world subsumed within it, not by violence, as in the days of colonialism, but by promise. In this wide perspective, I was against immigration, against multiculturalism, against notions of sameness of nearly every kind. In the narrower perspective, that which related to the tangible, day-to-day reality of where I lived, in Malmö, it was hard not to look on immigration as an enormous resource all the while I could see how explosively vibrant and full of energy the city was compared to, say, Stockholm, where all the immigrants lived in the urban outskirts and the faces you saw in the city center were practically all white. Malmö, it's true, was run-down and poverty common to see, but at the same time the city vibrated in its contrasts, which all had to be brought together in synthesis and most surely were a gift to anyone who grew up there, with so many different experiences and backgrounds existing together side by side, and where a lot of what came about for that same reason came about as if for the first time, with all the freshness and vigor of the new.

"I envy them that," Linda had said one evening not so long ago after we'd picnicked in a corner of the big park and were heading home again with the kids in tow.

"Envy them what?" I said.

"The whole family out together. Parents, grandparents, children and grandchildren, uncles and cousins."

She nodded toward a congregation of people gathered around a barbecue, perhaps twenty in all, the elderly seated on chairs, the youngest running around playing. There were more like them, scattered across the lawns. The air all around smelled of smoke and grilled meat.

"It used to be like that here, too," I said. "Three generations ago, maybe. In rural areas at least. My maternal grandmother grew up with it. Well, not barbecuing in the parks, exactly. But they lived together in big families."

"It all looks so himla mysigt. They all seem to be having such a fine time," she said. "And here we come with our tiny little nuclear family. There's only us! Imagine if there'd been more of us, think of how different it would have been!"

"Yes, but our life's not that miserable, is it?"

"No, no, I don't mean that. It's just that – "

"You're a romantic. You see the aura of it, and you want it too."

She shook her head.

"It's not that I want it. It just seems so . . . well, as if there's so much more life around them."

"Your mother's stayed with us. And my mom's been here quite a lot. You're always glad to see the back of them."

"I know, but that's exactly it. It's all so centered around us, you, me, and the kids. Think what it'd be like if there were lots of others we could be with, we could forget all about ourselves!"

The sun behind us had been red and hung like a bauble above the rooftops, I remembered, and then I looked at John to see if he'd fallen asleep on my shoulder for once, but I found myself looking straight into his open eyes and stepped a few paces back.

"All right, that's your lot," I told the girls.

"But, Daddy!" Vanja said. "We've only just started!"

"Just a bit more?" said Heidi. "Please!"

"No," I said, putting John down so I could go back to my bench, and then I saw Linda crossing the circular gravel-covered area with the wall around it in the middle of the park.

"Look, Mommy's here," I said. The girls crawled from the cradle to meet her, John toddled off toward her, and her face broke into a wide and joyful smile as she crouched down to receive them. A stark contrast to the times I came home and she would be lying in bed oblivious to their expectant calls of Hello? and Mamma? as they came in.

I went over to the bench and folded the newspaper and was about to drop it into the basket under the stroller when a sudden unease came over me.

Where had it come from?

I looked over at Linda, she was on her way toward me with the children all around her. It wasn't that.

The book.

Of course. That was it.

"Hi," said Linda.

"Hi," I said. "You haven't got any cash on you, have you?"

"No, I don't think I have. What for?"

"So we could get some ice cream at the kiosk over there. I've only got twenty kronor and I don't think they take cards."

"Yes, they do now."

"Do you want ice cream?" I asked them, looking down at their little faces.

As we walked beneath the trees a few moments later on our way toward the pedestrian crossing, I argued against my unease, telling myself I hadn't written anything bad about the people now reading it, reminding myself that I'd been afraid of how Yngve would react and yet how well that had turned out.

"Were they all right at nursery today?" Linda asked.

"Yes, I think so," I said. "I didn't ask. They were happy enough when I picked them up."

We stopped at the crossing, and Linda and Heidi scrabbled to press the button first, but Vanja got in before them and pressed it triumphantly. Heidi started to cry.

"You can press it next time," I told her.

"Vanja pushed," she said.

"You shouldn't push, Vanja," said Linda. "But look, we can go over there now and then you can have your ice cream."

Heidi stayed put with her head lowered as we began to cross the road. I went back and lifted her up, and carried her the rest of the way to the kiosk.

"Why does Heidi get carried and not me?" said Vanja.

"Because she was crying," I said. "I can carry you a little on the way back."

I poked my head through the hatch and seeing no one there I rang the small shiny bell on the counter.

Jan Vidar was perhaps the person whose reaction I was most nervous about. He was and always would be fifteen to me, and I hadn't exactly depicted the world we had together back then as anything fantastic. Maybe it was fantastic to him? Maybe he gilded the past?

A woman, Romanian-looking, appeared from a small back-room and came up to the counter in front of me.

"OK," I said, looking down at the children. "Just point to the one you want, but don't be too long about it." I looked up at the woman. "Two coffees to start with. Milk in one."

"I want a . . . Calippo," said Vanja.

"Cola flavor, or the green one?" I asked her.

"The green one," she said.

"And a Calippo fruity," I said to the dark-haired woman.

"I want one, too," said Heidi.

"We'll make that two," I said. "What about you, John? Can you point?"

He pointed to an ice-cream sandwich. Whether he knew what he was doing or not was a different matter.

"And a sandwich."

She entered the amounts, I held out my card, she shoved a little card reader across the counter and pressed some keys. I inserted the card and she stepped over to the freezer. Behind the few chairs and tables, a fat young man came walking along the path with a little dog. I saw how Vanja followed it with her eyes. He was so fat I thought he must be on disability benefits. Cheap, khaki-colored shorts, air-force-gray baseball cap, black T-shirt. His entire body quivered as he went, he seemed almost to roll at the joints. I entered my PIN. The woman straightened up.

"What sort of dog was it, Vanja?" I said, pressing OK.

"A terrier, I think," she said.

Heidi sat on Linda's lap, in the shade of the parasol. John had climbed onto the chair and was trying to press a straw, now flattened at the end, into a crack in the table.

"Sorry, we're out of Calippo fruity," the woman said. "Will cola do instead?"

"Yes, that's fine."

The little card reader came abruptly to life and ejected a slow ribbon of paper from its innards. The woman handed me the two popsicles and the ice cream sandwich, then tore off the receipt, I took them over to the children, and when I came back she gave me the coffee in two paper cups with the receipt. I handed one of the cups to Linda, who was opening the wrappers, sat down at the table, and took a sip from the other.

Gunnar had been angry when Out of the World came out. But that was the first time I'd got anything published, it was completely new, and I guessed it must have been a shock for him to recognize himself in one of the characters, but more than ten years had passed since then, and the fact that my previous novel had been nominated for the Nordic Council Literature Prize must have altered things a lot; I wasn't just someone idling away his time with dreams of being a writer, I was an acclaimed author, not only nationally but internationally too, if only moderately so, but what little had been written about my books in the foreign newspapers had almost certainly been mentioned in Fædrelandsvennen: the review in Frankfurter Allgemeine that called the novel a masterpiece, and perhaps the one in The Guardian too, even if that had been more ambivalent. He almost certainly wouldn't be pleased about me writing about Dad and Grandma, but what I'd written about him could hardly give rise to displeasure, he came out well, was treated respectfully.

"I think I'm starting to get in a tizzy about going away," said Linda. "I feel a bit worked up."

An elderly man biked past with something flapping against the spokes and a pedal that scraped the chain guard.

"You mean about the train journey?" I said.

"Yes. I always get excited about traveling, I have done ever since I was little."

"What did you say, Mommy?" said Vanja.

"I said I'm feeling nervous about going away tomorrow."

"Why?" Vanja asked.

"Yes, why?" I said. "It's nice to have butterflies."

"Just think, I went on my own to Hydra when I was seven," she said. "It's not worth thinking about, is it?"

"No, it isn't."

"What isn't what?" said Vanja.

"I went all on my own to an island in Greece when I was only two years older than you are now. Well, not completely on my own, I went with a family, but my mommy and daddy weren't with me."

"That was in the seventies," I said. "They had different ideas about raising children then."

"It was extreme, even for the seventies," she said.

"Have I ever told you about the first time I traveled alone?" I said.

Linda shook her head.

"That was in the seventies too. Only I wasn't as tough as you. I was in the first grade and missed the bus home from school. I stood there crying and the caretaker came over. We had a fantastic caretaker, we used to go and see him sometimes in his workshop. Anyway, he said I could take the next bus that came along. It'd be going in the other direction, but we lived on an island, so it was bound to go past our house sooner or later. I got on and didn't recognize a soul. Then when we turned left instead of right I got scared and forgot all about what the caretaker had said, or maybe I just didn't believe him anymore. Eventually, I panicked and pulled the bell cord. The bus stopped, and there I was standing by the side of a road I'd never seen before, most likely miles from home.

"What did you do?" said Linda.

"There was another boy who got off at the same place. I told him I was lost, he said I could come home to his place, so I did. It was a dark house right next to the road. His dad called mine, and he came and picked me up."

I looked at Vanja.

"That was your grandfather," I said.

"And yours, and yours too," said Linda to Heidi and John.

"I know," said Vanja. "He's dead."

I nodded.

"He died before I was born," she said.

"Mommy's daddy died too," said Heidi.

"He died on New Year's Eve," said Vanja.

"Yes, he did," I said, and looked at Linda. She smiled.

"But you met him, Vanja," she said.

Vanja nodded gravely.

"Two times," she said. "In Stockholm."

"I was born in Stockholm," said Heidi.

"Yes, you were," said Linda, and held her tight.

The next morning I woke up at four thirty, switched off the beeping alarm, picked up my pile of clothes, and took them with me from the bedroom into the hall so I wouldn't wake Linda, picked up the two newspapers that had been dumped on the floor outside the door, put the coffeemaker on, scanned the arts and sports sections, and munched on an apple while waiting for the coffee to be ready. When it was, I drank a cup and smoked a cigarette on the balcony. The sky was a haze, the gray half-light of dawn still lingered between the buildings below, and there was something raw about it; it was mid-August and autumn would soon be here.

I lit another cigarette to put off starting work for as long as possible, but stubbed it out half-smoked and went inside to the study, switched on the computer, sat down, turned on the lamp attached to the bookshelf with a clamp, and flicked through the stack of CDs on the floor next to me, deciding on Giant Steps by the Boo Radleys, which instantly transported me back to the mood of Bergen in the early 90s. I'd barely played the album since, and for that same reason, not wanting to revive the feelings. I sat for a while debating with myself as to whether to put something else on instead, at the same time opening the manuscript of the second book and scrolling through the document. No, it wouldn't do. I picked out Josh Rouse's 1972 instead, it was soft and pleasant, verging on Muzak, and would be a good start to the day.

An hour later I heard a door open. I turned the music down and and listened. Feet padding through the hall. It had to be John or Heidi. Not that it mattered much; if one of them was up, the other would soon follow.

I opened the door and went out into the kitchen. John stood with his pillow in his hand and looked up at me. It was twenty to six.

"It's still night," I said. "Go back to bed."

"I'm not tired," he said with a twinge of resentment in his voice, as if I'd accused him of something.

"Do you want some breakfast then?" I said.

He nodded. I lifted him up into his chair, got the muesli out of the cupboard and blueberry yogurt from the fridge, poured some into his bowl, and put it on the table in front of him, then handed him a spoon, which fortunately he accepted.

More padding feet. I turned, and Heidi was standing in the doorway.

"Morning, Heidi," I said.

She didn't answer, just peered at me with narrow eyes and messed-up hair.

"I want some too," she said.

"Of course," I said.

"Hi, John," she said.

"Hi," said John.

I put a plate and spoon out for her.

"Are you all right here on your own for a few minutes?" I said.

Heidi nodded and started eating. I went into the study again, leaving the door ajar so I could hear them, and tried to get back into it again. It was harder without music, but only a few minutes later I was writing again, about a trip Geir Angell and I had made to Søgne just after his mother's funeral, when I'd been doing a reading at a rural high school. I had no idea exactly why I was writing about it, apart from the feeling the room had given me then, in the darkness under the glittering stars of winter.

"Daddy?" said Heidi all of a sudden behind me, and nearly gave me a heart attack.

"What's the matter?" I said, swiveling around.

"John wants out of his chair."

I got up and went back into the kitchen, lifted him into the air, and put him down again on the floor. His diaper was so heavy it hung between his legs. I tore open the tapes at the sides and dumped it in the bin under the sink, told him to stay put, which he did, went and got a clean one from the bathroom, then put it on him under Heidi's watchful eye.

"We want a bath," said Heidi.

"Well you can't have one," I said.

"What?" she said.

"You can't have one," I said.

"What?" she said again. It was a habit she'd got into, saying what to everything, sometimes it made her sound like she was slow-witted. I didn't care for it.

"No," I said. "You're not taking a bath."

She twisted her face angrily at me, then turned to her brother, who was down on all fours immersed in something over by the base of the wall.

"Come on, John," she said. "We'll go and play in the living room!"

It was five past six. The buses had started running outside. Their dull, heavy sounds were like groans. I went into the bedroom to wake Linda up. Vanja was asleep beside her. She usually came in from their room in the night, sometimes she was already asleep in our bed when we turned in for the night. We'd only just managed to get her to sleep in her own bed when Heidi was born, but Linda felt so sorry for her then that she let her sleep with us instead, and from then on she'd insisted we stay with her until she fell asleep. Only that wasn't enough, so if she woke up on her own she'd come into our room.

"It's ten past six," I said. "Heidi and John are already up. Can you get up now, do you think, so I can get a bit of work done?"

"Mm," she said.

I switched on the computer on the desk, logged on to my e-mail, and without expecting anything checked to see if any new messages had come in during the night. Fortunately, the only thing in the in-box was the Agderposten's daily news update which I'd been receiving every morning ever since the time I tried to access their archive to see if I could find anything in it about Dad. There'd been some technical glitch that meant I never got in, but they'd got my address and I'd never quite managed to remove my name from their mailing list. Still, it could be quite nice too, scanning its small-town news stories in the mornings. I deleted it and Googled myself, finding nothing new, surfed around a bit, and then, without Linda having stirred in the slightest, went back into the study again, closed the door behind me, put some music on, and tried to get back into it again. But the little break had been enough to put me off. When I got started in the mornings, my mind was as yet undisturbed by anything else, and the transition from sleep to text was smooth and fluid. As the day progressed I had to expend more energy to surmount an increasing resistance, and by the time the afternoon came around, the only thing I could do to eliminate it was sleep and start again.

It took nearly an hour to get into the swing of things again. Not long afterward, Linda knocked on the door wanting to know if there were any clean socks anywhere or if they could just have bare feet in their sandals. I swiveled around and gave her my coldest look. She closed the door hard again. I was seething. Their voices came from the hall, Vanja and Heidi shouting at each other. I sensed she was having problems getting them to cooperate and felt guilty enough to go out and see if I could help, though not guilty enough to look her in the eye. I stood behind Vanja, gripped her foot, and thrust it into her sandal.

"Ai!" she cried. Ow!

Always, always a Swedish ai!, never a Norwegian au!

I pushed the little straps through, bent them back and pressed them tight against the Velcro or whatever it was.

"Have they got sunscreen on?" I asked.

"I don't think they'll need any today," Linda replied.

"Are their teeth brushed?"

"John's are. Heidi's and Vanja's aren't. We haven't got that far yet."

I tore open the bathroom door, stuck the two toothbrushes under the running tap, squeezed the toothpaste on, and went out again, handed one to Linda and stood in front of Heidi with the other.

"Open your mouth," I said.

She pressed her lips together.

Sometimes it was for fun, but not this time; the look she gave me was narrow and rebellious.

"Is it because I've been in a bad mood?" I asked.

She nodded.

"Well, I'm not anymore," I said. "Do you think you could open your mouth now?"

She didn't.

"You don't want me to use force, do you?"

"What?"

"Use force. To make you brush your teeth, even though you don't want to."

"What?"

"I'm finished!" said Vanja, and flashed her sister a cheeky smile. John stood trying to open the front door, he was on tiptoes and had managed to get his fingers on the handle, but couldn't quite get the grip to pull it down.

"Mommy has to do it," said Heidi.

"OK," I said, handing the toothbrush to Linda, for whom Heidi immediately opened her mouth and bared her teeth.

"Have a nice time," I said.

No one answered.

"You could at least say goodbye," I said, looking at Linda.

"Bye then," she said. "But I'm coming back before I go."

"OK," I said, and returned to the study. I sat there motionless in the chair and waited until I heard them get into the elevator, then the elevator as it began its descent through the building, before clicking on the minimized document that within a second unfolded on the screen in front of me.

Linda came back half an hour later. I went out to to say hello, she wanted us to sit with a coffee on the balcony, and we sat there for ten minutes each smoking a cigarette and hardly exchanging a word.

"Have a nice time all of you while I'm gone," she said when eventually she stood with her suitcase in front of her in the hall.

"I'm sure we will," I said.

"I'll give you a call before their bedtime tonight, is that OK?"

"Of course. Take it easy up there. And say hello to Helena and . . ."

"Fredrik. I will."

We kissed each other, she closed the door behind her and I went and checked my e-mails, one from Play.com, otherwise nothing, before going back into the study, where I sat down and started writing again. I spent half an hour talking to Geir Angell on the phone, ate a packet of cold fish cakes for lunch, made a fresh pot of coffee, and then when I came back in from the balcony there was an e-mail from Gunnar.

The subject line said "Verbal rape."

Opening it was out of the question.

I stood up and went through the apartment, grabbing the phone on the way, sat down on the balcony, and called Geir Angell again.

"That wouldn't be you again, would it?" he said.

"I just got an e-mail," I said.

"From your uncle?"

"Yeah."

"And he doesn't like you?"

"Don't know, I haven't read it. I'm too scared."

"How bad can it be? Get in the game. Stop being an ostrich."

"The subject line says 'Verbal rape.'"

"Like I said."

"I'll have to read it," I said. "Might as well get it over with. Listen, I'll send it on to you, you can read it as well, and I'll call you back right after. OK?"

"Sure."

We hung up and I lit a cigarette and stared out across the rooftops. My heart was beating so fast it felt like it was trying to get out.

Verbal rape.

I swallowed a mouthful of coffee. I thought about going for a walk somewhere and leaving it for a bit, sitting in a park maybe, or looking in the shops. But I knew the thought of what the e-mail might contain wouldn't let go of me, that I wouldn't be able to relax whatever I did.

I got to my feet and went into the bedroom, clicked on his message even before sitting down, and read it through as fast as I could, as if the dread consisted in the encounter between my eyes and his words on the screen, rather than in what they said.

I'd imagined all kinds of things, but not this.

It was as if he were standing there screaming. It was my mother who was behind the novel, he wrote. She hated the Knausgaards, and always had. For all those years, she had indoctrinated me with her hatred, brainwashed me, until eventually I had lost contact with the real world completely and written this despicable, immoral, and self-centered shambles of a book so I could get back at the family and line my pockets. It was an act far worse than anything I believed my father had ever done to me when I was growing up. The source of all my books was my mother, all of them carried the mark of her hidden revenge motives. They were riddled with untruths, mean-spirited depictions, and an outlook on human nature he found completely alien to the family. I needed therapy.

He wrote that he was holding the publishing director personally responsible and would be taking action for damages if the manuscript came out. He left his e-mail unsigned.

Having read the e-mail, I barely managed to get to my feet again. I couldn't think straight. All I knew, as I typed Geir Angell's address and forwarded the e-mail to him, was that I had to talk to someone. I went through the apartment again. I stood in front of the window in the living room and glanced down at the square below, went into the kitchen and stared out at the rooftops, went into the children's room, glanced around, Heidi and Vanja's bunk beds, John's crib, turned and went out again, into the bathroom, turned on the tap and washed my hands, went into the living room, opened the door of the long balcony, the sun was shining and it was hot, I gripped the railing and leaned forward to look down on all the people below as they passed along the sidewalk, let go and went back inside, paced the floor, and then I made a decision, there was a document attached to the e-mail, I might as well read that too, it certainly couldn't get any worse.

It was a letter addressed to Sissel Norunn Hatløy, my mother. In it, he informed her that he had now read "the author's" latest manuscript. It was such that he had no words to describe what he thought of me. But he did so anyway. A concentration of the most negative characteristics imaginable. I glorified myself, I was a helpless wretch, a base individual. The strange thing, Gunnar wrote, was that the people I was attacking were the Knausgaards, whereas she, my mother, was completely untarnished. Not a single word against her had the author written. Why? His own picture of her was rather different, he wrote: she had neglected Yngve and me entirely when we were growing up, all she had been interested in was herself and what he called her quasi-philosophical ego, which I was now perpetuating. Not a thought for other people, only herself. No empathy, no feelings of solicitude, only self-infatuation. She ought to have been a pillar for my father when we needed her most, but she hadn't. He called it neglect. That was the essence, the important thing. I had never understood that because she had brainwashed me. I believed everything she said, and because she hated the Knausgaards I hated them too. Then he went on to describe the way he remembered her when she first came into their family.

He'd been only a young man at the time, and Mom's presence had clearly made an impression on him, because he used the strongest words to describe the way she came across, so cold and inhospitable anyone would think it was a glacier he was describing. There was no warmth in her, and no personality, she took no part in the family's life together, but would sit on her own in a corner, reading a magazine, occasionally scowling at them as she puffed on her cigarette. She communicated with no one and never had a kind word for any child in her vicinity, which I took to be referring to himself. It went on: she never once invited him to their home after he grew up, and never paid a visit to see his children, and in the company of his own sociable and loving mother she seemed positively miserable. In his words, he had felt sorry for his elder brother having to live with Mom and had always wondered why she turned out the way she had, what could have made her come across so unpleasantly, and he recalled a trip to Vestland to visit her and her family when he was twelve years old. He described her mother, my grandmother, as autistic, racked with all manner of neuroses and feelings of inferiority. He referred to the farm where they lived as wretched and called it a peasant smallholding. When he met my grandmother at the time, when he was twelve, he realized how such an abnormal desire to be someone could arise in her daughter, and how her son, my uncle Kjartan, could end up writing poetry about crows, something he apparently considered as ridiculous as it was inane and shameful. My mother lacked upbringing, had never developed any ability to show empathy or solicitude, to create a loving, caring environment, and this she had passed on to me, who suffered from exactly the same deficiencies.

He was writing to her to underline the fact that she remained responsible for me, who he referred to as "your friendless son," now that I was so completely far gone as was the case. He likened me to Dad, stating that I was just as unreliable as he had been and suffered from the same personality disorder. Then he compared me to Mom and declared that I was just as cynical and lacking in empathy as her. But was that anywhere in the book? No, that perspective, which apparently was the true perspective, was totally absent. Mom's culpability in Dad's demise was obvious to anyone who cared to see, he believed. Dad never got what he needed from her, which was to say love, intimacy, companionship, warmth. Gunnar had realized this even at the age of twelve, but to his brother, Dad, such an insight had come all too late.

By way of conclusion he asked her to get me to stop the project and to find me a place in a psychiatric ward somewhere instead. Otherwise, if we went ahead and the book got published, he would take action for damages. He was going to put a stop to this hateful attack on the Knausgaard family, which she was behind, by whatever means might be necessary.

The letter was signed not in his name, but as my father's brother.

I lay down on the bed and remained there motionless. Suddenly, this moment was all there was. I can't recall its exact nature or how it felt, eighteen months having passed since, and I am no longer in the grip of its explosive alarm. I can comprehend it, and even comprehend it well, but I can't resurrect it. Reading those messages again now, I am filled with the most unpleasant emotions, and they confirm to me something I've always known, always felt, but compared to the force by which it became apparent to me at the time, this is merely a shadow. During those days in August 2009 it paralyzed me totally. If I'd had even the slightest inkling that such anger lay in store for me I might have been able to prepare myself for it and thereby have softened the impact, or, and even more probable, simply not written the novel in the first place. But in all the time I'd been working on it I had never, not once, anticipated a reaction remotely like it.

The phone rang in the hall.

It had to be Gunnar.

There was no way I could speak to him. It would be the same as when I'd done something wrong as a boy and heard Dad's door open downstairs. He's coming. He's coming.

But it could have been Geir Gulliksen or Geir Berdahl too, seeing as how the e-mail had been sent to them as well.

I jumped to my feet and dashed into the hall. Just as I got there it stopped ringing. I lifted it from the charger and pressed to see incoming calls.

10, said the display.

It meant the call was from a hidden number. Geir Angell's was always a hidden number, so it was probably him. I usually joked about it being only the police and Geir whose numbers couldn't be seen. But it wasn't only a joke, because somewhere deep down I was still expecting a call from the police.

I took the phone with me out onto the balcony and called Geir.

"Hello, Gunnar speaking," he said. "Is that my despicable, friendless nephew? How dare you call this number?"

"Did you just call?" I said.

"Well, if you're going to be like that about it, yes," he said. "What's up, are you in a bad mood now?"

"Bad isn't the word. Have you read his e-mail?"

"Of course I have. He has a fine turn of phrase, your uncle, hasn't he?"

"He has, yes."

"I couldn't stop laughing."

"I bet you couldn't."

"Forget about him. He's angry with you. It's not hard to understand. But that's all it is. It's not like you've done anything wrong."

"Obviously I have. And he's going to take me to court. I don't doubt him for a second."

"But that'll be excellent! You should hope he does, it'd be the stupidest thing he could do. You'll be rolling in money! Everyone'll be wanting your books if it comes to a court case! This is literary history in the making. And you'll be a millionaire. There's no better scenario."

"I can think of a couple."

"Come on! What have you done exactly? You've written a book about your life, from where you stand. It's all about liberty. Liberty's something you take. If it's given, then you're a slave. You wanted to write about your life the way it is. There's a price for that. That price is what you're looking at now. You didn't think about your uncle, which means you've been thoughtless. That's what it costs. Yes, he's angry with you. Yes, I can understand that. He's entitled to be angry with you, from where he stands. But that's where it ends. Do you get what I'm saying? You haven't written anything bad about him. You've written about your own father. That's your prerogative, your fucking inheritance, that's what he left you. No one can deny you that. They can be angry with you, they can be seething mad, they can make life difficult for you and your family, but that's it. You didn't do anything wrong. You have my complete forgiveness. It's only a pity I wasn't a Catholic priest."

"Yeah."

"What do you mean yeah? Get a grip, man. You'll be rich. You should be laughing."

"It's no laughing matter."

"Of course it is! And reading that e-mail made me realize where all this is coming from. You're not the only lunatic in the family. You're all like that. Your dad, your uncle, you."

I said nothing. Predictably, his attempts at cheering me up weren't helping in the slightest, but I was glad he was trying nevertheless. We talked for an hour or so, about the same thing the whole time, the letters and the new situation they had presented us with. Geir thought I should just go with the flow. Moralizing had never created anything of its own, all it did was reject the created. And the created was the same as life itself. Why reject life?

Geir was a Nietzschean through and through. He could see things from the outside, that was his strength, but at the same time it meant that outside was where he was. I was in the middle of it all, and if there was anything in which I could find no comfort it was vitalism, because vitalism was the same as transgression, and if this was about anything, it was basically about fear of trangression.

As we talked, the phone beeped for an incoming call. I ignored it the first time, but when it came again I said to Geir I'd have to hang up and see who it was.

At first the display said simply there was an incoming call. I didn't take it, it could have been anybody. But then the number appeared. It was from Oslo. For all I knew, Gunnar could have been in Oslo, but the chances were slender, and besides I thought I recognized the first three digits, they belonged to the publisher Oktober.

I pressed the green key and put the receiver to my ear at the same time as I opened the door and went into the living room.

"Hello?" I said, going over to the window.

"Hi, it's Geir Berdahl."

"Hi."

"I got the e-mail from your uncle."

"Yes," I said.

He laughed uneasily. I stood at the window and put my forehead against the cool glass.

"Strong stuff."

"Yes."

"We need to tackle this properly."

"Yes."

I went over to the bookshelf and stared at the titles.

"We need to accommodate your uncle as far as possible. And we need to give ourselves some room to maneuver. We certainly can't allow him to make this a matter for the courts. I'm assuming it's not a problem for you to change the names of everyone on your father's side of the family?"

"No, not at all," I said, and went over to the opposite wall, turned and went back. "No, no problem. I offered to do that in the letter I sent him."

"Good. Then I can tell him we're changing the names. And anonymizing what needs to be anonymized, as far as we can."

"Yes."

"I'll get in touch with a law firm we use. Just so that you know. We need to be sure that whatever we do is current and above board, you realize that, of course."

"Yes."

"You've certainly got his back up, though, haven't you?"

"I'll say."

I went into the kitchen and stood there looking at the row of cupboard's above the sink. I went into the kitchen and stood there looking at the row of cupboards above the sink, one of them was open, one of the shelves, the one where we kept the glasses, was nearly empty. They must have been in the dishwasher.

"He might just want to put the wind up you a bit," he said.

"He has."

"All right, Karl Ove. Keep working at this as best you can. I'll call back once I've spoken to the lawyers."

"OK."

"Bye for now."

"Bye," I said, and hung up. I went back into the living room, then through the hall to the bathroom, where I turned on a tap and rinsed my hands in hot water. I went outside onto the balcony, but realized I couldn't sit there and smoke on my own, it would be too empty and still, so I went and got the phone I'd put down on the kitchen counter and called Linda.

"Hi!" she said.

"You sound happy," I said, going back into the living room and stepping up to the window. "Have you arrived?"

"No, I'm still on the train. I slept for a bit. Now I'm reading. What about you?"

"Not so good, I'm afraid. I got an e-mail from Gunnar. He's seething. Out of his mind with rage, pretty much."

"Oh no," she said. "What does he say?"

"You can read it when you get back. He wants to stop the book getting published, and if he can't he says he'll take us to court."

"You're joking?"

"I'm afraid not. It's about as bad as you can imagine."

"I can tell from your voice. Do you want me to come home again? I will if you want."

"No, no. No. Definitely not. Don't even think about it. You deserve this little break on your own. Everything's fine here. It's just the shock, that's all. It'll pass. I spoke to Geir Berdahl from Oktober, they're getting the lawyers in and trying to patch things up as best they can. I'm in good hands. Everything's fine."

"Are you sure?"

"Yes."

"OK."

"I just wanted you to know, that's all. Apart from that, everything's fine. I'll give you a call tonight, we can talk about it some more then if you want. Is that OK?"

It was OK. Linda had never met Gunnar, but she'd heard a lot about him. And it had left an impression on her that he'd stood there in the garden at Mom's without wanting to come in and meet the children or Linda herself. He was also the only one of those invited who hadn't come to Vanja's christening. Neither of these occurrences had seemed odd to me at the time; in the garden he was in a hurry, and as for the christening he simply hadn't been able to come. Now I saw things in a different light, the light of hatred in which he had written his letter. That hatred couldn't have arisen only now, suddenly, merely as a result of the book I had written, it must have been there long before, latent through all those years. I had felt it, had always felt it, and yet always thought it was my own paranoid unease. I didn't think anyone liked me, but that couldn't have been true, not really, he was my father's brother, why wouldn't he like me? If I did something he didn't approve of, wouldn't he give me the benefit of the doubt? That was how I looked at it, to combat what I told myself was all in my head, but now, in the tone of his letter, all semblance of such thinking vanished. That was how it was, and it had been like that for a long time, perhaps always. In his view, my writing the book confirmed to him what he had always thought about me. I had a small, though in my own view excessively large ego. I was unreliable and deceitful. I'd always felt it whenever I was with them, that I was deceitful. How did it come to that? If ever there was a thing I disliked and didn't want in my life it was deceit. Deceit could only make others, and thereby myself, look upon me as deceitful.

Why?

There was a simple answer. I had something to hide from them. A part of me I couldn't show or use in their company. And this fact, that there was something I had to avoid at all cost, made my behavior seem furtive in some way, thereby damaging my entire person and character. I tried to be like them when we were together, to talk like them, to be among them in their way, but in recognizing that I wasn't like that at all, like them, among them in their way, he saw through me. The betrayal started there.

I stood for a moment with the phone in my hand, staring through the living-room window at the buildings outside. I couldn't work, I couldn't read, I couldn't watch a film. I couldn't go out and meet someone either, not knowing anyone in Malmö well enough. All I could do was talk to someone on the phone. It wouldn't help, but it would make the moment tolerable, the mere fact of there being someone outside all this who would talk to me about it. So in the two hours that remained of the day, before I had to pick up the children from the nursery, I was on the phone. I talked to Geir Gulliksen about what to do, I talked to Espen, who told me I musn't change a word of the manuscript, not to give in to pressure, but to dig in and endure, I talked to Tore, who knew what it was like writing about things in a way that approached actual biography and how that could be taken by family, and

I talked to Yngve. He was distraught, he'd always got on well with Gunnar and there was no way he wanted to get caught in the crossfire. I told him it was my novel, I was the one who had written it, and that he had nothing at all to do with it, which Gunnar would surely understand. The way I saw it, Gunnar had always liked Yngve, always gone out of his way to keep in touch with him. Finally, I called Mom, she was on her way home from work and hadn't seen his e-mail, but would open it as soon as she got in. By then it was ten to three. I put my white sneakers on, got the keys from the cupboard, took the trash bag with me and went down into the basement, where I tossed it in one of the big garbage containers, went out through the back door, and followed one of the streets that ran behind the building in the direction of the nursery, the way I always did when I was feeling down and didn't want to be seen by anyone. I recognized the feeling I got when I emerged under the warm, deep-blue sky of August and walked along the exhaust-filled Föreningsgatan, past the cluster of figures who always stood smoking on the corner by the traffic lights, crossed over, went down the little stump of cobbled street up to the next junction with its row of young deciduous trees, dark green and shaded by the tall line of buildings, it was the same feeling I'd had the days after Dad had died, and the days after getting the phone call with its accusation of rape, the way the surroundings seemed almost to be erased, as if I'd wandered inside a zone so charged with force it extinguished everything else in its vicinity. I saw everything, I saw the cars, I saw the Lidl supermarket, I saw the pedestrians and the cyclists, registered what they were wearing, mostly shorts and T-shirts, skirts and dresses, but here and there a nice shirt and trousers, I saw the Montessori school on the other side of the crossing, the African hair salon, the Polish food store, and the row of little antique shops as I walked past, I saw the owner of one sitting on a chair on the sidewalk, as so often before, his old golden retriever dozing next to him, but none of it mattered, it was without substance and possessed no weight. And in this way I saw my own children too, as they came to greet me in the nursery's backyard. I bent down, I held them tight, because it was what I had to do, but not even that had substance enough for me to extract myself from my mood.

Two of the staff were sitting on a bench chatting while kids ran about playing all around them. The yard was asphalt with at one end a windowless wall maybe six stories high that looked mostly like the wall of a fortress and blocked out the sun for the better part of the day. Up against the wall was the sandpit and next to it a three-meter-tall playhouse. The storeroom on the other side was full of tricycles, bikes with training wheels, buckets and spades, balls and hockey sticks, as well as a miscellany of plastic toys that at the end of the day lay strewn across the entire area. The parents took turns putting in a week's work every six months, besides taking care of administrative duties and the day-to-day cleaning. I had done my best to avoid any position of responsibility, had never involved myself in the committee, for instance, never been in charge of human resources, recruitment or finance, always making sure to take on the most practical and least prestigious job of all, as part of the cleaning group. It was wholly manual work and it meant cleaning the entire nursery maybe five or six weekends spread over six months. Besides that, I cleaned on the days when the daily cleaning roster said it was my turn. Still, it suited me OK, requiring nothing more than the time it took, so when I was finished that was it. The only drawback was that every time I let myself in to clean on a Sunday evening I felt the strong urge to do a good job, which meant I always ended up spending a lot more time on it than was necessary. Most likely that was the reason I was asked to take charge of the cleaning group after my first six-month stint. I said yes, and from then on was charged with organizing the spring clean as well as drawing up rosters and keeping supplies of everything we needed, which didn't bother me that much, but when the year came to an end and jobs were to be redelegated at the annual meeting, I asked to go back to being an ordinary cleaner again. There was something about the prominence of being in charge that I didn't care for, as well as the fact that it also involved having to pass on any complaints about the cleaning from the staff to the parents who had been sloppy, which happened on occasion, and I could stand there wanting the floor to swallow me up, full of shame at having to inform them, because they were adults, and who was I to tell them they hadn't done their job properly and would have to do it again? I could do it once, twice in a pinch, but that was it.

I went up to the staff. Nadje, who grew up in Iraq and always kept the children under strict control, and Karin, one of the regular supply staff, formerly full-time, who had always felt very affectionate toward my children.

"How did it go today?" I asked.

"Fine," said Nadje. "No problems. John got his cheek scratched, not much, but he had a little cry about it and he's fine now."

"Who scratched him?"

"Heidi did. She said she was sorry," said Karin. "She was just as upset as John."

"OK," I said. "We'll be off, then."

I turned and called their names. John came right away, but Heidi, pedaling away at top speed over the asphalt with Malou in the trailer behind her, gave no indication of having heard me. Vanja was lying in the sandpit having her legs covered in sand, with Katinka doing the shoveling. I went over to them.

"Come on, it's time to go home," I said.

"Lite till, pappa, var så snäll," said Vanja with a grin. Please, Daddy, just a bit longer.

"Five minutes, that's all," I said, and sat down on the big stone opposite the bench. My body ached, and after having let go of Gunnar for a few seconds my thoughts seemed to return to him with renewed force. I'd been hoping that being with the kids would help and give me a new perspective, but it was just the opposite, I found myself feeling sorry for them having me for a father, for the person they saw and related to wasn't the same as who I was inside, and this would gradually dawn on them when they were old enough to be able to judge the people around them in terms of personal qualities and character traits, rather than just how they appeared to them in ordinary interaction. I wasn't good enough for them, but that wasn't the sad part of it, the sad part was that they didn't know.

"How's Linda?" Karin asked.

"She's fine," I said. "She's away at a friend's in the country at the moment, enjoying a break. Just for a few days."

"That's brave of you, having all the kids on your own."

"No, not at all," I said. "They're no bother."

That they never gave me any trouble was because I was strict with them, far stricter than when Linda was around. I wouldn't put up with things and gave them no leeway. They found this out soon enough and acted accordingly, but it wasn't good. The nursery staff didn't notice, seeing me only at drop-off and pickup times, and in those situations, with so many eyes upon me, my behavior was no different.

For crying out loud.

What a fucking mess.

How the hell could I ever have put myself in such a spot? What was I trying to do? Why couldn't I keep all the badness to myself like other people did? But no, I had to go and shove it in everyone's face, and drag others down with me in the fall.

Gunnar had done nothing apart from living his life as best he could, and now this.

I felt like shaking my fists at the sky and yelling at the top of my lungs. Instead I sat and stared at Heidi as she bombed around on her bike, John, who had climbed up next to Karin and now sat gazing up at the roof, Vanja, whose legs were now almost buried in sand, a stiff smile on my face to indicate how great I thought it was having children.

I stood up and went over to Vanja.

"Time to go home," I said. "No buts."

"But I've got no legs!" she said. "Look!"

"Is there a shark in this sand?" I said.

"No," she said. "I was born like this."

"All right, but it's still time to go."

"Why?"

"Because."

"OK," she said, getting to her feet again and brushing away the sand that didn't fall off on its own. I went over to John and lifted him into the air, he giggled until he realized he was going in the stroller, but after protesting a bit he gave in. Now only Heidi was left. I wasn't in the mood to look for her and shouted for her to come right away. When she didn't, I pressed the button for the gate, walked the stroller over toward it with Vanja holding tight and then opened it. We're going home, Heidi, I shouted, and with that she came running.

"Vänta!" she called out. "Vänta!"

"Yes, we're waiting," I said. "But you didn't come when you were called!"

In a sulk, she gripped the stroller without speaking. Sometimes all I had to do was look at her and wink, or make a face as if I was angry with her, for her sulk to dissolve into a smile, often a devilish one at that, and then came the annoyance at having been fooled, at which point she would hit me, but with a gleam in her eyes. Other times her resentment lay deeper. This was one of those times.

We walked along the sidewalk, the street was full of cyclists, people on their way home from work. Vanja couldn't stop talking. I listened with half an ear in case she looked up at me expecting a reaction of some sort, and noted that she was weighing up the pros and cons of the two breeds of dog she'd been interested in that week. Heidi walked along on the other side of the stroller, silent and in her mood, while John had descended into his usual stroller coma.

"Where's John? Did we leave him behind at the nursery?" I said, thinking he needed some attention too, in case he felt left out.

"Here! I'm here, Papa!" he cried, turning his face to look at me.

"There he is, our little John-boy!" I said, glancing ahead toward the pizza restaurant on the corner, where a few customers were sitting out eating under the green parasols. Some afternoons when I'd come past with the kids the place looked like there was a mafia convention going on inside. Elderly Italian guys in brown suits, short and stocky, with shifty eyes.

I looked back over my shoulder. Behind us, a woman in a black dress came hurrying along, almost dragging a boy by the arm, he was maybe nine years old, they overtook us and about ten meters farther on she shoved him up against the wall, where he pulled his pants down and started pissing while she glanced up and down the street. I couldn't believe my eyes. His piss flowed across the sidewalk.

"What's he doing?" said Vanja, looking from them to me.

"It looks like he's having a pee," I said.

The boy shook himself and zipped up his fly, and then they hurried over the road and continued on along the other sidewalk, whereas we turned left at the bike shop and made our way toward Södra Förstadsgatan. Just before the 7-Eleven we came to a halt. Heidi refused to go a step farther.

"I'm tired," she said.

"Oh, Heidi," I said. "Come on, it's not far, we'll be home in a minute."

She shook her head.

"I want in the stroller," she said.

"But it's not big enough for two, it'll break. Remember when the wheel came off?"

"I want some fruit," she said.

"You can have some fruit, but not here. You can have a banana when we get to the shop."

"I want it from that shop," she said, pointing back from where we came.

"You want to go back?" I said. "All that way?"

"Yes."

Vanja, who was still standing on the other side holding on to the stroller, laughed.

"Vanja," I said. "That's enough, don't interfere."

"She laughed at me," said Heidi. Heidi hated more than anything the feeling that people were laughing at her.

"No, she didn't," I said. "We'll walk on to the shop and you can get some fruit there."

Heidi looked at me. Then she turned and ran off as fast as she could along the sidewalk. She stopped halfway and glared at me in defiance.

"Stay right here, Vanja," I said. "Promise?"

Vanja nodded and I ran after Heidi. As soon as she saw me coming she set off again. As I caught up with her she stopped and wrapped her arms around a lamppost as tightly as she could.

"That's enough from you," I said, wrenching her away and carrying her back to the stroller. She screamed at the top of her lungs. People stopped and stared. It was what she wanted. But they couldn't see that. They thought I was hitting her or something. I thought the same thing myself whenever I saw mothers or fathers stooped over their children like that, their aggressive body language always made me think they had to be bad parents, people of the worst possible kind, even though I knew what it was like.

I put her down.

She yelled and said she wasn't going anywhere.

"Do you want me to carry you?"

She shook her head.

"What do you suggest then?"

"Jag vill ha en frukt! Från den affären!" she yelled. I want fruit! From that shop!

I lost control immediately. I grabbed her hard by the arm, pushed my face into hers, and hissed at her.

"That's enough from you! Do you understand? Come here!"

Tears streamed down her cheeks.

"Do you hear me?"

"I won't!" she screamed. "Du är dum! Du är en skitpappa!" You're stupid! You're a horrible daddy!

"What did you say?" I spat, trying to keep my voice down so as to not give anyone watching ammunition.

"Du är en skitpappa!"she said.

Vanja grinned.

"It's nothing to smile about!" I said, and right away her face changed to serious. But then, for some incomprehensible reason, I smiled too, and Vanja started to laugh.

"You're all laughing at me!" Heidi yelled. And then she ran off again. This time she only made it a couple of meters before I caught her and hauled her back over my shoulder, then held her out in front of me.

"Are you going to walk with us?"

She shook her head.

"Put me down!" she shouted.

"Do you want me to ask John if he'll walk? So you can sit in the stroller?"

She nodded.

John, realizing what was happening, was already gripping the stroller tightly with both hands.

The thought occurred to me that Heidi might have a bruise on her arm in the morning. It made me think of a case I'd read about, in Norway, a registered nanny who had broken a child's leg forcing him into his stroller.

"Come on, John," I said. "I'll carry you, and Heidi can sit in the stroller."

"My stroller," said John.

"I'll carry him," said Vanja.

He went for it! I lifted him onto her back, he put his arms around her and held tight while Heidi got into the stroller, and our little circus procession finally set off again. Vanja could only manage as far as the 7-Eleven, but being out of the stroller already, John didn't mind at all being carried on my arm instead.

Heidi had fallen asleep even before we got to the supermarket. So that was why, she really had been tired. I bought some falukorv sausage, a recipe mix for beef stroganoff, a packet of rice, ingredients for a salad, milk and yogurt, a large Pepsi Max. I was angry with myself for taking my frustrations out on the children. And yet it didn't stop me being strict with Vanja as we passed through the supermarket. No, I said. No, you're not having one of those. Come here, now. Come here, I said! Oh no, you don't! It was like somehow existing on different levels, all of which had suddenly become active at the same time. One that was absorbed in the letter from Gunnar and an almost savage feeling of despair. One that was thinking about what to have for dinner, and that steered the shopping cart around the store accordingly. One that regretted having treated Heidi the way I had before. One that was annoyed by Vanja's behavior. One that was sad to see her obey, because maybe it meant I was strangling her spirit. One that was pleased she did as she was told.

The arm I was using to carry John was aching from his weight by the time it got to be our turn at the checkout. I put him down so I could place the groceries on the conveyor and he ambled off to the end and tried to climb up, it was one of those things he liked to do, to kneel on the shelf underneath and watch the groceries come gliding along. I lifted him up, then took the last items from the cart, inserted my card into the card reader, keyed in my PIN number, confirmed the amount when it appeared on the display, removed the card, and slid it back in my pocket.

I bagged the groceries, lifted John onto my arm, and then we set off home.

"Who did you play with at dagis today?" I said, and looked at Vanja, mostly to see if she was feeling affected by my harshness. "Benjamin or Katinka? Or Lovisa?"

"Inte Lovisa," she said. Not Lovisa. "Og liiite Benjamin." And Benjamin a teeny bit.

A beggar, one of the most active, had stationed himself outside the bank. He was on his knees with his hands folded in front of him, rocking backward and forward as he glared at the passersby. In front of him was a cap with some coins in it.

"Why's he sitting like that?" said Vanja.

"He's begging," I said. "He wants money."

"Why hasn't he got any money?"

"I don't know," I said. "He probably doesn't have a job. So he begs to get money for food."

"Why didn't you give him any?"

"Because he's not doing anything. If he'd been playing an instrument or something I'd have given him some. That's what I usually do, anyway. But sometimes I might give something to beggars anyway. If I feel sorry for them. Never much, though."

"Why didn't you give him any then?"

"What a lot of questions," I said, and smiled.

She smiled back.

"He's most probably from Eastern Europe. That's a group of countries a long way away. They come here to beg for money. They're a kind of gang."

"A gang of thieves? Are they thieves?"

"Not exactly. But they've basically made it their job. Which means there's no point begging anymore. Begging's not a job."

I laughed at my reasoning and Vanja smiled at me. I picked up speed so we could cross while the light was still green. On the other side of the road, the old saxophonist sat playing his amputated little tune. Now I'd have to give him something. I dipped into my pocket and fished out what was there, stared at the coins that lay in my palm, and handed Vanja five kronor.

"Do you want to give him this?" I asked.

She looked up at me with fright in her eyes. Then she nodded, a grave little nod, and stepped forward almost on tiptoe, slow, measured paces, and tossed the coin into his open instrument case. He winked at her, and she scurried back to my side.

We needed to get some fruit as well. The stall didn't take cards, so I put John down on the ground and waited my turn at the ATM, glancing at the faces of those standing around or passing the long curve of the building that occupied one corner of the square and on whose top floor we lived. I was keeping an eye out for Gunnar. I knew the chances of him turning up here were minimal, but there was little that was rational about this, it was basically all feelings, and the depths of those feelings were unfathomable.

The woman in front of me, with short sandy hair and glasses and an almost cone-shaped body, snatched her receipt from the machine and stuck her card back in her pocket, casting a quick wary glance at me. I inserted my card and tapped in my PIN, withdrew three hundred kronor, and checked to see what John was doing while I waited for the transaction to complete, he was already on his way over to the fruit stall, hugging the wall of the building, small as a tree stump.

"Do you want to hold the money, Vanja?" I said.

"Can I keep it?"

"No, but you can pay for the fruit."

"I don't want to."

"OK," I said. "Give it to me then, I'll do it. Look at John, have you seen him? Do you think he's forgotten all about us?"

She laughed when she realized he'd gone over to the shoe shop. I wheeled the stroller over to the stall, then trotted off to bring him back, picked out a bunch of bananas, put some apples and oranges in a couple of bags, filled another with green grapes, and handed the whole lot to the stallholder, who I supposed was from Turkey, or perhaps Macedonia or Albania. He weighed the fruit and put it all in a big white carrier bag, I handed him some money, and when he gave me the change I saw he'd knocked eight kronor off the price, I thanked him and crossed the square with Heidi still asleep in the stroller, handed the key card to Vanja, who held it up to the panel and pushed the door open. I wheeled the stroller inside and turned it around so I could drag it up the two steps. Heidi's head bumped this way and that, but without her waking up. John was already at the elevator, trying to reach up and press the button.

"You're too little," I said. "Try again next year."

"Lift me up!" he said.

I did, and held him up so he could see the elevator through the small rectangular window in the door when it came gliding down to find us.

When we got upstairs I pushed the stroller into the hall. If I woke Heidi up now she'd cry and whine for an hour at least, and I wasn't in the mood. The price for leaving her be was that she wouldn't be able to sleep when she went to bed tonight.

I put a film on for them so I could make the dinner in peace. Then I gave them each an apple, got the groceries out of the bags and sorted them, fruit in the fruit bowl in the cupboard, milk in the fridge, vegetables on the counter, falukorv on the chopping board. I'd thought about boiling some rice but changed my mind, there was still some macaroni left, we could have that instead. I went and got the phone in the hall, called Geir Angell, measured out some water and milk, put it in a saucepan, added the recipe mix, and started stirring all before he answered.

"What are you up to?" I asked. "You normally answer right away."

"I was in the bath, my book got wet and I had to dry it with the hair dryer."

"The hair dryer?"

"That's right, the hair dryer."

I made an incision in the tight dark red sheath of plastic around the sausage, tore it away, and began chopping the meat into little chunks.

"How's it going?" Geir asked. "Still as bad?"

"Still as bad."

I filled another saucepan with water and put it on the heat.

"He's got me in his power. Him turning against me is the worst that could happen. But being scared stiff of him is only part of it. There's the issue itself. I've offended him. He didn't do anything, he didn't ask for this. And once it gets published he won't be able to defend himself against it either. It's his mother, after all. They're real people."

"Have you ever been in doubt about it?" Geir asked.

"No, but you know what it's like when you're writing."

"I know what it's like to be written about."

"You didn't call for two days. You were pissed off with me."

"At first, yes. But then I thought about it. I think Ernst Billgren got it right when he was asked to comment on having appeared in Den högsta kasten. He said he was aware there was a character in the book with the same name as him. In my case, I can't see it that way, what you've written about is too close to home for that, but the point is that he indicates an escape route that's open to any person in a novel. There's a character in that book who's got the same name as me."

"But you're a literary person. I've never seen a book in Gunnar's house. I don't think he reads. That makes it a different thing altogether."

"You talk about him like he was defenseless! For God's sake, didn't you read what he wrote? He's making you out to be half-baked! And sending it off to your publisher! He's out to destroy you, Karl Ove. He's not defenseless. You can't just sit there and let him get on with it. I bet you've even thought about not publishing the book at all?"

"That goes without saying."

"In which case you'd be letting an accountant in Kristiansand decide the path of Norwegian literature. You can't do that, can you?"

"I will publish it."

I went to the cupboard and got the box of macaroni out, shook some into the boiling water, stirred a bit with a fork, and turned the heat down.

"The question is by what right. The right of literature? That means I'm saying literature is more important than the life of the individual. And not only that, I'm saying my literature is more important than his life."

"But it's not his life! It's your father's life. He's the brother, you're the son. The son's closer."

I angled the chopping board over the saucepan and scraped the chunks of sausage into the sauce, took four plates out of the cupboard and put them on the table, opened the drawer and got the knives and forks out.

"And then there's the law," I said.

"The law can't preside over literature."

"Of course it can."

"Of course it does, would be more accurate. Mykle was taken to court, but his book still gets read."

"There's a big difference between offending the sexual morals of the day and offending an individual. Besides, there was another aspect to the Mykle case. Maybe it was what broke him in the end. The people he wrote about recognized themselves. And not just in any old context. All the women he slept with recognized themselves in his descriptions. That was what the scandal was really all about. Tarjei Vesaas spoke about it, as far as I remember, once he realized. 'Rather unfortunate,' he said. Something like that, anyway."

"Ha ha ha!"

"You can laugh, but Vesaas was a decent man. Maybe the most decent Norwegian ever. If he says something isn't good, you can be damn sure of it."

"Didn't you say they found an envelope full of Marilyn Monroe cuttings among his things after he died?"

"I did, yes. Even in sin he was decent."

"Sounds like it."

I got four glasses out of the cupboard, turned off the two rings on the cooker. and filled a jug with water.

"Anyway, I've got to go," I said. "I've got the dinner ready."

"Are you going to be OK?" he said.

"Yes, yes. I just have to get through it, that's all."

"What exactly are you scared of anyway?"

"What, do you think the papers aren't going to write about it? That they're just going to let it pass without mention? It's going to be a storm. I'm going to be all over every newspaper in the land."

"Lie back and think about how rich you're going to be instead."

I didn't bother answering, and went into the hall.

"Cheer up. It'll be fun!"

"Speak to you later," I said.

"Hope so."

"All right."

I hung up and put the phone back in the charger.

"Dinner's ready," I called into the living room. Vanja said something I did't catch. I went in.

"John's asleep," she said.

He was lying there like a little cushion in a corner of the sofa.

"We're the only two awake, then," I said.

"Mm," she replied, immersed in a film, Totoro.

"Dinner's ready," I said.

"Can I have mine in front of the television? Please?"

"Seeing as it's only you," I said. "And if you promise not to make a mess."

She nodded. I went back into the kitchen and transferred the macaroni into a colander, then spooned some onto the plate, dished some of the sausage stroganoff onto it, cut a tomato into wedges that I placed next to the sauce for the sake of presentation, and took the whole thing into the living room and put it in front of her. I wasn't hungry in the slightest and made do with chomping a tomato on my way into the bedroom to check my e-mail. There was nothing more from Gunnar, and nothing from anyone else involved. Still, just seeing his name, and the subject he'd given his e-mail, "Verbal rape," was enough to petrify me. I stretched out on the bed and stared up at the ceiling. The fear and dread came back in full. I couldn't use the children to keep me going, that wasn't good, they were supposed to need me, not the other way around.

I got to my feet and went to the bathroom, found the blue IKEA bags and spent a couple of minutes sorting through the pile of dirty clothes, telling myself I'd have to go down in the morning after I'd dropped the children off and see if there was a slot so I could do the washing, then all of a sudden I couldn't be bothered and went back through the hall, stopping in the doorway to check on Vanja, she had a forkful of food paused in front of her mouth, completely spellbound by what she was watching.

Totoro roared. It was a terrifying roar, but he was good at heart, that much was obvious, and there was something reassuring about it.

The phone rang.

I looked at the display.

Linda.

I answered.

"Hello?" I said.

"Hi, it's me," she said. "How're things?"

"Good," I said.

"Did you get home all right?"

"Yes, everything went fine."

"Can I have a word with them?"

"Heidi and John are asleep. I'll see if Vanja wants to."

I held the receiver against my chest as I went into the living room.

"Do you want to say hello to Mommy?" I asked.

"Can you pause it?" she said.

I nodded and she reached her hand out for the phone.

"Hi," she said, and went out of the room. I looked around for the remote, fining it on the bookshelf, pressed pause, and went out after her. She'd gone into their room. When she saw me she closed the door.

She'd grown up so much she wanted to be left alone when she was on the phone!

I checked on Heidi, she was still asleep in the stroller. Then John, he was asleep too. I opened the door onto the balcony, lit a cigarette, took a few drags, stubbed it out, and went in again. I didn't know what to do with myself, too much on edge to sit down.

I went into the kitchen and filled a glass with water from the tap, downing it in one gulp. I got some coffee going, and the sound it made as it began to trickle through the machine was soothing, I'd been hearing it all my life and had always connected it with something good.

All I wanted was to lie down next to someone who could run their fingers through my hair and tell me everything was going to be all right.

I hadn't wanted that since I was a little boy.

No one had ever done that then. Now there was someone who could, if only I let her. I never had. There was something shameful about it, degrading almost.

Nevertheless, it was what I wanted.

I went into the hall and opened the door of the children's room. Vanja had climbed onto the desk and stood there chatting away.

"Can you give me the phone back when you've finished talking?" I said.

"I'm finished now," she said. "Bye."

She handed me the phone.

"It's me again," I said, and went down the hall. "What did she tell you?"

Linda laughed.

"All about what she did today."

"She didn't tell me anything," I said. "And as soon as I gave her the phone she went into her own room, as if she didn't want me to listen."

"It was so nice talking to her. She's such a big girl all of a sudden."

"She is, yes."

"How are you feeling?" Linda asked.

"Not so good. It'll get better, I suppose. I miss you."

"I miss you too. Do you think you could call back later?"

"Yes, of course," I said.

"I think we're having a barbecue. Maybe if you phone about ten-ish?"

"Fine. Speak to you then."

"Bye."

I hung up. Vanja had resumed the film herself. She'd barely touched her dinner.

"Can't you eat something?" I said. She sighed, took two mouthfuls, then pushed the plate away.

"Is that all?"

"I'm not hungry."

"But you'll be pestering me for a sandwich soon. It's better to eat your dinner."

"I'm not hungry, I said."

Now it was my turn to sigh. I picked up the plate and took it into the kitchen, leaving it on the table for her to eat later, went out onto the balcony, looked down at the square, went inside again, looked at the clock on the kitchen wall, half past five, then went into the bedroom and checked my e-mail. Nothing. I opened a couple of online newspapers, Aftenposten and Dagbladet, then NRK, and after that a couple of book blogs I half kept up with. One of them had come to my attention after I'd been invited to contribute an article. I declined, but would sometimes read what others were posting there, mostly one-book authors, occasionally someone better known. Those who commented all seemed to be people who were writing and wanted to get published, they were especially interested in the process and anything that had to do with the way publishers worked. The way they looked at literature and the things they wrote about authors were for the most part childish, they got steamed up about the slightest thing and seemed to view themselves as important people with important opinions.

It struck me that was exactly how Gunnar saw me.

It was almost word for word. I had a small though in my own view excessively large ego, he had written.

In other words I was a small person, yet blind to the fact, considering myself important, and what I did to be equally important.

It was a rather accurate description, I was indeed a small person. But the high thoughts I had were not about myself, but about what I did, or was capable of doing. In more positive frames of mind I believed I could achieve something big one day. But could a small person create something big? Didn't external greatness have to be founded on internal greatness?

How could I dismiss the people who posted comments on the blog as inconsequential? I was elevating myself above them, and so I was the same as them, important in my own eyes.

In my own eyes I was a better writer than most. Only seldom did I read the work of another novelist and think, I could never do this. But after my first novel came out that was how I looked at it, what I had written was so close to my own person I told myself anyone could do the same thing, all they had to do was write. Yet with the second book I had not only written in the third person, but also told a story as far removed from myself and my own reality as I could. That extended my radius. The unattainable for me was closely bound up with the person who had written it. Thomas Bernhard, for instance, what he wrote and achieved was completely out of my reach. Jon Fosse the same. But not a writer like Jonathan Franzen. Him I could match, and probably even surpass. The same was true of Coetzee, he also was a writer who lacked the distinctive aspect of personality that could take his writing that final stretch of the way; what he wrote didn't seem out of reach to me, and he'd been given the Nobel Prize. The issue was whether or not excellence was bound up with the personal. If that was what made the excellent excellent. And what point could there be in attaining the level below excellence, that which was good, perhaps even recognized internationally as high standard, if the excellent still remained? Clearly, it was because the value lay in the work, not in the appraisal of it. It didn't matter what kind of work you did, you were obliged to do your best. A joiner's work had to be as good and precise as possible. There was satisfaction in that. Should an ordinary joiner, whose work was run-of-the-mill, without panache, who went to work every morning and was there for his family in the afternoons and evenings, be troubled by the existence of a master joiner somewhere in Austria, a joiner who produced the most magnificent work, and ask himself what point there could possibly be in all his own solid yet unspectacular work? Should he lay down his hammer and nails because of that master joiner in Austria?

Of course not. He should carry on with his work, to the best of his abilities. Perhaps even be glad to at least be a better joiner than the one the newspaper had written about only recently, people knew about him, he wasn't as good a joiner as everyone said. His work might seem good, but on closer inspection it was shoddy. Thank goodness one's own work was solid!

The value lay in the work itself, not in the appraisal of it.

But to Gunnar I was nonetheless still a status seeker with ideas above his station, a bigheaded nephew willing to trample on the dead in order to make himself superior.

To him what I did was entirely without value.

And writing was such a fragile thing. It wasn't hard to write well, but it was hard to make writing that was alive, writing that could pry open the world and draw it together in one and the same movement. When it didn't work, which it never really did, not really, I would sit there like a conceited idiot and wonder who I thought I was, supposing I could write for others. Did I know any better than everyone else? Did I possess some secret no one else possessed? Were my experiences particularly valuable? My thoughts about the world especially valid?

Gunnar had pointed his finger at me. He had said, I know you. You think you're someone, but you're just a little shit. And you've meddled in something that's none of your business, something you don't even understand. If you go through with this, I'll take you to court. I'll make you bleed. I'll destroy you. You little shit of a nephew.

That was what he was saying.

He had warned me of it back when I was seventeen and had written disparagingly about Sissel Kyrkjebø in the local newspaper Fædrelandsvennen. Who do you think you are, he'd said, seventeen years old and writing so unfavorably about an artist who can sell two hundred thousand records? He was embarrassed by me, presumably also because we shared the same name and he would be associated with what I'd done. Kristiansand was a small town, and everyone read Fædrelandsvennen.

I was proud my name was in the paper. But when he said those words to me I squirmed on my chair and blushed, what he said hurt. I measured the world by my indie yardstick, it was how I judged the quality of everything in the field of culture. He knew nothing about that world at all, to him it was nonsense, and that was what I felt, that he was measuring me by the real world. The adult world, the world of responsible people. I opposed that world, but that was when I was on my own, because no sooner was I confronted by it than what did I do? I bowed my head in deep and heartfelt shame.

I shoved the chair back, my face burning, and went in to check on Vanja.

"Do you want to watch the film or Bolibompa?" I asked.

"Bolibompa," she said. "Is it on now?"

I nodded, turned the DVD off with the remote, and switched the kids' channel on. She'd been sitting on her own in front of the TV for a long time, it was a lousy last resort, and though I was distraught and restless I sat down on the sofa beside her. Because she seldom climbed onto my lap of her own accord but was often glad when I picked her up, I put my arms around her and lifted her onto my knee. She wrenched my arms away, but stayed put.

John lay motionless at the other end, his breathing a murmur, his hair damp with sweat. The sun was a barrage against the window, but the blinds kept most of its rays out and transformed those that came in into a white, hallucinatory shimmer, apart from the window of the balcony door, which was unprotected and allowed a cylinder of light into the room, full of floating specks of dust that whirled like electrons in the air.

"I'm hungry," said Vanja. "I want a sandwich."

I took a deep breath.

"Vanja," I said. "What did I tell you! I said you'd be wanting a sandwich soon. You haven't eaten your dinner yet. You can eat your dinner instead. You can see that, surely?"

She didn't answer.

"Do you want me to bring over your plate again?"

"No. Can I have an apple?"

"If you eat some more of your dinner."

"I don't want any."

"OK, then," I said. "You can have an apple, if that's what you want. But you can go and get it yourself."

She slid off my knee, scurried out into the kitchen, and when she came back, already munching on an apple, she climbed up next to me.

I got up and went to find some clean pajamas. The air in their room was warm and close, I opened the two small vents above the window and the sounds of the city seeped inside.

There were toys all over the floor. I made a mental note about having to clean up tomorrow, opened a drawer and found a nightgown. Heidi could sleep in the dress she had on, John in his shorts; if I was lucky they wouldn't wake up when I carried them to bed.

"Here, put this on," I said, tossing the nightgown into Vanja's face. She picked it up and gave me a fleeting smile, then started to get undressed with her eyes glued to the TV. I went and fetched her toothbrush and once she'd got changed I brushed her teeth.

"Do you want to read here or in bed?" I said.

"Bolibompa's not finished yet!"

"It'll be finished in a minute," I said. "Bed or sofa?"

"Bed."

I went in and scanned their bookshelf, picking out three books so there was a choice. Rapunzel by the Brothers Grimm, Gittan och fårskallarna, and one of the Petra books, the one where she starts nursery school.

"What about John and Heidi?" she said after I turned the TV off. "Don't they have to go to bed?"

"I'll carry them in after I've read you a story."

"I want to be carried in too."

"All right," I said. "And are you going to pretend to be asleep?"

"No. Just carry me."

I lifted her up and carried her to the bed, sat down next to her, and said she could choose a book. She picked Rapunzel. A good choice, I liked it too. Earlier that summer I'd spent two days in Germany, I'd done a reading at a castle in the same area the Brothers Grimm had collected many of their folktales, so I was told.

"Rapunzel, Rapunzel, let down your golden hair!" I said to Vanja as she sat there beside me on the bottom bunk, looking at the pictures as I read out loud. I had no idea why she'd got attached to this particular tale when there were so many of the others she didn't care about. It started with a man and a woman having to give their child away to a witch, and to a child that surely had to be the most primeval of all fears, perhaps that was what appealed to her, or perhaps it was the strangeness of a woman letting her hair down from a tower and a man climbing up it to set her free. For me the fairy tale was a kind of literary archetype, or rather a primordial force of literature itself, since on the surface everything was about transformation, including the world's own transformation into fairy tale, and at the same time this transformation involved a kind of simplification, reality contracting into a small number of figures that were so precise and so perfectly honed after having been through so many differently shaped experiences that their truth surpassed any individual experience of the circumstances, this was the same for everyone, and when these different figures were set into motion, the depths in each and every listener opened, and those depths were bottomless. For many years I'd thought of having a novel take place in that domain, in the forests, where there were trolls and ghosts, workhouses and kings, talking bears and foxes, and in the nineteenth-century reality of the Norway through which Asbjørnsen and Moe had traveled when they collected their folktales. Kristiania, Telemark, the valleys of inner Østland. But it would take years of work, and time was something I didn't have at the moment. Nevertheless, whenever I read folktales to the children, the thought came back to me that the potential was there. One of the Grimms' tales was especially compelling, the woman who falls into the well and comes out into another world. Sadly, the version we had was a dreadful translation, which was a shame. Vanja didn't know that though, and it was for her sake we were reading.

"The end," I said when we finished the last page. "Sleep time now."

"Will you tickle me and sing a goodnight song?"

"Of course," I said. She lay down on her tummy, I drew up her nightgown and ran my nails lightly up and down her back. That was what she meant by "tickle," and we had to do it every night while we sang.

Vem kan segla förutan vind?
Vem kan ro utan åror?
Vem kan skiljas från vännen sin
utan att fälla tårar?

Jag kan segla förutan vind,
Jag kan ro utan åror.
Men ej skiljas från vännen min
utan att fälla tårar.

Who can sail without the wind?
Who can row without an oar?
Who can leave a friend so dear
without shedding tears?

I can sail without the wind.
I can sail without an oar.
Yet not leave a friend so dear
without shedding tears.

After I'd sung I tucked her in under the duvet, took off her glasses, and put them on top of the little set of drawers next to her bed.

"Daddy?" she said.

"Yes?"

"Can I ask you something?"

"Yes, what is it?"

"Why can't he leave his friend without shedding tears?"

"Why do you think it's a he?"

"Because it's you singing."

"You're right, I hadn't thought of that. I suppose it's because he's very fond of his friend, don't you think?"

"Yes," she said, and put her head down on the pillow, apparently content with the answer. "Night night."

"I'll be back again in a minute," I said. "I've got to put John and Heidi to bed as well."

"Oh yes, I forgot."

I fetched John first and put him down carefully in his crib, then Heidi, which was more of a problem, I had to get her out of the stroller, and my efforts woke her up. No! she wailed, squirming as I clutched her tight to my chest and scuttled into the bedroom, depositing her inelegantly on her bunk above Vanja's, hoping that reality's intrusion into sleep would be so brief as not to get the better of it, and luckily, after drawing herself up onto her knees and staring at me for a few short seconds, she lay down on her side and closed her eyes, and before long her breathing grew heavy again.

"Night night, little one," I said to Vanja, and switched off the ceiling light.

"Can you leave the door open?" she said.

"Yes, of course," I said. "Sleep tight."

"Sleep tight."

I went in and checked my e-mail. There were no new messages. It was a relief in one way, but disturbing in another, since Tonje and Jan Vidar had both been sent copies of the manuscript some time ago, and that neither had got back to me about it could only mean one thing.

To allay their worries a bit, or assume some kind of control over them, I decided to send both a new e-mail. To Tonje I wrote:

Dear Tonje,

Not having heard back from you, I'm assuming maybe you're upset and shocked at having been dragged into a novel just like that without having asked for it. The way I see it, I'm not holding you up in any bad light, on the contrary, as Tore said when he read it, "Tonje's a princess, her entry makes you glad," but at the same time I understand that just being included in a novel is to be held up in some way. If you want, and I'm sure you do, I'm quite willing to change your name and those of everyone in your circle so that you can't be associated with the novel (in any other way than having been married to its author, but of course that's unavoidable).

All the best,
Karl Ove

To Jan Vidar I wrote pretty much the same. Once I'd done that I looked in on the children, they were all asleep now, picked up the phone, went out onto the balcony, sat down, poured myself a coffee, lit a cigarette, and called Mom.

She answered right away.

"Hello? Sissel speaking," she said.

"Hi, it's Karl Ove," I said. "Have you read the e-mail now?"

"Yes, I have."

"What do you think?"

"I'm incensed, I must say," she said. "And upset. I've been sitting here trying to work out what to say to him. But I suppose it's best to wait a while."

"You shouldn't reply to him," I said. "If you do, you'll be meeting him on his own terms, you'll be descending to his level."

"That's true," she said. "Your grandfather once said folly isn't worth an answer. It's a good piece of advice. But I'm so angry I'd like to give him a piece of my mind. He signs himself your father's brother. Well, your father would never have done anything like this, I want you to know that."

"I don't know what to believe," I said, and laughed uneasily. "You're my only source as far as all this is concerned."

"What do you mean?"

"That's what he says, isn't it? That I got it all from you."

"Oh, that. It's sort of an odd opinion, that I should be responsible for you when you're forty years old. How long can a person be held responsible for what their children do?"

"He watched me grow up. I think to him I'm still a teenager."

"You might be right there. But the idea of me hating the Knausgaards like that is just ludicrous. I've no doubt I was shy and reserved when I came into the family as a twenty-year-old, he's right about that, and your grandmother on your father's side was certainly a very warm and sociable person, especially to you children. So there is a grain of truth to what he says. In a way he's describing a caricature of me. I can see I could be perceived like that."

"A cold wind from Vestland?"

"Yes. Visiting us that time obviously left an impression on him. A peasant smallholding, he calls it. Funny to see that word again, but compared to what he was used to, we were poor. It was a totally different culture. Maybe it frightened him. Grandmother was quiet, she never said much, that must have been different for him too."

There was a brief silence. I lit another cigarette and put my feet up on the railing as I stared at the gray-blue summer sky with all its planes on their way in and out of the two airports, Kastrup and Sturup.

"There was something he wrote that touched me in a way," I said after a moment. "That bit about him having known us when we were little. You know, where he talks about "the boys"? He says you neglected us by not putting Dad right and intervening when we most needed it. I had no idea anyone else could see that Dad maybe wasn't good for us. But he saw that. He must have, for him to put it like that. His conclusion is different from mine, because I was there and I know you were the one who rescued me, but just the fact someone else could see what was happening, or there was some knowledge of it, touches me, strangely enough."

"Everything's about being seen. I understand if you feel that way. Especially if you put him in your father's place, as you say."

"Yes, there is something there. I feel that. Some deeper structures."

"But your father saw you, I want you to know that. He knew you for who you were."

"I'm not sure about that, to be honest."

"Well, it's true. He did."

I cried when she said those words, though quietly and without it affecting my voice, so she wasn't aware of it. We talked for another half hour or so about Gunnar and what he had written, not so much about the book that had provoked him as about the family, both Dad's and hers. She told me more about what it had been like for her coming into his family back at the beginning of the sixties, and some more about the person he'd been then. She had done the same when Dad died, I'd called her several times a day, and what she did was to raise him up for me, reminding me over and over that while he may have been tormented he had also been a person who made an impression on people: intelligent, insightful, knowledgeable, inquisitive, farsighted. She knew I needed another image of my father and gave me the man she had known, showing me the way he had appeared in the eyes of an adult when I had still been a child.

She was doing the same thing now.

I was being drawn further and further into something whose deeper nature was as yet unknown to me. Gunnar's letter gave a picture of the family I'd grown up a part of that was completely different from my own, and the picture Mom gave of Dad was different too, impossible to reconcile with my own experience of him. It was as if everything was suddenly turning in on me.

The first thing I did once I'd finished talking to Mom was call Linda.

"Hi," she said.

"Are you on your own?" I asked.

"Yes. I'm sitting in my room here. It's such a lovely place they've got. And Helena's taking such good care of me."

"Did you barbecue?"

"Yes, it was really nice," she said. Jättemysigt, in her Swedish. "But how are you doing? And how are the kids?"

I told her about our day. We discussed Gunnar's e-mail and the letter he'd sent to Mom, but it wasn't the right time for it. She told me a bit more about what she'd been up to, what they'd been doing, what the place was like. While she was talking I remembered another conversation we'd had once, early in the summer the year we first got together as a couple. She had gone to her mother's place outside Gnesta, it was the first time we'd been away from each other. I missed her so much my whole body hurt. That time too I had tried to imagine what the place where she was staying looked like, picturing a house, a garden, forest. Later, in the first weeks of autumn, I saw it with my own eyes, and of course it was quite different, much more forceful in its impression, and the first, almost dreamlike images that had come to me vanished without a trace, displaced by reality's chunky solidity. She told me she'd been at the beach that day, that she'd been lying on the jetty with her mother, reading out loud three texts that I'd written that had just been published in a book I'd given her. Her mother thought they were fantastic, she said, and laughed with joy. Later in the evening she had told them all about me, and she said they liked me already. I sat in my apartment, her dark voice in my ear, and imagined the room in which she sat, the person I loved and wanted more than anything else.

In the photos we took at the time we looked almost frighteningly young. Linda was twenty-nine, I was thirty-three. Linda still looked young, whereas I looked like I'd spent the intervening years living on the street, there was something ravaged about my face now, the deep, almost parodic furrows in my brow, my nose longer and more pointed, and my eyes made me look like I was glaring even when I felt most at ease.

How I'd loved her then. She was the only thing I cared for. I didn't give a damn about anything else. It couldn't have gone on like that, of course not, I would have burned out, but was this really where we were meant to go? Was this what we were together for?

But it wasn't too late. Nothing had been lost. Everything was still within reach.

"I wish you were here now," I said.

"I'm so glad to hear it, Karl Ove," she said.

"I'm not just saying that."

"I know. I miss you too."

"That's what I mean. Being away from each other's a good thing."

"Ha ha."

We said goodnight, I hung up and went in to check my e-mail again. Not a word from anyone. I surfed the Web for half an hour before getting undressed and going to bed. It was only ten to nine, but if I was going to get through the next morning without irritation I had to wake up rested. And Heidi had fallen asleep so early she'd probably be up and about at five, if not before.

I woke briefly at about half past ten when Vanja came in dragging her duvet behind her, but fell asleep again right away. The next time I woke, John was standing at the bed staring at me holding his pillow.

"Is it morning yet?" he said.

I glanced at the time. Five fifteen.

"Nearly. Do you want some breakfast?"

He nodded.

"Go into the kitchen then, I'll come in a minute."

He did as I said.

I got up, and Gunnar's e-mail came back to me. I went through the hallway and picked the papers up off the mat before going into the kitchen. It faced directly east, where the sun already reddened the horizon. I lifted John up into his chair, put a plate of muesli and yogurt in front of him, filled the coffeemaker with water, put a filter in the filter holder, spooned in the coffee, and switched it on. As it ticked and gurgled, I skimmed the culture and sports sections in the two newspapers.

"Hi, Daddy!" said Heidi, appearing wide awake in the doorway.

"Heidi-Hi," I said. "Muesli or cornflakes?"

"Cornflakes. But I want to pour the milk."

"OK," I said.

She went off and I heard her come dragging her little chair from the bedroom through the hall, she used it to stand on when she was rummaging for clothes among the big piles in the IKEA cabinet on wheels that we'd put by the cupboards. A few minutes later she came in dressed in a rose-colored top with strawberries on it and a blue Hello Kitty denim skirt. The top was her absolute favorite; if it was up to her, she'd be wearing it round the clock.

"You look nice," I said.

She smiled, but said nothing.

"I look nice too," said John.

"But you're not even changed yet," I said. "Heidi is. That's why I said she looked nice. You've still got your clothes from yesterday on!"

I filled a bowl with cornflakes and put it in front of Heidi along with a carton of milk, went out onto the balcony to get the vacuum jug, filled it with coffee, took a cup from the cupboard, poured myself the few mouthfuls that wouldn't fit in the jug, and went out onto the balcony again. The only handle the door had was on the inside, it was a nuisance, all of a sudden the kids could push the door shut, and if they did I'd be locked out. They were too small to open it themselves. Vanja could, but she was asleep. So I turned the handle into the locked position and left the door ajar before sitting down and lighting a cigarette.

There was a chill in the air, but the sky was clear and the red sun was on its way up over the horizon. My stomach muscles ached, it felt like I'd been working out the day before. Most probably it was from all the tension.

A movement at the window caught my eye and instinctively I jumped for the door to make sure it didn't get locked, then realized there was no danger and sat down again.

Heidi pushed the door open.

"I spilled, Daddy," she said.

"It doesn't matter," I said.

"Can you come?"

"Let me drink my coffee first, then I'll come. Go back in."

Instead of doing as she was told, she opened the door wider and stepped out onto the balcony.

"Heidi," I said. "Go inside! You're not supposed to be out here."

"I only wanted to see," she said with a sulk.

"Go inside, I'll be there in a minute. OK?"

"OK."

Why couldn't she have waited, so I could have this little moment to myself with my coffee and my first cigarette of the day? Five minutes in peace, that was all I asked for.

I took a last drag and drew the smoke down into my lungs, swallowed what was left of my coffee, and went inside. It wasn't just a little she'd spilled, it had run over the edge of the table and onto the floor. I tore off some paper towels and began to wipe it up.

"Was it on purpose?" I said as I cleaned up the mess, looking up at her as she sat on her chair watching what I was doing.

She shook her head.

"All right," I said. "But eat what you've got in your bowl, at least!"

"But it's too full," she said.

I said nothing, but took it over to the sink, poured off some of the milk and the cornflakes, wiped the bottom and the edge of the bowl, and set it down in front of her again.

"There you go," I said. "Now you can have your breakfast."

"You're angry," she said. Coming from her, it was an accusation.

"I'm not angry, Heidi, not at all. I just don't want to spend the morning cleaning up after you, that's all. But it wasn't your fault. It's all right."

"Is it morning?" said John.

"It is now," I said. "When the sun comes up, it's morning. When it goes down, it's evening."

"Not in the winter," said Heidi.

"No, that's right. But in the summer it's true. And whose birthday is it in the summer?"

"Me!" said John.

"Next week, already!" I said.

"What am I getting?" said Heidi.

"You? It's not your birthday, is it?"

"But Daddy," she said.

"I don't know what you're getting," I said. "How about a bag of gulrøtter?"

"What?"

"Morötter in Swedish. A bag of carrots, how does that sound?" I said.

"What?"

"Just pulling your leg, Heidi."

"What?"

"Jag skojade," I said.

"Du får inte skoja," she said. Don't make fun.

"Not even a little bit?"

She shook her head.

"So I'm not allowed to be angry, or make fun?"

"No."

She bent forward and started slurping her cornflakes and milk. John had finished, there was yogurt all around his mouth and the table in front of him was spattered with soggy muesli.

"Do you want some more, John?" I said.

He shook his head. I went around the table and lifted him up, snatched off a sheet of paper towel and wiped his mouth, took off his diaper and dropped it in the bin underneath the sink along with the used paper towel.

"John's a bare-bottomed boy," said Heidi.

"I am NOT!" said John, immediately incensed, and stomped off.

Heidi laughed, a bubbly little giggle. I gave her a smile, grabbed a clean diaper from the bathroom, and went after him. He ran as soon as he saw me.

"Stop!" I said, and ran after him. I lifted him up, he kicked his legs, but not in any protest, and lay still when I put him down on the sofa and put the diaper on him.

"There you go," I said, and went into the bedroom to switch the computer on and check my e-mails. Vanja had pulled the duvet up over her head, a wisp of hair on the pillow was all there was to indicate someone was underneath. I left her alone and logged on to my e-mail, nothing, apart from the news update from the Agderposten and a message from Amazon. I skimmed the headlines of the online newspapers, first Klassekampen, then Aftenposten, Dagbladet, Dagsavisen, VG, The New York Times, The Guardian, Expressen, and finally Aftonbladet.

With Vanja on the left side of the stroller, John inside and Heidi on the right, I stepped outside some half an hour later, walked to the crossing, went over and carried on up Södra Förstadsgatan all the way to the 7-Eleven, where we first made a left, then a right, and ten minutes later we were outside the nursery entrance, where Vanja keyed in the code and Heidi swung open the gate. The others who had arrived were all out in the yard, so I just lifted John out of the stroller and parked it by the wall, made eye contact with Nadje so she knew the children were there, and headed home again. On the way, I stopped off at the 7-Eleven to buy cigarettes and a box of matches. I stood outside and lit up with a big green garbage truck making a racket in the street behind me. The noise echoed off all the walls, its own little cacophony.

They probably weren't called garbage trucks anymore. I wondered what they might be called instead. Environmental service vehicles, perhaps?

I walked along the street smoking my cigarette. There was a steady stream of buses now that the morning was underway, they made the ground shake as they rumbled past. The air was crisp and cool in the shade, warm and gentle in the sun; it looked like it was going to be a fine day. Not that it mattered. I was going back to bed, and hopefully I'd get some work done later.

The building we lived in came into view. I flicked my cigarette into the road as I walked the last stretch, past the huddle of pale, empty faces at the bus stop as a bus pulled up with that sound they made of something being ripped apart, a sound it had taken me more than a year to realize came from the contact between the iron grids of the gutter and the big wheels of the buses, crossed the road and walked up to the entrance door, where I tapped the panel with my key card. I took the stairs, put the cigarettes down on the hat rack, unplugged the phone, pulled the blinds in the bedroom and lay down to sleep.

I woke up an hour and a half later having dreamed. My T-shirt was damp and the pillow I'd been lying on soaking wet. A craving for sugar drove me into the kitchen, where I pulled some grapes from the bunch and crammed them into my mouth to restore my blood sugar. After that I went back into the bedroom and checked my e-mails.

There was a new message from Gunnar in the in-box.

I got to my feet again and opened the door of the balcony, walked along the dark planks of the decking to where the sun was, and looked across at the Hilton, the three elevators that slid up and down in their glass tubes.

I had to stand up and take it.

I had to meet it head-on, I couldn't hide.

So he was angry with me. So I'd done something terrible. I would have to answer for it. Take everything as it came. It was as straightforward as that.

But first I needed a cigarette.

I went in and took the packet from the hat rack, then went out onto the balcony on the other side, which was already boiling hot in the sun. I didn't feel like sitting down, just lit up and gripped the metal railing, staring six floors down at the felted roof below, then sat down anyway, took three drags of the cigarette, stubbed it out, went back into the bedroom, opened the e-mail, and read it as quickly as I could.

He began with a couple of formal comments about having made his objections to the book clear to the publisher over the phone, but given the importance of attaching a date to his objections in the event of any proceedings, he felt obliged to write to me again by e-mail. He made the following absolute demands. He and his wife were to be removed completely from the book. The description of his mother and her life before and after Dad's death was to be removed from the book. The description of the final phase of his brother's life, which was painful to his next of kin, was to be completely removed from the book. The description of his father's brothers, and the fictitious and untruthful stories about their relationships to each other, were to be completely removed from the book. There had never been the slightest conflict between them, they'd been the best of friends all their lives. All mention of the Knausgaard name was to be removed from the book. All remaining names were to be made anonymous. All mention or description of identifiable residences having belonged to his family were to be removed from the book. All errors of documentary fact had to go. He had noted more than fifty of them, he wrote, which were either downright lies or the result of ignorance. Nothing pertaining to these lies would he require to be rectified now, this would follow in the event of proceedings being taken. He found it telling that the dominant role played by the author's mother regarding his brother's tragedy received no mention in the book, though he would not insist on it being included. There was much more still to be said on the matter, the issues mentioned simply being a few of many, and he sincerely hoped he would not be compelled to make them public at some later date. That such a respectable publishing house as Oktober would even consider publishing a novel of this nature without contacting those involved was something he found scandalous. That he had indeed been contacted, and that his letter was in reply to that contact, didn't seem to have occurred to him. He was too angry. He characterized my manuscript as a documentary portrait, which presumably was why he thought the family ought to have been contacted by the publisher, so that they could have been alerted to all the lies, all the distortions, all the glaring omissions. How could such a respectable publishing house fail to check the sources and their credibility? This was all the more serious in view of the manuscript having been written with one thing only in mind, which was to make money. That was the only reason I was exposing members of my family to the public eye, so I could get rich. Publishing such a book was utterly unacceptable, for not only was it untruthful, it was also an invasion of privacy. In the event of his failing to receive an immediate reply to his letter, the book, together with the e-mails in his possession, would be passed on to a lawyer, as well as to the newspapers, at the earliest opportunity. He named VG and Dagbladet. If this book, which distorted the truth and lied about the facts, was to be published, then the rest of the story, mark his words, would have to be told too, and in the language of the tabloid press. All the money I, the author, together with the publisher envisaged earning would be lost in damages.

So he was going to take it to the papers. And the courts.

I lay down on the bed and curled up in a ball, clutching a pillow. A moment later I got up again and went into the hall, picked up the phone, and dialed Geir Angell's number.

"Another e-mail," I said as soon as he answered.

"What's he saying, anything new?"

"He's going to the papers with it if I don't do as he says. And he's going to claim for damages as well."

"Relax. Can you send me a copy?"

"Yeah. I'll do it right away."

"I'll call you back once I've read it. OK?"

"OK."

I hung up, went back into the bedroom and forwarded the e-mail on to Geir, then went into the bathroom with the phone still in my hand. I stared at the three blue IKEA bags, went into the kitchen, filled a glass with water from the tap and drank it. I put the glass down on the counter, went into the living room and opened the door of the balcony, only to close it again the same instant, went into the bedroom, lay down on the bed, sat up and stared at the display on the phone. I called Geir Angell again.

"Are you that fazed?" he said.

"Yes," I said.

"Let me finish reading it through. Hang on a minute."

I got to my feet and went over to the balcony door, pulled on the cord that lifted the blinds, fastened it tight and went out into the hall.

"He's not saying anything new here, Karl Ove. He's making threats. He's saying he'll sue for damages if the novel comes out in its present form and that he'll go to the tabloids and give them his side of the story. But the book hasn't been published yet. The only story at the moment is there's an uncle who wants to stop a novel about his family. No one can pass judgment before it's out. And if he goes ahead like he says, it'll be fantastic publicity. Everyone wants to read that kind of thing. Relax. He's angry, that's all. He can't do anything."

"He can go to the papers, and he can go to the courts. It's no wonder I'm scared, is it?"

"No, I understand that. But there's no need to be. He's huffing and puffing now because he wants the book stopped. He's trying to frighten you into doing what he wants."

"He's doing a good job."

"But you've no idea if he's actually willing to do what he says."

"Oh, what a mess!"

"Relax. Everything's going to be fine!"

"This is hell. It's just hell."

"What, someone being angry with you?"

"It's not some trivial little thing, like you're making it out to be."

"I'm not saying it's trivial. I'm saying it's not as bad as you think."

I said nothing, just stared out the window in the living room, the sunlight glittering in the windows of the Hilton.

"How about I come down?" said Geir. "We're coming on Friday anyway, and I'm on my own here with Njaal, so it makes no difference whether I'm here or there. What do you say?"

"Are you sure?"

"Of course. I'm not getting any work done anyway, with Njaal under my feet."

"Isn't he in day care?"

"Do you want me to come or not?"

"I'd never have asked under normal circumstances. You know that. Besides, it was your idea."

"Is that a yes?"

"Sounds like it."

"Great! We'll leave first thing in the morning, so we should be there about . . . well, twenty-four hours from now, or thereabouts."

We chatted for another half hour or so. When we were finished, I called Geir Gulliksen. He answered right away.

"Did you get the e-mail?" I asked.

"I did, yes," he said. "He's hopping mad, this uncle of yours, isn't he?"

"What I'm scared of is him going to the newspapers. They'd jump at the chance of making a story out of this."

"You don't think he's just trying to put pressure on?"

"I think he's angry enough to do anything at all."

"He says he'd give them the manuscript. That'd be against the law. The novel hasn't been published yet, and the rights to the manuscript are yours. But I'll ask Geir Berdahl to get in touch with him. The important thing is to make sure we handle things properly."

"What about his list of demands?"

"No more than expected. What he's after really is for the book not to come out at all."

"Changing the names of everyone in the family, anonymizing people and places, that's all fine by me. But removing my father and my grandmother is out of the question. There'd be no novel left if we did. And I can't take Dad's name out either. He's what the novel's about. He was my father. I can't."

"We'll deal with all that as we go along. But the novel doesn't stand or fall with the names."

"Not those on the periphery, no. But I draw the line at my dad's name. I won't give that up."

"The important thing now is to make sure he doesn't go public. We need to accommodate him as far as we can."

As soon as we hung up I called Espen. After I'd talked to him, I called Tore. Then Linda. Then Geir Angell again. I was on the phone all day, and when I wasn't pacing about with the phone to my ear, I was lying stretched out on the bed with the blinds down, wishing it would all go away. As I lay there the phone was in my hand the whole time. I was aware of the risk of trying people's patience; if I called Espen or Tore again, for instance, I'd be approaching the limits of what I could reasonably expect from them. I was sure they didn't see it that way themselves, but I did, they had work to do, families to attend to, lives to live. Linda was different, but she was on holiday, I couldn't heap all this on her now. I had no such qualms with Mom, she would always put herself aside when it came to Yngve's and my problems, but she was at work in the daytime, and I couldn't just barge in there with my troubles. I could do that with Yngve, but with him it was more complicated, he was involved, not on the outside like everyone else, but caught between a rock and a hard place. That left Geir Angell, I wasn't worried about pestering him, I could quite easily ask him to put everything else aside and listen to me going on about the mess I was in, but even with Geir there had to be a limit somewhere, I'd spoken to him three times already today, so a fourth would surely be pushing it.

As I lay there quite motionless, staring at the desk under the window, only half an hour from having to pick up the kids, the phone lit up. I looked at the display. It was a 0047 number. A mobile. But Gunnar couldn't get to me unless I answered, I told myself, then felt an immediate wave of relief as the number was superseded by Yngve's name and it began to ring.

"Hello?" I said.

"What a terrible drama this is with Gunnar," he said.

"I know," I said. "I'm really sorry. But at least he's not dragging you into it."

"She's my mother too, you know."

"Of course."

"Did you know he thought about her like that?"

"No. I had no idea."

"Me neither. We'll just have to hope he doesn't go to the papers. What is the publisher saying about it?"

"They want to accommodate him as far as possible. They've got some lawyers looking into it."

"What are they saying?"

"I don't know. They're still looking at it."

I could hear he was upset. Why couldn't I just have left well enought alone, why did I have to go and poke around in such a sewer of old resentment?

I dropped the phone into the charger and went into the kitchen, ate two slices of bread with liver paste and pickled beetroot while standing by the counter, well aware that on an empty stomach it would be virtually impossible to get the kids home without taking my annoyance out on them at some point. I washed the bread down with a glass of water, wondered if I had time for a cigarette on the balcony before I went, then decided to have one on the way instead, lifted the trash bag out of the bin under the sink, tied a knot in the top, and sat down on the mat in front of the door while I put my shoes on. After that I took the keys from the cupboard, picked up the trash bag, and took the elevator down into the basement. The door that led to the storage rooms belonging to each apartment was open, a man came toward me, it was our neighbor on the other side of the landing, a huge brick house of a man, he was in his sixties and naturally I ran into him now and again on my way up or down, he always filled in the uncomfortable little pauses with some comment about the weather, often padded out with a supplementary inquiry about the climate in Norway. I said hello, he said there'd been a break-in during the night and that I should check our storage. I told him we had nothing valuable in it, and they'd be doing us a favor if they'd made off with what there was. He didn't appreciate the comment, burglary was a serious matter, or maybe he just didn't understand what I said. Probably that, I thought to myself, and went out through the other door and down the passage to the refuse room.

I slung the bag into the big garbage container, which was completely empty, and went back out of the dingy, grubby space and along the passage again, where I noted that the pane in the outer door at the top of the stairs had been smashed. It often happened. The first bike I owned in Malmö disappeared after three days, I'd been stupid enough to leave it outside after locking it. The next one I made sure to always leave locked in the basement, only one time I forgot to lock it, and surprise, surprise, the next day it was gone. They'd had so much time they'd unscrewed the child seat and left it neatly on the floor before making off. Another neighbor, an elderly woman who got stuck between floors in the elevator one morning, thumping her fists against the door, her shaky voice calling for help, had said when we moved in that the place was like Chicago. I loved that expression for the fact that while Chicago had been the very epitome of crime and violence in the fifties, the image had lived on, into the new millenium, in the minds of the old. It was like Chicago here, they stole bikes from the basement and broke into the storage rooms, where would it all end?

The light outside was bright and I put my sunglasses on. The air was warm, though not still in any way, a breeze came from across the street and the leaves of the tree in front of me rustled. The cars were tailing back at the traffic lights. Pedestrians were crossing, their hair blowing about in the gusts. People on the sidewalk passed me like shadows, I saw nothing, registering only their movements, regulating my own automatically according to theirs. Past Åhléns, Hemköp, Maria Marushka or whatever the hell it was called, the shop Mom always went into whenever she came to stay, Myrorna, 7-Eleven, and then, on the corner of Norra Skolgatan, the Hojen bike shop. The street lay sheltered from the wind, and heat rose from the asphalt. Cars rolled gently, almost unnoticeable in the swarms of bicycles on their way from Möllevangen to the city center. The owner of the little immigrant store stood on the step and looked around. I stopped at the nursery entrance and tapped in the entry code. They were out playing in the yard. There was a water sprinkler in the middle, surrounded by children, some of them naked. They shrieked and giggled. A bike with a trailer attached stood parked a bit farther away. It belonged to one of the parent couples who'd been there when we started coming. Many others had come along since then, we were already veterans. The problem was I'd written about this particular couple in the second book.

But for the time being I felt safe. None of the people I could see in front of me here in the yard knew anything of what I'd done. Book 2 wasn't out for another two months yet, and the way things were going it was more than doubtful it would ever get to be published in Swedish.

"Daddy!" shouted John, and came running across the asphalt.

I lifted him up and tossed him in the air.

Vanja was sitting on a swing together with Katinka, they'd seen me and were yelling as loud as they could. Heidi was standing, her face visible in the open window of the little playhouse next to the sandpit. She noticed me and came running out. I lifted her up too. Then I went over to the staff to hear if everything had been all right. All fine, they said, the children had been cheerful and full of beans.

Half an hour later, I finally managed to get them together and accept the fact that it was time to go home. John was in the stroller, Vanja and Heidi walked along on either side, holding the handle tight. Vanja chattered all the way. Heidi said something now and then, completely unrelated to what her sister was talking about, while John sat quietly, staring out at whatever appeared in front of him. When we got to roughly the same place as the day before, Heidi again refused to continue, and it took ten minutes before we got going again. Outside Hemköp it was Vanja's turn, no way was she going to let me do the shopping before we got home. Couldn't I take them home first and then do the shopping? I tried to explain to her that we couldn't do that while Mommy wasn't at home, but she was having none of it. Five minutes later, after I said they could each have a bun, we walked through the automatic doors into the chill of the busy supermarket. John wanted out of his stroller, he said, I tried for as long as I could to hold him off, he wasn't nearly as disciplined as his sisters, to put it mildly; he could stop in front of something he decided he wanted and not budge before I put it in the basket, or he could suddenly take off on his own, but eventually I gave in and lifted him out of the stroller. Over by the milk I realized he'd disappeared. I told Vanja and Heidi to stay put and went down the aisles looking to both sides. I found him by the dog food, lying on his back looking up at the ceiling. He chuckled when he saw me. I grabbed the collar of his T-shirt and lifted him up, carrying him like a sack over my shoulder back to the stroller, and he screeched and giggled all the way until he realized he was going back in the stroller and went sulky. I bought a pack of yogurts, which settled him a bit, and then we walked back down the aisle to the checkout, where I paid, bagged what we'd bought, and went out into the sunshine again. Vanja and Heidi munched on their buns. We crossed over and went into the shopping precinct, not to buy anything, but because it was a shortcut. It wasn't far from the back entrance to the playground. I carried Heidi for a bit so as to get on, she sat on my arm, and with the other I carried the bags and pushed the stroller. After a while I put her down and picked Vanja up instead, anything else was out of the question, everything had to be in equal shares. When we got to the playground, which was teeming with children, I sat down on a bench and smoked a cigarette while they darted around from one piece of equipment to the next. After only a few minutes John came toddling up to me, he flopped forward onto the bench and said he wanted to go home. I tousled his hair and said we'd be going soon. No, now, he said. No, soon, I said. And then my phone rang. I was quite unfazed, the only people who knew my mobile number were people I trusted. Private number, said the display.

"Hello?" I said.

"Hello," said Geir. "Are you out and about?"

"Yeah, I'm at the playground."

"How are you feeling?"

"I haven't jumped off the balcony yet. I take it all out on the kids instead."

"You're not the type to commit suicide," he said. "Your method's to stick your head in the sand."

"True," I said. "But the most fascinating thing about the ostrich isn't that at all. I saw this documentary about them once. They're huge and really strong, and with the claws they have they can be lethal, so do you know what the farmers do to get close to them?"

"Put a sack over the ostrich's head?"

"Well, once they get that far, yeah, they go completely still. But before that. Before they go up to them and put the sack on."

"No, what?"

"They hold a stick up above their own heads. A broom handle, whatever. As soon as the ostrich sees something taller than itself it won't attack. Its brain is that tiny. Ha ha ha!"

"Ha ha ha!"

"It's got three rules it lives by. If a broom handle comes along that's taller than me, I stand still. If I'm threatened, I stick my head in the sand. If someone puts a sack over my head, the world disappears and I no longer exist."

"Those are your rules you're talking about."

"Why do you think I mention it? Still fascinating, though, don't you think? The ostrich is such an ancient creature. It doesn't need a bigger brain, it's looked after itself perfectly well all this time."

"You can keep your fascinations to yourself."

"It's the same with crocodiles and sharks. They're so ancient. They behave quite mechanically, there's no improvisation, no element of choice for them, they're not able to assess anything. If something falls in the water where they happen to be, they open their mouths and try to swallow it. Whether it's a plastic container, a mine, or whatever, it all goes in, down the hatch. I love it, the thought of everything once having been so primitive and simple, a kind of biological-mechanical world, and the fact that a few creatures descend from that and are with us here now."

"I hear primitive, simple, biological-mechanical, and guess what, crocodiles and ostriches aren't the first things that occur to me."

"You're the last Freudian."

"Everyone is. They just don't know. I'm telling you, Eros and Thanatos, that's all you need. But in your case, the ostrich maneuver isn't going to do you much good now. You're going to be visible everywhere when your book comes out. You're going to be an ostrich without sand."

"Hang on a minute. I feel an inspiration. There's a poem coming on . . . I am John Lackland, ostrich without sand, dim and witless, you understand."

"That's the spirit! Well done, Karl Ove! There comes a point where you've got to laugh. It's the only thing you can do. Life's a comedy. Everything's stupid when you come to think about it."

"That wasn't me talking. It was someone else, talking through me. I'm just an instrument. The truth is I'm at my wits' end."

"That's why I prefer Cervantes to Shakespeare. Comedy is truer than tragedy. You've got to laugh at it all."

"That's because you're from Hisøya. You people never take life seriously. You're all nihilists and cynics. But I'm from Tromøya. The very focus of gravity and tragedy."

"I thought that was Athens?"

"Well, you thought wrong. People often get Arendal and Athens mixed up. Aristotle was from Froland, and Plato came from Evje, they say. The Cynics originated on Hisøya. Aristophanes lived in Kolbjørnsvik. And Sophocles hung out in Kongshavn."

"Yeah, if you say so. Anyway, I was only calling to ask if we needed to bring some bedding with us, duvets and whatever else."

"Don't bother. We've got everything here."

"OK, good."

"Speak to you later then."

"Not much choice, I'm afraid."

As soon as we got home, Vanja, Heidi, and John disappeared off into various corners of the apartment while I dumped the shopping bags on the table and put the things away in the cupboards and the fridge, slashed open two packets of fish cakes, and fried them while I got the potatoes and some cabbage on the boil and grated some carrot. I'd only cleaned the kitchen the day before, now it was a mess again, and I decided to try to tidy up a bit while the dinner was getting ready, but managed only to empty the dishwasher before having to change John, he'd dirtied his diaper, and what usually took just a few minutes now turned into a performance, we'd run out of wet wipes again and I had to wash him down with the hand shower in the bath. He cried at the top of his voice as soon as I put him in the tub and kept trying to climb out again, I gripped his arm with one hand and showered him with the other while he howled.

"All finished," I said once he was clean, and turned the water off. "It wasn't really that bad, was it?"

He carried on howling. I lifted him onto the floor and rubbed him dry with a big bath towel. I realized I could forget all about getting him into a clean diaper and a clean pair of shorts, he'd just have to go around with no clothes on until dinner. Then Vanja yelled, and Heidi began to cry. I left John and went to their room to see what was going on. Heidi cried even more.

"What's happened?" I said.

"Heidi hit me!" said Vanja.

"Vanja hit me!" said Heidi.

Vanja had been teasing, as she did from time to time, and Heidi, who wasn't as verbal or as quick yet as her eighteen-months-older sister, had hit out at her in desperation.

"You're not to tease, Vanja," I said.

"I wasn't teasing," said Vanja. "And she hit me!"

"I know, that wasn't nice of her. You shouldn't hit, Heidi."

I looked at them in turn.

"There, are you friends now?"

They both shook their heads.

"In that case, I can't leave you on your own together. Heidi, you can come with me into the kitchen."

"No," she said.

John padded into the hall, barefoot and naked.

"Vanja, then?"

"I want to stay here," she said.

"Can I leave you here together, then?" I said. "With no fighting?"

Vanja nodded. Heidi shook her head.

"OK," I said. "I'll leave you here. But any fighting or crying and you'll have to work it out yourselves, do you hear? I have dinner to make."

I went back into the kitchen, where John was trying to climb into his chair. The children eating undressed was one of the things I wouldn't allow. I went to the bathroom and got a clean diaper, then dug out a pair of faded gray shorts both Vanja and Heidi had worn when they were little, and a green T-shirt with a blue dolphin print on it, which I got him into before lifting him up into the battered old high chair. The fish cakes were almost black on one side, I flipped them over, turned the heat down, poked a testing skewer or whatever it was into the biggest of the potatoes, which was still hard in the middle, put the plates out on the table, filled the jug with water, got some drinking glasses and put them out, and the knives and forks, took a serving dish from the cupboard on the opposite side, and handed John one of Vanja's little plastic dogs, only for him to throw it disdainfully on the floor, announcing that he was hungry and didn't want fishcakes.

I took the last of the clean items out of the dishwasher, and put them away in the cupboard and the drawers. Heidi started wailing again. A moment later she came into the kitchen and clutched me tight, then stepped back and told me between sobs what Vanja had done. I didn't quite understand what she was saying, and told her dinner was ready and that she could sit down at the table. The potatoes weren't done yet, but the smallest of them were probably OK, and I needed to get some food into them now.

I strained the water from the potatoes, put them one by one into the dish with a spoon, slid the fish cakes from the pan onto the same dish, cut the cabbage up and arranged it around the edge, and put the grated carrot in a little glass bowl on its own.

"Vanja!" I called. "Dinner's ready!"

I put two fish cakes on each of their plates, along with a potato I skinned for them, got up again and went to get Vanja, she was sulking on the floor with her back against the wall and wouldn't look at me when I crouched down in front of her.

"Food's on the table, Supergirl," I said. "Come on, come and get your dinner."

"You only listen to Heidi," she said.

"That's not true. I didn't even hear what she said, if you really want to know. Come on. You need some dinner in your tummy. That's why you're fighting."

"Why?"

"Because you haven't eaten."

"I'm not hungry."

"OK, just come when you're ready."

I sat down at the kitchen table again, cut their fish cakes up for them, placed a small portion of cabbage and a bit of carrot on their plates, even if I knew they wouldn't touch it. I spooned a pile of vegetables onto my own plate, followed by five fishcakes, and had devoured the lot in minutes. It was ten to six. I got up and started loading the dishwasher. Heidi slipped down from her chair.

"Bolibompa's on in a minute," I said. "Do you want me to switch it on for you?"

She nodded. Behind me, John shouted that he wanted to watch it too. I lifted him down, switched the TV on with the remote, went in to tell Vanja that Bolibompa was starting, then went back to loading the dishwasher; Vanja came in and picked up a fish cake with her fingers, she knew I didn't like them doing that, but I didn't say anything, put some detergent in the little compartment, slammed the door shut, and pressed on. I washed the frying pan and the pots quickly in the sink, dried them and put them away. I left the food on the table, hoping they might be hungry later on and eat what was left, then went to the bedroom to check my e-mail. Making sure to avoid seeing the two e-mails from Gunnar, I went through my new messages, none of which was particularly important. Once I'd done that I phoned Linda and asked if she wanted to speak to the children, not so much for her sake or theirs, more for something to happen. John said hi and sat nodding to what she said at the other end, then handed the phone back to me. Heidi talked about what was on the TV without saying it was something she was watching, so it sounded like she was in Flowerland herself, whereas Vanja did the same as the day before, went off on her own with the phone in her hand.

"Me again now," I said when Vanja came back five minutes later and handed it back to me. "Are you having a nice time up there?"

"Yes. It just feels a bit funny being here without all of you, that's all."

"I'm sure it does," I said. "But that was partly the idea, wasn't it?"

"We've been at the beach today. All we've done is lie about all day. We're having a barbecue again tonight."

"It must be reassuring having a fireman around the place, then," I said, opening the door onto the balcony and stepping out. The wooden decking was warm, and the metal railing I leaned my arms against was positively hot.

"He's an incident commander," she said.

"Even better."

"You'll have to meet him. He's from way up north, from Norrland. Completely down to earth and unflappable, it doesn't matter what happens. Just like my family up there, you know. Like all Norrlanders."

"What are you doing now?"

"Lying down, reading. All that sun's made me tired, I think."

"I've hardly been out of the apartment," I said.

"What have you been doing? Working?"

"No, nothing like that. Just been on the phone."

Behind me, John squirmed around the door. He looked up at me, his eyes asking if it was all right, and when I didn't say anything he set off toward the far end, twenty meters from where I was sitting.

"About those e-mails?" she asked.

"About those e-mails, yes."

"I feel sorry for you having to spend so much energy on all that."

"I don't have much choice really."

"I know. But I still feel sorry for you."

"It can't be helped. Listen, do you think we could talk later instead? I'll have to be getting them off to bed soon. The place could use a bit of cleaning up as well."

"Yes, all right. Will you call me?"

"I will. Speak to you later."

"Hej då."

At the other end of the balcony John was climbing onto a chair. I hurried over. Standing on the chair, he'd be high enough to fall over the railing. It had been our worst fear ever since moving in.

I put my arm around his midriff and lifted him down just as he was leaning forward to get a look at all the people down below.

"You can run back instead," I said. "I'll chase you."

"OK," he said, and pattered off. I lumbered along after him, he turned and shrieked when he saw how close behind I was, I let him run on a bit, then snatched him up into the air.

"Again!" he said.

"No, we're going in now. It's bedtime soon."

"No!" he said.

"Yes!" I said, leading him into a trap, our old yes-no routine, where I suddenly said the opposite, confusing him into doing the same, before he realized and switched back, and by then he'd forgotten all about wanting to be out on the balcony.

I went and got their pajamas from their room, and they got changed in front of the TV, complaining when I switched it off, they wanted to see what was on next, and then, when they couldn't get their way, they were hungry all of a sudden. The fish cakes wouldn't do.

"No," I said, sensing my patience about to run out. If I gave them a slice of bread each, they would sit still and eat it while I read them a story. If I didn't, they would twist and moan, and most likely steer the situation off into a dead end where the only way out would be to impose my will on them, meaning there'd be tears and sulks all evening, or else give in, which was the same as losing face.

Knowing what was most advantageous didn't mean I was going to end up doing it. With my patience ebbing, the urge to put my foot down became all the stronger.

"Fish cakes or nothing," I said.

"But we're hungry," said Vanja.

"Eat your fish cakes, then," I said.

"We don't want fish cakes."

I gave a shrug.

"You'll have to go to bed hungry, then, won't you?"

"But, Daddy," said Vanja.

"End of discussion," I said. "Off to bed with you and I'll read you a story."

I found Out for a Walk for John, and The Three Little Pigs for Vanja and Heidi.

Vanja sat up against the wall under the window with her arms folded in front of her chest.

"I'm not listening," she said.

"Me neither," said Heidi.

"Then I'll read for John," I said, and lifted him onto my lap. I'd been reading Out for a Walk ever since Vanja was ten months old, both she and I knew it by heart. Now I raced through it as fast as I could without any thought for John wanting to show me he knew what all the things were called. When I'd finished, I carried him over to his crib and pulled the blind down.

"Night night," I said, and left the room, went into the living room, and out onto the balcony, where I sat down and lit a cigarette. A few seconds passed before Vanja appeared in the door.

"I'm hungry," she said. "And you haven't read to us."

"Go to bed," I said, and stared out at the rooftops and walls, which were blushed by the sun.

"Waaaaarh!" she wailed.

"What's the matter with you tonight? It's late, time for bed."

"You're stupid!" she yelled.

"That may be so," I said. "But I'm still your daddy. And if your daddy's stupid, then it's a shame for you."

She turned and went back in, her shoulders shaking a bit too exaggeratedly, I thought. I poured myself half a cup of coffee, it was tepid now and I gulped it down in a couple of mouthfuls. I went inside again, the place sounded like a zoo. Both Vanja and Heidi were yelling and carrying on.

"What's the problem here?" I said firmly, standing in the doorway of their room.

"You're stupid!" Vanja shouted.

"I'm hungry," Heidi wailed.

The tears were streaming down their cheeks.

"I want Mommy," said John in his crib.

"Mommy's not here," I said. "And if you're hungry you can eat the fishcakes from dinner. If you don't want them you can lie down and go to sleep."

I closed the door and stood there quietly in the hall. A moment went by before it opened again. It was Vanja.

"Back to bed, do you hear me?" I said. "I've just about had enough of this."

I took her by the arms and pressed her back into her bed. Then I gripped Heidi by the waist and lifted her up onto her bunk, closed the door again, went into the living room and turned the TV on, it was the news, images of vast fires in what I took to be Greece. There was a banging on the wall, I went and opened the door of their room. Vanja was lying kicking her feet against the wall. Heidi lay crying in the bunk above.

"Listen," I said. "I don't want any more nonsense. You can have an apple each. Will that do?"

"Yes," said Vanja, and stopped kicking.

I went out to the kitchen and got three apples, filled two drinking bottles and a sippy cup with water, and took it all with me into their room.

"Do you want me to read?" I asked.

They nodded. I lifted John up, Heidi climbed down by herself, and soon all three were gathered around me, each wanting to be one of the pigs in the story, as if nothing had happened. I sang the same song for each of them while stroking their backs, and they were quiet and agreeable and ready for sleep after all their crying.

"Will you leave the door open?" said Vanja.

"Of course," I said, and went to the kitchen to get some more coffee going. When it was ready I poured a cup, went out onto the balcony and phoned Mom.

"Hello? Sissel speaking."

She sounded tired.

"Hi, it's Karl Ove," I said. "You weren't asleep, were you? You sound a bit tired."

"Do I? No, I wasn't asleep. I lay awake last night, though, so perhaps I am a bit, now that you mention it."

"Was it Gunnar's letter keeping you awake?"

"Yes. And thinking about what to say in reply."

"I thought you weren't going to?"

"I'm not. I was just thinking about it, that's all. I was livid, you understand."

"Did you read the one I sent you today?"

"Yes."

"What do you think?"

"I think the consequences for you are going to be quite far-reaching. If he goes to the papers or takes you to court. It'll be a huge strain. You're going to get a lot of negative publicity. The pressure will be enormous. People can crack in that situation."

"Are you worried about me?"

"Yes, I am."

"Well, you shouldn't be. I've always taken care of myself."

"But you've got a family to think about as well."

"Are you saying I shouldn't publish the novel?"

"That's for you to decide. All I'm saying is you should think very hard about it. Whether it's worth it."

"That's just what Gunnar wants."

She sighed.

"Yes," she said. "It is. I mentioned it to some people at work today. Some of them thought it was your book that was outrageous, not your uncle's reaction. That's what the public is going to think. Gunnar's going to come across as the ordinary man in the street, decent and law-abiding, whereas you risk being made out to be some kind of criminal. That's one thing. The other is they can easily set you up as representing some kind of elite, with Gunnar as the everyman. You can imagine the field day VG will have."

"So what? I can't let what people might think, determine my every move, surely."

"I'm just thinking about the consequences, that's all. You mustn't let this destroy you, Karl Ove."

"I'm not going to have a breakdown just because someone writes something negative about me in the papers, Mom."

"No, that's not what I meant. You're strong, I know that. But think of Mykle, how it broke him. The comparison's a relevant one in my opinion. The pressure it put him under. It destroyed him."

"You're not really asking me to backpedal on this, are you?"

"No, I'm not saying that at all. I'm asking you to think very carefully about it, that's all."

"I'm already thinking about it. In fact, I'm doing nothing else. But withdrawing the novel isn't an option. I'm not going to do it, not in any circumstances. I can't just give up at the first little sign of resistance."

"It's hardly a little sign, is it? You mustn't underestimate it."

"No, of course not. I appreciate what you're thinking, and I'm glad you're telling me."

I went inside, dropped the phone in the charger, then put my head around the door of the children's room. They were all well away, their breathing heavy with sleep. I went into the living room, the floor was littered with clothes, towels, and toys dumped all over; the mat was bunched up, the armchairs shoved up close to the TV, the white woolen throws we used to hide the stains on them tossed on the floor, as was the one from the sofa, whose cushions were even grubbier, if that was possible. I left it all as it was, went to the bathroom and filled the IKEA bags with dirty clothes; I'd have to remember to do the laundry tomorrow or else they'd soon have no clean clothes to put on. I left the bags up against the laundry baskets and went to the bedroom to check my e-mails. Neither Tonje nor Jan Vidar had answered. I logged off and went through the hall, picking the phone up as I went, then, with the phone in one hand, I switched off the dishwasher and opened it, and a cloud of steam tumbled out into the air. I went into the study, there was a note on the desk with what I thought might be Hanne's phone number on it, I picked it up and took it with me onto the balcony. The number belonged to a person named Hanne, but the surname was a common one, so I was by no means sure the number was actually hers.

I put the phone on the table, sat down, poured myself some coffee, lit a cigarette and looked out over the rooftops with a feeling of unease.

All day the light and warmth had been infused with a kind of density, something listless that had latched unnoticeably on to the ethereal quality of June and July, for summer was now drawing to its close, the world receding into the shadows, darkness encroaching. I longed for it. I wanted the darkness. I wanted to disappear, to be visible no more, neither to myself nor anyone else. I wanted my feelings to sink down inside me, like the sap sinks through the tree in autumn, and for my thoughts to flutter to the ground, like leaves from the multitude of branches on which they had unfolded in spring.

I hadn't spoken to Hanne in almost twenty years. I'd often thought about her, though more and more infrequently, until I'd started work on the novel and found her occupying my mind increasingly as I sat in the study and wrote. If I opened my door and went into one of the other rooms, where Linda was perhaps, those thoughts would disappear again, bound up as they were with a time in my life that had been lost, whereas the time that surrounded me was alive and existed in all things, and by virtue of its being concrete and nearmade the past into what it was, spectral and vague. Nevertheless, I felt guilty. To ease my conscience, I occasionally told Linda what I was writing about, trying to make light of it, and she seemed to approve, until one morning she told me what one of her girlfriends had said when she'd mentioned what I was writing about. "You mean he's writing about his old flames?" her friend had said. "And you're putting up with it?"

Now there was another step I had to take. I couldn't possibly publish the novel without Hanne reading it first and approving.

I called the number.

No answer.

Like the other times I'd tried, and I was just about to hang up when a voice came on the other end.

"Hanne speaking."

"Hello, Karl Ove here," I said. "Is this the Hanne I used to go to school with?"

There was a silence.

And then that wonderful, effervescent laughter I hadn't heard for twenty years.

"Karl Ove!" she exclaimed. "Is this the Karl Ove who used to send me notes during class?"

"It is," I said. "How are you?"

She laughed again, that same laugh. She'd always been the cheerful kind, never far from gladness, and it was something she clearly hadn't lost.

"I've always imagined you were going to phone someday," she said. "Or else we'd bump into each other in an airport or somewhere. Isn't it strange? I felt sure we'd meet again. How are you? I see you live in Malmö now? I've read about you in the papers, of course. A good thing you didn't follow my advice and become a teacher!"

"I suppose so," I said. "I have a wife and three children here. How about you? I'm assuming you've got kids?"

We exchanged information about our lives for a while. She lived in the Mandal area, with the same man as before, had been in charge of a nursery, and was now working at a school.

"Anyway, it's not just for old times' sake I'm calling," I said after a bit. "It's more specific than that."

"I thought it might be," she said.

"The thing is, I'm writing a novel about my life," I said. "Parts of it are about when I was sixteen. And seeing as how you were so important to me then, I've written about you too. All names and places are authentic. I realize that might cause some difficulties. So I'd like you to read it before it comes out."

She was completely silent.

"If it's not OK with you, which I would totally understand, because it's a lot to ask, then of course I'll change your name and make you less recognizable."

"You mean you've really written about me?"

"Yes."

"I don't know what to say."

She fell silent again.

"But it's not so much about you as about me," I said. "I was in love with you, to put it bluntly. I've written about that. If you don't want to be in the novel in that way, with your name, I mean, I'll just change it. It's not a problem. Are you surprised?"

"Yes."

She laughed.

"Do you remember much about that time?" she asked.

"Sort of," I said. "Not so much exact details, but moods, that kind of thing. The feeling of it all is still very much there for me."

"I remember a lot. I think about it sometimes. I've always thought we'd meet up again and talk about it. About back then."

"We still can," I said. "As long as I haven't ruined it all by writing about it."

"I doubt that," she said, and laughed.

"Can I send you the manuscript today, then, and let you get back to me once you've read it, so I know if it's OK or not?"

"Yes, of course. I can't wait. I'm a bit nervous now, though!"

A silence ensued.

"It was so nice hearing your voice again," she said.

"Same here," I said. "Your laugh's exactly the same, do you realize that?"

"No," she said, and laughed again.

"I'll send you the manuscript, then maybe we can talk again?"

"Fine."

"Speak to you soon, then."

"Yes. Take care."

"You too."

I hung up and lit a cigarette. The conversation had gone much better than I had feared. And yet I was thrown off balance. I had gone into something I couldn't control. She had said she remembered that time very well. I didn't. Or rather, I remembered a few episodes very well. Others I recalled only faintly, shaping them in my writing, inventing dialogues, for example, which, no matter how likely they might have been, certainly weren't accurate. How was she going to feel when she read them? After all, she had been there herself.

I stubbed the cigarette out and went inside, into the children's room, and paused for a moment. John lay curled up on his belly, and had kicked off his duvet as usual. Vanja was lying on her back, spread-eagled, her arms above her head in a V, like a snow angel. Heidi was on her side, her head resting on her upper arm. There was something dark on her cheek and under her nose. I put the light on.

Her face was covered in blood, smeared across her lower cheeks and chin, the pillow was dark red. My heart began to pound, as if suddenly I had found myself on the edge of a precipice. I went to the bathroom and quickly wet a facecloth with hot water, then went back and began to wipe her face. She opened her eyes and looked at me.

"You've had a nosebleed," I said softly. "It's all right. Just lie still and let me wash it clean."

When I had finished, I took the soiled pillow and gave her one from our room instead. She laid her head on it and closed her eyes, and I smoothed my hand up and down her back a couple of times before turning the light off and leaving the room, first to rinse the facecloth in the bathroom, wringing it out and draping it over the radiator, then going back out onto the balcony, where I pressed Linda's number on my phone. It rang for a while at the other end, and when eventually she answered, she sounded like she had been asleep.

"Hi, it's Karl Ove," I said. "Did I wake you up?"

"Yes, I must have dropped off."

"Oh, sorry. I didn't mean to."

"That's all right. How are things at home?"

"Fine. They're all fast asleep. Nothing much happening here otherwise. We were at the park after nursery, then they watched the children's programs before bedtime. The place is a mess, that's the only thing. I can deal with that tomorrow, though."

"You're so good."

"I don't think good is the word," I said. "Anyway, how are things at your end?"

"Fine," she said, and yawned.

"Have you been at the beach?"

"Yes, it was gorgeous."

"Geir's coming tomorrow," I said.

"Already? I thought that wasn't until Friday?"

"He's on his own with Njaal. I suppose he thought he might as well come here."

"You and Geir on your own with four kids. Who'd have thought?"

"I know. It must be a sign. The end is nigh."

"It'll be good for you, though."

"Yes, I'm sure it will. I was thinking we could get some prawns in when Christina comes on Friday. What do you think?"

"Sounds good," she said, and yawned again.

"I'll let you get back to sleep, then," I said. "I think I'll be off myself. I better, if John's going to wake up at half past four again."

"Kiss them from me. I miss you all."

"I miss you. Goodnight."

"Goodnight."

I went back in, dropped the phone into the charger, looked in on Heidi to make sure her nose wasn't bleeding again, checked my e-mails, no new messages, surfed the Net for a bit, then sent a copy of the manuscript off to Hanne, made myself a glass of squash in the kitchen and took it with me out onto the balcony, smoked one last cigarette, brushed my teeth, and went to bed.

It was just after five when I woke up and saw John standing beside my bed with his pillow in his hand. I sat up. His nose had bled too. What was going on? A dribble of coagulated blood streaked his lip under each nostril, and there was some on his cheek as well. Worried, I went to the bathroom and wet another facecloth. Nosebleeds weren't dangerous, they happened all the time, but two kids during the same night, could that be a coincidence?

Wouldn't it have to be the same cause? It was scary enough as it was, them bleeding, but to think it might be a symptom of something else was worse. A dryness in the air, perhaps, I thought to myself, giving his face a couple of wipes with the cloth while he tried to squirm free.

"There we are," I said. "Should we have some breakfast?"

"Yes," he said, and went off toward the kitchen in that totally placid way of his. His diaper drooped between his legs, I took it off, got a clean one, and put it on him while he stood waiting, like a racing car during a pit stop, it occurred to me. Then I lifted him into his chair, got the muesli out of the cupboard, and went to the fridge to get the blueberry yogurt, only to realize we'd run out.

"There's no more yogurt," I said. "Do you want milk instead?"

"No."

"What, then?"

"I don't know."

A door opened in the hall, it was Heidi. She came in and sat down on her chair.

"Hi, Heidi," I said.

She didn't answer, but from the little smile she tried to conceal by lowering her chin I could tell she was in a good mood just the same. We had breakfast, the sun streamed in, I woke Vanja up, brushed their hair and teeth, got them dressed, grabbed the trash bag from the kitchen, and then we all got in the elevator and went down together.

When I came home again I threw a load of laundry into one of the machines in the basement, then phoned Geir Angell to see if they were on their way. They were, he reckoned they would be arriving around one or so.

I checked my e-mails again. There was a new message from Gunnar. It was addressed to the publisher, with me copied in. The heading was "Libelous author and publisher." He began by stating that he had already established that the events and descriptions he wanted removed from the book consisted of lies and half-truths, gross distortions and outrageous assertions, and were moreover of such nature as to unquestionably be in breach of Chapter 23 of the criminal code, concerning defamation. He had witnesses, he wrote.

His wife had kept a diary that could be presented as evidence in court. Their children could take the stand. Furthermore, there were any number of people who, in a professional capacity, had been in regular contact with his mother during the time laid out in the novel. There were health visitors, there were home helpers, and neighbors and friends as well. All would be able to testify that what I had written in my book was false. He gave an example. The novel said that Dad had moved back home to Grandma's two years before he died, and I had described in detail the wretched conditions in which they had lived. None of what I had written was true. It was pure fabrication. Dad had not been living in Kristiansand. He had been living in Moss at the time. According to Gunnar's version, his life there had been nothing but normal. He had an apartment, he had a car, he had his job teaching at the gymnas, he had even been in a relationship. He had only stayed with his mother in Kristiansand the last three months, that spring and summer. And there he had died of a heart attack, Gunnar wrote, making it sound like it had happened under quite ordinary, unexceptional circumstances. My account was therefore incorrect, and twisted to meet my own ends. I was making myself out to be a hero who came and cleared up the miserable mess my father had made. Only there was no mess, Gunnar claimed. He had gone to the house shortly after the ambulance had been there and his brother's body had been removed from the chair in which he had died. All that day, and the one after that, he had stayed there in order to help and be with his mother. During that time he had quite naturally cleaned the place up where it was most urgent. What I had written, that the house had been littered with bottles from the front door all the way up the staircase, was utter nonsense. It simply was not true. By the time Yngve and I turned up a couple of days later, he had already taken care of most of what needed doing, all that remained for us to do was to help with a few items that were too heavy for him to lift on his own. The only room he hadn't touched was our father's bedroom, where his clothes and personal items were, having naturally considered it right not to interfere with them, since he was our father.

After that Yngve and I had been over to their house for dinner with Grandma, he wrote, and it was strange because I couldn't remember that at all. The work I had put in at Grandma's he reduced to nothing. It was his wife who had done the bulk of the cleaning up, changed the curtains, helped Grandma in the bath. I, the writer with his head in the clouds, had merely swanned about, bucket in hand, incapable of making a difference, such were the abilities I lacked, something that was attributed to my mother, who had never had a clue about even the basics of keeping a house clean. Yngve had hardly been there at all, having made himself scarce after a single day. And then I had the audacity not only to present things as if I had straightened the place up on my own, but also to portray his and my own father's mother as a geriatric alcoholic. But Gunnar knew why: once, when I was still at the gymnas in Kristiansand, she had caught me stealing red-handed. I had stolen money from her, he wrote, had been caught, and had resented her ever since for that reason. Grandma had also expressed concern to my mother over my wayward behavior, I spent too much money, and took drugs, so her worries were hardly without foundation, but how had my mother reacted? Rightly, she had been angry. But with whom? My father, for having left us.

Then he turned to other faults in the manuscript. I had never had a great-grandmother on my father's side who lived to be over a hundred and died falling down a staircase, it was pure invention. My father had never had a cousin who won a beauty competition. I wrote that we used to hire a certain function hall for family occasions, the Elevine Rooms, but that was nonsense, and had never been the case. As for my grandfather and his brothers, they had been the best of friends all their lives, and had never, as I had written, fallen out and stopped speaking to each other. Grandma had never stolen money from her employer, the true story was different altogether, and in fact rather funny. Gunnar himself was another victim of my mendacity; he had never said we could take the money in the envelope under the bed and not declare it to the tax authorities, as I was claiming.

At the end of his lengthy exposition he turned to the love and care he and his wife had given his parents in the autumn of their years, making it possible for them to stay on in their own home and enjoy a relatively large degree of comfort. This was a fact completely subverted in my novel, inasmuch as anyone reading my account on its own would think he had not been fond of his mother at all and had neglected her entirely. Nothing could be further from the truth. To anyone who knew how much they had put into that home, how cozy and pleasant their times together there had been, my description of the situation was immediately fallacious. But then that was me through and through, so I understood, because in the next sentence he was warning the publisher against me and my deceitful nature, manifested in the way I sat, hunched forward, and the way I held my head, always with my face turned away from whomever I was talking to, with a cheerless, scowling expression, eyes full of guilt and brooding speculation. They should not allow themselves to be fooled. What I stood for was not goodness and truth, despite the impression I tried to give, what I stood for was in fact the opposite. I was a notorious liar, I was a quisling, I was selling my grandparents and my father for blood money in a quest for fame, to which end I would shun no means, however shabby. If the publisher did not halt this project he would take legal action. In order to avoid such a step, he wished to put forward a proposal. I had written so lavishly about angels in my previous novel, as my uncle Kjartan had about crows. The publisher ought therefore to suggest to me that I write a book about devils. They were on a level with which I was familiar. And in that I could make use of the literary talent I had inherited from my father.

In Gunnar's eyes everything was different. Together with his wife and children he had infused the final years of my grandparents' lives with meaning. They had helped them out in practical matters, but also been on hand socially, visiting them one or more times a week, taking them out to the cabin, taking them to visit Grandad's brother, spending Christmas with them, Gunnar and Grandma laughing and joking as always. A totally normal, well-functioning family, no big secrets, no skeletons in the closet, no dark clouds on the horizon. Apart from one, the fact that his brother was an alcoholic. Yet it didn't affect his life too adversely, he still taught at the gymnas, had his girlfriend in Moss, and was an altogether excellent and well-liked teacher. He'd had his problems in life, notably with his first marriage, which had been cold and without love, as Gunnar saw it, and that coldness had left its mark on his children, who, once they grew up, gradually distanced themselves from their father, but also from their father's family. The youngest, Karl Ove, was the worst, though Yngve too had drifted away. They lived in Bergen, in Vestland, where their mother's family were from and still lived. But in Kristiansand things had been fine until Gunnar's brother moved in with their mother. However, that was only for a very short time, eight weeks, and then he died in the living room, of a heart attack. Grandma had her home help and her nurse, Gunnar and his wife had been there for her too, always on hand, and although Dad drank a bit, it hadn't stopped him being able to drive Grandma over to his other brother at Hvaler the summer before he died, and at the same time he had even been busy selling his place in Moss. He was fine, and she was fine too, they both were, but of course it had been a shock to her when her son had died. The place had been a bit untidy, there were a few bottles lying around, but that was only to be expected when a person had a drinking problem, it was nothing alarming, not in the slightest, nothing that couldn't be cleared away in a morning or two.

Gunnar was the only son who had stayed behind in Kristiansand, he was the one who had looked after the family, made sure Grandma got her home help, and her nurse, no one else had been around. Gunnar had never hurt anyone, there wasn't a blot on him or his behavior; on the contrary, he was cheerful, helpful, stable, a pillar of the community as well as his own family. A good son, a good brother, a good father, a good citizen.

His brother's sons come down for the funeral. He leaves things to them. They clean up a bit, take care of the service, then clear off again. Ten years pass. Then he gets sent a novel the youngest has written. He can't believe his eyes. Everything that was so fine and decent has been turned into an inferno. He writes that the father had been living there for two years, that he sent the home help and the caregiver away and turned the respectable home into something more like a squat, making his mother out to be a drunken, senile old woman. Nothing of what Gunnar has spent so much of his adult life upholding is represented, everything is made out to be misery and squalor. How will it look to his friends and neighbors? How could Gunnar allow all this to happen to his mother and brother? The truth is it never happened. But how can he get that across? It says so in the novel. Is the author a liar?

Apparently, yes. So then he's faced with two issues: why is the author lying, and how can Gunnar stop his lies from getting out? The author is lying because his mother, that ice-cold, egotistical woman, has brainwashed him, made him look negatively on everything to do with his father's family, and because when he was young and took drugs his grandmother had rejected him, something he had never forgotten. When his father and grandmother died he decided to seek revenge, with all the means at his disposal. He hated his grandmother, he hated his father, and at the same time he was intelligent enough to express his hatred in the form of a book and make money from it. Moreover, he had the audacity to play the hero, making out that he had cleaned up after his father, whereas the true story was that there had been hardly any cleaning up to do, and what little there was had been taken care of by Gunnar himself. He had then tricked the publisher into taking on this series of lies, this hateful project, which they had done only because they had no way of knowing the truth. They had trusted the author and bought his story without reservation. In order to stop the book, the publisher therefore had to be made aware of the truth. So he wrote to them, and to the author's mother and brother, but not to the author himself, his deceit being of such proportions he no longer wished to have anything to do with him, he never wanted to see him again for having deliberately twisted the truth in order to destroy his family. But there was another reason too: along with the manuscript the author had sent a letter explaining why he had written what he had written, and from that letter it was obvious he had no idea what he was doing. And since this was the case, Gunnar was compelled to target the person who knew better, the person who throughout all those years had distorted the author's outlook on reality to such an extent that he no longer knew what was real and what was a figment of his imagination. He was a Judas, a quisling, but he was steered by his own mother. Gunnar had seen the origins of her coldness himself, her mother, the author's maternal grandmother, had appeared almost autistic that summer he had visited them when he was twelve years old, she had clearly been ridden with inferiority complexes there in that peasant plot beneath the fells. The woman's son, the brother of the author's mother, had lost his senses and been committed to the madhouse on more than one occasion. He wrote poetry, his last collection had been about crows. This environment, of raving lunacy and insensitivity, with all its failing mental health, autism, crows, and emotional dispassion, was what the author had inherited and made his own, it was from this premise that he had written about his father, a good man at heart who perhaps in frustration at the life into which he had been tricked, with the cold woman from Vestland, had not always treated his sons the way a father ought, as Gunnar had treated his own sons, but never improperly and certainly not in any way that could warrant the picture the author had drawn of his father. He saw things through his mother's eyes, but didn't realize it.

So it wasn't my writing the truth about my father and what had happened to him in the later years of his life that was Gunnar's main issue with the novel, it was my lying about him and that period, and the fact that it made Gunnar seem guilty in the eyes of others, which was grossly inaccurate and, not least, unwarranted.

There was no doubt he meant what he was saying, that his perception of the events in question was quite different. That made me scared. If there was one thing I feared in myself, it was not being reliable. I had written that Dad had lived with Grandma during the last two years of his life, spiraling them both into decline. I had written that he had sent the nurse and the home help away. Gunnar denied both these things, and said he had witnesses to the contrary.

Where did my version come from?

How did I know it had been two years?

I had no idea. It was something I had written, and it had to have come from somewhere, but where?

I had been in Kristiansand at the time I started writing Out of the World, in January 1996, when Dad's drinking had been severe and he was living with Grandma. True, he still had his apartment in Moss, but as I understood it he spent most of his time at her house, and for some reason my perception was that he had moved in with her for good that summer, two years before he died. But how I had arrived at that understanding, I didn't know.

Could I simply have assumed as much, and then allowed that unconfirmed assumption to morph into certainty, subsequently elevating it to absolute truth when I started writing about it ten years later? It was not only possible, it was likely. If Gunnar said he'd only been living with Grandma for three months, and he had witnesses to confirm it, then surely it was true. I had also written that he had sent the home help and the health visitor away. Where did that come from? I didn't know that either. Somewhere in my mind I had a very vague idea it had come from Gunnar himself, perhaps he had told Yngve over the phone that Dad had sent the home help away and was out of reach, wasn't that what that phone call had been about? That Dad had barricaded himself in at Grandma's and that Gunnar felt there was nothing left he could do, having already tried to step in and appeal to Dad's reason, but to no avail? It was from that phone call too that I knew Dad had broken his leg and had been lying there helpless on the floor for some considerable time at Grandma's before Gunnar found him and got him to the hospital. That event had etched itself into my mind, since it told me things must have been bad, but the exact circumstances of what had happened were unclear, I couldn't put a date on either the event itself or my being told about it. But it was also possible the information about the home help being sent away had come when we were there, after Dad had died, when Gunnar was describing to us what had happened. I didn't know. He might have been exaggerating, it might have been his way of saying Dad had made it impossible for him to intervene, or maybe the home help didn't come that often. Maybe it was only the home help, the person who came to do the cleaning up, he'd been talking about, and not the nurse? But as far as I remembered I hadn't written anything about the nurse. A third possibility was that no one had said anything of the kind and it was just something I'd assumed on the basis of the dreadful state of the house; it was hard to imagine anyone had done any cleaning for a very long time, therefore the home help must have been sent away, and the person who had sent them away must have been Dad. Maybe that was what I'd got into my head in 1998, and what to begin with had been little more than a vague theory had now become a solid truth ten years later.

I didn't know.

But I felt certain Gunnar knew, and if he was so absolutely positive that was what had happened, then surely it had to be right.

In which case I was unreliable. In itself this was a crushing admission. But had I been unreliable in everything I had written? Did it in any way alter the fundamental truth of the novel if Dad hadn't lived with Grandma for two years but for three months, and the home help hadn't been sent away but had kept up the normal routine?

Yes, it did. It would mean I'd be talking about a few days of misfortune and consternation in a world of peace and tranquillity, not about a catastrophe that had been going on for a couple of years. The only thing I knew was that the sight that met Yngve and me when we entered the house back then had been dreadful. Gunnar was saying it was untrue that the place had been littered with bottles from the front door and all the way up the staircase, that in the two days before we arrived he'd cleaned and neatened the place up, and that only Dad's room and some of the heavier items had been left.

Hadn't there been bottles? The way I remembered it, there had been empties all the way up the staircase from the living room to the top floor, there were shopping bags of them dumped underneath and on top of the piano, and the kitchen had been crammed too. But what about the staircase leading up to the living room? I had no recollection at all. I must have exaggerated. Unreliable, again. The way Gunnar was looking at it, this was about maintaining that it was he who had cleaned up the mess, not us. I vividly remembered Yngve and I spending that day and the next clearing up and scrubbing the place down, whereas what he described was a distracted author swanning about with a bucket without even the most elementary idea about what to do. I had no recollection either of our having had dinner at their place, in fact I felt sure it had never happened. But still I couldn't rule it out entirely, there were a lot of things in my life I couldn't remember. What he wrote about our going out to the cabin with Grandma, and me diving off the jetty, was true, but that had taken place outside the novel's time frame, after its conclusion. Giving Grandma a bath, washing the curtains, Gunnar and Tove's efforts when it came to cleaning the place, all that had happened after the two and a half days I'd described. The way I saw the business of cleaning the house up was the exact opposite of Gunnar's: the way I recalled it, I had found it decent of him to step back for a couple of days as he did and let Yngve and me assume responsibility, it was a way of saying to us that Dad had been our father, a way of returning him to us. Gunnar had been back and forth, helping us out with good advice, taking the furniture we lugged out of the house together away to the dump on a trailer he hired. He had not neglected anything, in fact he had behaved impeccably, but hadn't I written about all of that?

If he was right about what he was implying, that the sight that confronted us in the house had been quite normal, and that my depiction was grotesquely exaggerated, then everything fell apart. It bore down on something fundamental, first and foremost of course the very premise of the novel, that it was describing reality, but also its motive, the reason I had written about my father's death and the dreadful days that followed. When Yngve, in a car full of empty bottles, had turned to look at me and said that if I ever wrote about this no one would believe me, it was for that very reason, that everything we had seen had been like something out of a novel or a film, and not reality.

In the years that followed, I willingly told anyone who cared to listen about Dad and his demise, it made me special and perhaps interesting too, it made me into someone who had seen a few things, gave me a certain air of casual disregard and depth, something I'm sure I was trying to attain, I'd always carried that inside me, the desire to be someone, and that notion of elevation had always been a part of my motivation for writing. Holding forth in that way about my father and what became of him always left me with a bad taste in my mouth, because I was exploiting him and the tragedy of his life for my own ends. But that was small scale. The novel blew it all up and made a big thing out of it. I was exploiting him, yes, I was climbing on his corpse. And I was doing that simply by writing about it. At the same time it was the most important story in my life. If it wasn't true, it meant I'd exaggerated things in order for Dad's fate to make the greatest possible impact, thereby lending me some of the recklessness and destructive force I thought I needed for me to become a real writer instead of someone pretending. In that case I wouldn't just be letting him down, but myself as well. It was this that Gunnar's letter addressed, as forcefully as if he'd punched me: I had lied. There had been no bottles on the staircase up to the living room. Dad had not been living there for two years. The home help had not been sent away.

If I accepted that perspective, on the other hand, I would be obliterating myself. Not once had I considered myself to be exaggerating when writing about what had gone on in the house, not once had I considered myself to be exploiting Dad and Grandma, the events I was describing were too overwhelming for that, and what I was delving into was too important.

I'd written about Dad. I'd written about my fear of him, my dependence on him, and the enormous grief his death had filled me with. It was a novel about him and me. It was a novel about a father and a son. It didn't matter that the very sight of the words "legal action" terrified me, and that my insides turned cold when he wrote that he had witnesses to the effect that I was lying, I couldn't give up the story of my father.

Not even if it was a lie?

Without realizing, I had touched on something dangerous, more dangerous than almost anything else.

But why was it dangerous?

He had to attack Mom because he felt that was what I'd done in writing the novel, attacked Grandma and Dad. It was retaliation. An eye for en eye. He was only doing what I myself had done, the difference being his retaliation lacked symmetry: my novel would be published for anyone to read, it would be available in all bookshops and all libraries. His e-mails would be read only by those he sent them to, which was to say the publisher, Mom, Yngve, and me. Because our strengths were so unevenly distributed, he was rectifying matters by hitting us even harder.

I sat down and switched the computer on, opened the document containing the novel, and started to read. In the light of what had happened in the past few days, nearly every page had me feeling uncomfortable, all the old friends and classmates I'd written about could react in exactly the same way as Gunnar.

I called Geir Gulliksen so we could discuss the purely practical implications of Gunnar's e-mail, the fact that I was going to have to alter some specifics as to time, the two years Dad had lived with Grandma in the novel, maybe by just not being specific at all, as well as correcting the errors that had occurred. I asked him what we should do about all the other names. Geir considered that anyone from my childhood or youth who was described in a relatively neutral way could stay as they were without any problem, this was quite without risk, whereas I would have to anonymize the ones I'd written about in a way that could be perceived as compromising, for instance if I'd gone into their family relations, a father who drank or was violent or who in any other way had done something that might be considered questionable. Geir's views calmed me down, he was talking of the basis of the novel, it was the novel we had to focus on, the editing of the manuscript.

After I'd spoken to Geir I called Yngve. We talked back and forth about what we remembered from the days surrounding Dad's death, he couldn't recall that many details, but hadn't balked at anything he'd read in my description. In the event of our being taken to court, he would be my only witness, though I didn't mention this at all. A court case was the worst thing that could happen, and the publishers were doing everything in their power to prevent it, I knew that. The second-worst thing that could happen was something leaking to the papers.

All of this was about Gunnar and the way he saw the novel. What we were talking about was basic human consideration. But there was another, more literary, critical issue about the novel that I'd been thinking a lot about in the interim between completing the manuscript and being made aware of Gunnar's objections. It too concerned truth, though more from a formal perspective, and what set me off was that I'd read a short novel by Peter Handke called A Sorrow Beyond Dreams, it was about his mother's suicide and thereby autobiographical. In contrast to my own prose, which constantly leaned toward the emotional and evocative, Handke's prose was dry and unsentimental. When I started writing I'd been trying to achieve a similar style, if not dry, then raw, in the sense of unrefined, direct, without metaphors or other linguistic decoration. The latter would give beauty to the language, and in a description of reality, especially the reality I was trying to describe, that would be deceitful. Beauty is a problem in that it imparts a kind of hope. As a stylistic device in literature, a particular filter through which the world is viewed, beauty lends hope to the hopeless, worth to the worthless, meaning to the meaningless. This is inevitably so. Loneliness beautifully described raises the soul to great heights. But then the writing is no longer true because there is no beauty in loneliness, not even in yearning is there beauty. But while it may not be true, it is good. It is a comfort, a solace, and perhaps that is where some of literature's justification lies? But if that's the case, then we are talking about literature as something else, something unto itself and autonomous, valuable in its own right rather than as a depiction of reality. Peter Handke tried to get away from this in his novel. It was written a few weeks after the funeral, and in it he endeavored to approach his mother and her life in as truthful a way as possible. Not truthful in the sense of things actually having occurred, her having been a real person in the real world, but truthful in its insight and the way that insight is conveyed. He refrained from representing his mother in the text, to have done so, I felt in reading the book, would have been a violation of her as a human being. She was her own person, living her own life, and instead of representing that life, Handke referred to it as something existing outside the text, never inside the text. This meant that he wrote in very general terms about the connections of which she was a part, about the roles she assumed or did not assume, but this general aspect could also potentially be a problem, he stated at one point, in that there was a risk of it becoming independent of her and taking on its own life in the text by virtue of the author's poetic formulations – a betrayal of her, this too. As he wrote, "Consequently, I first took the facts as my starting point and looked for ways of formulating them. But I soon noticed that in looking for formulations I was moving away from the facts. I then adopted a new approach – starting not with the facts but with the already available formulations, the linguistic deposit of man's social experience." In these formulations he searched, as it were, for his mother's life. And he did so, as far as I could understand, in order to protect her dignity and integrity, but something else was going on in the text too; when a person is portrayed from a social viewpoint, through the contemporary eyes of society's culture and self-understanding, with all its various roles and limits, that person's inner being, her singular, individual existence, what used to be called the soul, vanishes, and, I considered, Handke's book was perhaps a story about just that, the suppression of the individual by the social world, the strangulation of the soul. After all, in the end she took her life. Handke steered away from all affect, all feelings, anything anecdotal, anything that might inject life into the text, always insisting that he was writing a text, that the life he was describing exists, or existed, elsewhere, and when, after some seventy pages or so, he arrives at the moment of death and the funeral, which takes place on the fringe of a forest, he writes, "The people left the grave quickly. Standing beside it, I looked up at the motionless trees: for the first time it seemed to me that nature really was merciless. So these were the facts! The forest spoke for itself. Apart from these countless treetops, nothing counted; in the foreground an episodic jumble of shapes, which gradually receded from the picture. I felt mocked and helpless. All at once, in my impotent rage, I felt the need to write something about my mother." This sudden insight into the nature of death is the novel's true starting point. I recognized that insight, it was mine too. However, the book I had written was the direct antithesis of Handke's, its antipode.

I wrote that I had the same insight as Handke when he stood there at the graveside and looked toward the trees and realized that nature was merciless and that the forest spoke for itself. But was that true? How could it be true when that insight had prompted Handke to write a book about his mother and his mother's death in which she was not represented but merely referred to? Given shape only by way of the time in which she lived and the formulations and insights of that time, viewed as an individual who had a certain number of types to choose between, socially and historically determined, albeit of course not without her own personality, though this was not given shape, because then it would have become "typical" of her, and paradoxically a deceit, for the reason that she was always, and invariably, something else. Death in Handke's universe was merciless, and the life he described was merciless too, and given that this is true, his book could not be about mercy. From a literary perspective, mercy lay in beauty, which is to say in the beautiful sentence, and in the creative manifestation, the fictionalization, the secret alliance of events that crisscrossed any novel, because this crisscrossing in itself was an affirmation of meaning and cohesion. So how could Handke's insight be the same as mine when I had written a book about my father's death in which I allowed the text to represent him as if it were in the text that he existed, which is to say making him an object of the reader's own feelings, in prose that sought to form and shape, to creatively make manifest throughout, since it, or its author, was aware that shaping a character into life, making him manifest in that way, rouses or manipulates feelings in a world that was not merciless, because meanings and cohesion would continually be established by their different routes, regardless of what the text otherwise had to say about the matter?

Handke wrote, "The people left the grave quickly. Standing beside it, I looked up at the motionless trees: for the first time it seemed to me that nature really was merciless. So these were the facts! The forest spoke for itself." I wrote, "And death, which I have always regarded as the greatest dimension of life, dark, compelling, was no more than a pipe that springs a leak, a branch that cracks in the wind, a jacket that slips off a clothes hanger and falls to the floor." That was beautiful, it was something, whereas what it described was nothing, empty, neutral, as hopeless as it was merciless. Handke did not lie, or at least he made the greatest efforts not to. I was lying. Why?

When I looked at a tree, I saw that it was blind and arbitrary, an entity that had come into being and would die, and which in the meantime was growing. When I looked at a net full of flapping, silvery fish, I saw the same thing, something blind and arbitrary that came into being, flourished, and would die. When I looked at photos from the Nazi extermination camps, I saw people in the same way. Limbs, heads, bellies, hair, genitals. It had nothing to do with the way I considered them, what I saw was the way these people were viewed at that time, which made it possible for so many to have known about those atrocities and even to have taken part in them without raising a finger. That it was possible to see things in that way was frightening but did not make what was seen any less true. It could be taken as nothing, and all thoughts that sought meaning in the world would have to relate to that zero point. I looked at a tree and I saw meaninglessness. But I saw life too, in its pure, blind form, something that simply existed and was growing. The energy and the beauty of that. Death was indeed nothing, a mere absence. But just as blind life on the one hand could be viewed as a force, something sacred and – well, why not – divine, and on the other hand as something meaningless and empty, death too could be seen in that same way, its song too could be sung, it too could be infused with meaning and beauty. This was what made German National Socialism so infinitely significant to us, a mere two generations having passed since the Nazis were in power, and under their reign of terror, modern in every respect, all three of these perspectives prevailed at once: life as a divine force, death as beautiful and meaningful, human beings as blind, arbitrary, worthless. This aspect, which prior to Nazism belonged to art and to the sublime, became a part of the social order. Handke's mother was a young woman when all that took place, and after describing her childhood years, in Austria between the wars in relative poverty and ignorance, when her wish to learn something, anything, was considered utterly unrealistic and undesirable, Handke sketches out the new mood arising in and around National Socialism, with demonstrations, torchlight parades, buildings festooned with new emblems of nationhood, and writes, "The historic events were represented to the rural population as a drama of nature." Of his mother he states that she continued to have no interest in politics, since "what was happening before her eyes was something entirely different from politics. 'Politics' was something colorless and abstract, not a carnival, not a dance, not a band in local costume, in short, nothing visible."

Nazism was the last major utopian political movement, and it showed itself in nearly every way to be destructive, it has made all subsequent utopian thinking problematic if not impossible, not only in politics but also in art, and since art by its very nature is utopian, it has languished ever since, self-examining and suspicious, something of which Handke's novel and nearly all novels by authors of his generation are an expression. How can reality be represented without adding something it doesn't have? What does it "have" and what does it not "have"? What is authentic and what not authentic?

Where is the line between what is put on and what is not put on? Does a line even exist? Is the world anything more than our conceptions about it? Language has no life of its own, is not itself alive, but invokes life, and the primal mise-en-scène of this, the very source of creative literature, is found in the Odyssey, when Odysseus and his crew moor on the Oceanus River after visiting Circe, and Odysseus offers a sacrifice to the dead on the shore. The dark blood drains darkly away into the pit, and the dead souls flock around it. He sees young girls in bridal dress, young warriors in bloodstained armor, and old men, their screams are terrifying, and the fear runs through him. The first person he recognizes is Elpenor, who died during their stay with Circe and was left unburied. He speaks to Tiresias the soothsayer, who tells of the future, and then Odysseus's own mother drinks of the blood, she recognizes him and tells him how she died. Odysseus wishes to embrace her and approaches three times, yet three times she escapes him, like a dream or a shadow. She tells him her sinews no longer keep flesh and bone together, the funeral pyre having turned her body into ash, and all that is left is her soul, which wanders about. Literature invokes the world as Odysseus invokes the dead, and regardless of whatever way it does this, the distance is always unbridgeable, the stories always the same. A son loses his mother three thousand years ago, a son loses his mother forty years ago. That one of these stories is fiction, the other fact, does nothing to alter their fundamental likeness, both are made manifest in language, and in that perspective all of Handke's efforts to avoid the literary become futile, there is nothing in his depiction of reality that is more real than Homer's. Nor is that what he seeks to do.

Handke endeavors to write about a human being, his mother, without invoking her, without giving her blood in such a way as to make her manifest as something reminiscent of her previous, living form, in other words denying her the fictional life that might connect up what is dead, her existence in the past, with what is living, the mind of the reader. What the language invokes instead is what surrounded her, the shapes in her life, and although her identity, that which was particular to her, becomes visible in this way, it does not speak to us. Moreover, what is invoked by the language is not something found on the other side of some unbridgeable abyss, for these shapes are in themselves of the language in a certain respect, though not in a wholly literal sense. In this way Handke manages to achieve what he presumably set out to, which was to represent reality in a truthful manner. Another way of doing the same thing might be to remove the narrator entirely and simply present the reader with the documents in which the mother was mentioned or which concerned circumstances of which she was a part; in that case the relationship between reality and its representation would be as good as congruent. The "as if" of art, the abyss that separates it from reality, would then be removed completely. Or, more correctly, would merely be sensed as the will that tracked down the documents, gathered them together, and arranged them in a certain order. Of course, the reader might regard that order as manipulative, since in reality the documents were arranged horizontally, in various archives, in different locations, and even a chronological principle would represent an intrusion and create effect: the last entry in the medical journal is followed by the postmortem report, and the reader wipes away a tear.

The important thing for Handke was to describe his mother without traducing her, which is to say without intervening in what was singular to her, out of respect for her integrity. To me this was not a good thought at all, since I had written about a similar set of events in my own life and had done so in a way that was almost diametrically opposed to Handke's, reaching continually toward affect, feeling, the sentimental in contrast to the rational, and dramatizing my father, allowing him to be a character in a story, representing him in the same way as fictional characters are represented, by concealing the "as if" on which all literature depends, and thereby traducing him and his integrity in the most basic of ways, by saying that this was him. I had said the same thing about all the novel's characters, but only in the case of my father had I done so in a way that failed to show consideration to him and the person he was. He had been dead for more than ten years, but that only made it possible, it didn't justify it.

I had thought about none of this while I had been writing, neither the manufacture of reality, representation, nor my father's integrity, everything took place intuitively, I began with a blank page and a will to write, and ended up with the novel as it was. In that there lies a belief in the intuitive that is as good as blind, and from that basis a poetics might be derived, and an ontology too, I suppose, since for me the novel provides a means of thinking radically different from that of the essay, the article, or the thesis, because reflection in the novel is not hierarchically superior as a pathway to understanding, but coordinate with all the other elements in it. The room in which it is conceived is as important as the thought itself. The snow falling through the darkness outside, the headlights of the cars gliding past on the other side of the river. This was perhaps the most important thing I learned at university, that practically anything at all can be said about a novel or a poem, and what is said may be as likely as it is plausible, but never exhaustive, perhaps not even important, since the novel and the poem are always entities in their own right, singular and existing as they are, and the fact that what the novel or the poem says cannot be said in any other way makes them essentially mysterious. The world is mysterious in exactly the same way, and yet we tend to forget this all the time, always giving precedence to reflection whenever we look at it. What does it mean to "walk"? Is it putting one foot in front of the other? Yes, it is. But describing the motor function, the putting of one foot in front of the other, says nothing about what it feels like to walk, of the difference between walking uphill and down, walking along a stone jetty or up a flight of stairs, across a lawn or on the mossy earth of the forest, barefoot or in boots, and even less about the feeling of watching others walk – the pedestrians bustling across the square on a Saturday morning, the lone man striding through snow-covered fields or a person you've known for a very long time, the way their entire character seems to be contained in the way they walk when they come toward you. You see it at once, here "he" or "she" comes. In that unique pattern of movements is all that you know and have experienced about that person, though not as separate, clearly divided parts, what you see is in a way the sum of that person, what they "are" to you. They come walking, you see them, and that's it. One could delve deeper into this, for example scientifically, in which case it's all about muscles and sinews being deployed in a particular way so as to make it possible to put one foot in front of the other, the way the blood runs through the arteries and veins, the gases it transports, the cells and cell walls, the mitochondria and the strings of DNA, not to mention the impulses that race through the nervous system, sent on their way by a will or a wish for movement in the form of chemistry and electrical discharges in the brain, which then begs a whole series of questions. What is will? What is a wish? What is a motor impulse? What form does it have? If it is chemistry, then what is the connection between the various chemical reactions and what we know as will, or the urge to do something? These impulses do not belong to the conscious mind, but to deeper-lying and considerably older parts of the brain, unchanged through millions of years right back to the time our first and most distant ancestors emerged into the world, like the apes in almost every respect apart from their hip sockets and the length of their arms, as well as a few more physiological peculiarities that made it possible for them to do what no other animal until then had been able to do, and which none other is able to do to this day, which was to walk upright on two legs. Walking upright on two legs is what above all distinguishes us as a species. This property characterizes not only our physical but also our mental reality, since we orient ourselves in the world of thought as if it were topographical, a landscape through which we walk, from the depths of the subconscious to the sky of the superego, one political utopia farthest to our left, the other farthest to our right; some thoughts are nearby, either easy to grasp or hard to see because we are right up close, some thoughts we need to reach for, others are higher up and can only be made our own by the greatest, most alpine of efforts, while others are low and grubby, close to the ground and to the earthly.

As a writer you can go that step further or, as Lawrence Durrell describes the process of writing novels, set oneself a goal and walk there in your sleep. The act of "walking" is inexhaustible; however, literature's job is not to be exhaustive but to construct the inexhaustible, at least it is for the kind of literature that aims to represent reality and our ever-changing, fluctuating reactions to it. The trees that are, to put it in the manner of Rilke, and we who pass by it all, like changing breaths of wind. The forest speaks for itself, Handke writes, there is an abyss between us and it, but if nature's mercilessness appears threatening, it is not because it is turned away from us, as it can appear when we look at it, in its almost dreamlike remoteness, but because its muteness and blindness exists in us all. Merciless is the beating heart. Odysseus tried to build a bridge across the abyss, between what was culture and what was nature in his being when he spoke to his heart and beseeched it not to beat so hard. The abyss is inside us. I saw it the first time I stood in front of a dead body. I didn't understand it, but I saw it and knew. Death is not the abyss, but exists in the living, in the space between our thoughts and the flesh through which they pass. In the flesh, thoughts are a kind of intruder, conquerers of a foreign land, who leave it just as quickly again the moment it becomes inhospitable, which is to say when all movements cease and all warmth seeps away, as it does in death.

But it wasn't simply a dead body I saw back then. The dead body was my father. My vague notion of what death was constituted only an infinitely small element in the barrage of thoughts and feelings that consumed me. In front of me lay the person who had created me, his body had made mine, and I had grown up under his supervision, he was the single most important and influential person in my life. The fact that he was dead did nothing to alter that. Nothing was concluded that afternoon in the chapel in Kristiansand.

After speaking to Yngve I took the elevator down to the basement and walked through the damp bunker-like passages in which the ceiling lights futuristically came on by themselves one by one as I proceeded, and reached the laundry room at the exact moment the display on the last of the machines changed from one minute left to zero. I transferred the wet clothes into the tumble dryers, and stuffed the last of the dirty ones into the washing machines, sprinkled washing powder into the little trays, and switched them on, and a second later the machines rumbled and spluttered into life. I stood for a moment, watching their drums revolve, the way the clothes inside became more and more saturated and were slung against the glass, wrenched from sight, slung against the glass, my thoughts wandering to the worst possible scenario, a court case. I saw myself in my mind's eye arriving in a taxi, the blitz of photographers as I left the building, the headlines in the newspapers, KNAUSGAARD THE LIAR, SHAMBLES, SHOULD NEVER HAVE BEEN PUBLISHED, ADMITS LYING, KNAUSGAARD RAPED ME, because I understood all too well that proceedings of that kind would kick up all sorts of other accusations, and that an autobiographical project in which I also wrote about others opened the floodgates for just about anything to be said about me by anyone at all. On its own terms, I wasn't anticipating the novel making any major impact, and neither were the publishers, ten thousand copies were being printed to start with, that was a lot, though no more than my previous novel, but if there was going to be a court case, sales no doubt would rocket. It would be a scandal then, dirty and sensational, and all kinds of shit would be dug up about me. In my thoughts, I sat in the witness box, which for some reason I imagined to be a kind of desk not unlike the ones we'd had at school, on a low platform in the middle of a packed room, answering the most provocative and insinuating questions imaginable. The first was why had I written the novel in the first place. Why had I used people's real names instead of concealing their identities, as was the practice in novels running close to real events, and had been for as long as the genre had existed. Why real life? What was the point? At first I found myself unable to answer and shifted uneasily in the chair, stuttering and stammering much as I sometimes had onstage, most recently in Munich, where many of the small audience that had found its way there had got up and left, something that consumed me with shame whenever I thought about it. But what was the point of wallowing in thoughts of weakness and wretchedness, I thought to myself, and looked up at the ground-level window just below the ceiling, through the cracked pane of which I glimpsed the asphalt outside.

Why not fight back? I straightened my shoulders, and there, in the midst of all the journalists and inquisitive onlookers, perhaps a hundred in total, I began to speak, vividly and full of insight, about the relationship between truth and the subjective, literature's relationship to reality, delving into the nature of social structures, the way a novel of this kind exposed the boundaries to which society adhered but which remained unwritten and were thus invisible insofar as they were melded into us and our self-understanding, and how they for this reason had to be breached before they could be seen. But why did they have to be seen, my defense lawyer asked. There is something all of us experience, which is the same for all human beings, I replied, but which nonetheless is seldom conveyed apart from in the private sphere. All of us encounter difficulties at some point in our lives, all of us know someone with a drinking problem, mental issues, or some other kind of life-threatening affliction, at least this is the case in my experience; every time I meet a new person and get to know them, some narrative like this will eventually come to the surface, a tale of sickness, decline, or sudden death. These things are not represented and thereby seem not to exist, or else to exist only as a burden each of us must bear on our own. But what about the newspapers and the media, the defense lawyer then asked. Surely there's enough death and sickness there? Of course, I said, but there it is presented as facts, described from a distance as a kind of objective phenomenon. The ripple effect of such cases, the impact on the individual and the next of kin, is ignored or briefly referred to as something external. Moreover, it has to be something spectacular to be written about. What I'm talking about is day-to-day life. The metaphor for that is death. Death is present in all our lives, firstly in the shape of something that happens to someone we know, then, eventually, to ourselves. People die in droves every single day. It's something we don't see, it's kept from us. We don't like to talk about it either. Why not? It touches the very depths of everyone's existence. Why do we suppress that? It's the same with aging and human deterioration. If you get too old to look after yourself you're put in an institution, hidden away from everyone. What kind of a society are we living in, where everything that is sick, deviant, or dead is kept from sight? Two generations ago, sickness and death were both very much closer to us, if not a natural part of life then at least unavoidable. I could have written an article about all this, but it wouldn't have said much because arguments have got to be rational, and this is about the opposite, the irrational, all the feelings we have about what it means to confront what has withered away into death, and what that actually is. I remember the first time I saw real sickness, my maternal grandmother was in the final throes of Parkinson's disease, and the sheer physical frailty and human suffering was an enormous shock to me because I had no idea it existed in that way. I knew there was sickness, but I didn't know it was like that. I had a similar experience the first time I worked in an institution for the mentally deficient, I was stunned by what I saw, all those deformed bodies and crippled minds, why had I not known that this too was part of the human experience? It had been kept out of the way, but why? It made me think about what physicality actually is, what it means, the animal or biological, material nature of the human body and its absolute closeness to the world, in contrast to the world picture and self-understanding that comes out of our reflections as to who we are and what kind of terms we exist under, not just in the limitless amounts of scientific research we produce, but also in the limitless amounts of news stories and programs we read and watch, in which this perspective is absent. What I was trying to do was to reintroduce a closeness, trying to get the text to penetrate that whole series of conceptions and ideas and images that hang like a sky above reality, or cling to it like a membrane enclosing the eye, to reach into the reality of the human body and the frailty of the flesh, but not in any general way because generality is a relative of the ideal, it doesn't exist, only the particular exists, and since the particular in this case happens to be me, that was what I wrote about. That's how it is. It was the only goal I had, and that's the reality of the matter. Some people are of the opinion I had no right to do what I was doing because in doing so I was involving other people besides myself. And this is true. My question is why we conceal the things we do. Where is the shame in human decline? The complete human catastrophe? To live the complete human catastrophe is terrible indeed, but to write about it? Why shame and concealment when what we are dealing with here is basically the most human thing of all? What's so dangerous about it that we cannot speak of it out loud?

Gunnar's lawyer, who had stood pensively listening to all this, looked at me in a way I took to indicate sarcasm.

"All well and good, Knausgaard," he said. "But the truth is that your father's demise did not occur in the manner in which you have described. We have witnesses. He drank and had his problems, certainly, but his demise was quiet and uneventful. Moreover, the fact of the matter is that your grandmother did not drink at all. The two years you, in your colorful depiction, would have them living and drinking together exist only in your imagination.

He lived with her for three months. The house was not littered with empty bottles. Nor did you wash the house down, as you have written, because your uncle did that. And therefore my question to you is this: Why are you lying about these matters? You, who wish to write about the world the way it is, why should you, of all people, depict a world that never existed? That is the issue facing us today. You can try to hide behind as much existential intellectualism as you like, to my mind it's pretentious gibberish, so pompous it makes me feel sick just standing here listening to it. However, that is not the matter at hand, at least not today, but from what I can deduce from your self-exalting and conceited claptrap, you consider what you have written to be the truth, this to your mind being the whole point of your despicable and duplicitous novel. Only then it turns out not to be the truth at all. Can you explain that to me?"

I stared at him stiffly, unable to move.

"It's how I remember it," I said after a while.

"Not good enough!" the lawyer barked. "You have offended these people, desecrated the memories of two deceased members of your own family. You sold your father and grandmother for blood money. And all you can say is it's how you remember it? Violating the privacy of your family is a serious enough matter on its own, a criminal offense, but to have lied about your uncle's mother and his brother exacerbates that offense tenfold. We're talking about defamation of character, carrying a sentence of up to three years' imprisonment."

He wiped the perspiration from his brow and swept his blond hair from his face in one and the same movement, then looked at me, waiting.

"But I did wash the house down," I said. "It's not true that I can't manage things like that. I may have exaggerated the chaos inside the house, but it was dreadful. And as for what I've written about my father, it's my own story I'm telling. That can't be against the law, surely? Can it?"

I consciously avoided glancing at Gunnar, who sat proudly in the first row, having refused to acknowledge my gesture of reconciliation in the minutes prior to proceedings commencing, when, heroically and forgivingly, I had extended my hand toward him, and crossed the floor back to my seat to await the testimony of the first witness, the Swedish essayist, professor, and member of the Swedish Academy Horace Engdahl, the man who for many years had announced the winner of the Nobel Prize, known for his literary elegance and incomparable style, classmate of suspected Palme assassin Christer Pettersson, and friend of the wild and fearlessly gifted writer Stig Larsson. I had seen Engdahl at a seminar in Bergen many years before; he had veered off the theme and talked about Carina Rydberg and her novel Den högsta kasten, The Highest Caste, it was at the time when the controversy surrounding that book had been at its peak in Sweden – she had written about actual people, using their full names – and Engdahl had said that, quite apart from the bickering to which it had given rise, the book was first and foremost a brilliant work of literature. I suppose I was hoping he would say the same about my own book. On the other hand, I found myself thinking as I stood there, staring emptily at the washing machine and the soapy water that sloshed against the glass, there was something essentially elitist and superior about the man, he was a literary aristocrat, and how was that going to look in court, with Gunnar coming across as the man in the street, the everyman who quite unwittingly found his life destroyed by his writer nephew? People would think it could happen to them too, and shudder at the thought. I would be made out to be the basest of human beings, a kind of literary vampire, brutal and without consideration, self-seeking and egoistic. Perhaps an aristocrat wouldn't be the right person to argue in favor of such a practice?

A door opened in the passage, perhaps it was someone who had booked the washing machines I was now using, and I turned my head to look, but the faint footsteps came to a halt at another door, which whoever it was then opened. I waited a few seconds for them to go inside, then went out. The sounds of the laundry room were cut off abruptly by the heavy slam of the steel door closing behind me. It felt like I was in the depths of some great factory, I thought to myself. I went up the stairs, through the door, and out onto the square, I needed to get some cigarettes. The fruit merchant waved at me, I was probably his best customer. I smiled and waved back, twirling my key strap around my index finger and crossing to the other side of the square, glancing as always at the shoes in the window of the Nilson store as I went by.

Lars Norén had written about a Nilson shop in his expansive diaries, which I'd read halfway through the previous summer, he'd expressed astonishment at the fact that a woman – I couldn't quite remember if it was his daughter or his new girlfriend – could buy her shoes there, apparently Nilson wasn't good enough for him, he bought his own shoes in a different class of shop altogether, so I understood, though until then I'd always thought of the place as having a certain status. Now it was impossible for me to go past the store without thinking about it, Norén's cosmopolitan consternation at the provincial footwear habits of others. I glanced at another shop on the other side of the street, as was my habit, since it sold underwear and often displayed posters of scantily clad women in its windows, before pushing open the door of Thomas Tobak and stepping inside, where Thomas himself looked up amiably, before looking down again at a receipt he seemed to be checking.

"Hello there," he said.

"Hello," I said. "Three packs of Lucky, please."

He picked them off the shelf behind him.

"No papers today?" he asked.

I shook my head.

"A hundred and forty-seven, then," he said.

I took my card out of my back pocket.

"You can use this one," he said, nodding at a new card reader he'd got, one that read the chip rather than the magnetic stripe, which was good for both of us, since the stripe on my card was rather the worse for wear and he'd had to key in the number manually on more than one occasion. Not that he minded, he always had plenty of time for his customers, no matter how busy he was.

"Well, that's something," I said. "Thanks a lot!"

"No problem," he said.

With the three packs in my hand I went out again, into the pedestrian street that ran down to the first of the canals, then on to Gustav Adolfs torg, teeming with people on Saturday mornings but now almost deserted.

The children.

Where were they?

I stopped.

They were at the nursery. I'd dropped them off there.

Or had I?

What had I done that morning?

Flustered, I tried to recall some definite occurrence that would confirm to me that I had taken them to the nursery and delivered them there, and then, in the same instant, I remembered we'd gone back for Vanja's glasses, and everything was all right.

I started walking again and went around the corner, past the flower stall first, then the fruit stall, still with a vague sense of unease; I hadn't given the children a thought all morning, and if they'd been anywhere else but at the nursery I would have been grossly neglecting them. The previous summer I'd read about a Danish father who forgot to stop off at the nursery one morning, his child had been asleep in the back when he parked the car, he explained, and he had gone into work oblivious. The child had died in the heat. Something similar could easily happen to me, I'd often thought, and if I happened to be out with only two of them, I could find myself suddenly stricken with terror. Where's John? Have I forgotten him somewhere? Where is he? Where the hell is he? And then I would realize he was at home with Linda and everything was all right. But even though I'd been through it before, the fear could come back at any time, where is he, with Linda, how can you be sure that wasn't yesterday, think back!

I passed the key card over the panel and pushed the door open. A postman was delivering the mail, putting it in the various mailboxes. I nodded and stopped. He dropped a small pile into ours, I waited until he stepped out of the way, then retrieved it, opened the elevator door and flicked through the bundle on my way up. There was a letter from Svea Inkasso, the debt collection company, three bills, a Bamse magazine, and an advertising brochure from Spirit. I opened the door and went inside, dumping it all on top of the pile on the table under the mirror before taking my shoes off and putting them away in the cupboard. I put two of the cigarette packs in the drawer of my desk, took the third out with me onto the balcony and sat down, poured myself a cup of coffee from the vacuum jug, opened the packet, took out a cigarette, and lit up.

Above me a pigeon cooed, the sound came suddenly and was very close. I looked up, it sounded like it came from inside the roof.

Uuhh-huu-huuu, it said.

Uuhh-huu-huuu.

The bird scratched about up there, presumably it was the sound of its claws against the zinc I could hear, it had tried to change position and now couldn't get purchase. Oh, its claws, they were so prehistoric, what were they doing on modern metal?

I poured myself some more coffee.

The pigeon sailed into the air above me, gliding toward the rooftop on the other side, perhaps two floors down, where it settled on a TV aerial.

Faintly, as if from the depths of the apartment below, came the sound of a door buzzer. A few seconds passed before I connected it to Geir being due. I got to my feet and went back inside, down the hall, as it buzzed again.

I picked up the entry phone.

"Yes?" I said.

"It's Gunnar. Is that you, you bastard? I'm here to get you!"

"Come in," I said, and pressed the button until I heard the door open downstairs, then hung up, opened the door, and stood waiting at the elevator.

Geir emerged shoving a big black suitcase in front of him. Njaal came out behind him, hugging his leg; the look he gave me was partly suspicious, partly curious. Geir put his hand out without smiling, then looked up at me.

"Hi," he said hurriedly, as if he'd lost his breath, already leaving the greeting behind.

"So you found it all right?" I said.

"I have been here before, in case you'd forgotten," he said, bundling past me into the hall, where he put the suitcase down and bent down to help Njaal off with his shoes.

"How could I forget?" I said.

He looked up and smiled.

"Relax, it's going to be all right."

"What is?"

"Whatever's worrying you."

He bent down again and took his sandals off.

"Where are Heidi and Vanja?" said Njaal.

"At the dagis," I said. "They'll be home again soon. You can play with their toys while you're waiting."

He stepped cautiously toward their room.

"Good to see you," I said as Geir straightened up.

"I'm sure," he said. "You'll be saving a fortune on your phone bill now."

"You think I call too often, is that it?"

"Often?" he said. "It's all I do! Get up, brush my teeth, talk to you, have some lunch, talk to you, have some dinner, talk to you, brush my teeth, go to bed. I wonder what's going to happen tomorrow, I think to myself. Who knows, maybe Karl Ove might call?"

"Do you want some coffee or something?" I said.

"You bet I do."

He followed me into the kitchen, angling his head slightly upward, the way he often did when we hadn't seen each other for a long time, a wide, sardonic smile on his face, as if to say, I know you.

And in a way, he did.

When we moved to Malmö I had been afraid Geir and I would lose touch. That's what distance does; when the time between conversations gets longer, intimacy diminishes, the little things connected to one's daily life lose their place, it seems odd to talk about a shirt you just bought or to mention you're thinking of leaving the dishes until morning when you haven't spoken to a person for two weeks or a month, that absence would seem instead to call for more important topics, and once they begin to determine the conversation there's no turning back, because then it's two diplomats exchanging information about their respective realms in a conversation that needs to be started up from scratch, in a sense, every time, which gradually becomes tedious, and eventually it's easier not to bother phoning at all, in which case it's even harder the next time, and then suddenly it's been half a year of silence. But that didn't happen. Far from it, we were in touch even more after I moved away, we talked more often on the phone, and for a lot longer, to the extent that sometimes I found myself wondering if it was normal, which filled me with a vague sense of unease because I didn't want not to be normal. A typical day would be me phoning him first at nine in the morning, when we would talk for anything from twenty minutes to an hour and a half, then I'd call him again in the afternoon, when I'd read him what I'd written during the day, and he would comment on it. He never criticized but would discuss what I'd written in such a way as to open it up, presenting other perspectives and possibilities, which I would often make use of in what I wrote the day after. Occasionally, we spoke in the evenings too, though I tried to keep it to a minimum, sensing that Linda perhaps found all this talking to Geir rather excessive. But I had no friends in Malmö, no other writers I saw, and the only space I had in which to talk about the things that interested and occupied me was this, and since it had been going on for several years I saw no need to be any different to what I was, no need to pretend I was any smarter than I was or say anything else other than what I actually thought. Many of the ideas and conceptions I discussed either directly or indirectly in the book had come from Geir, just as we also talked about the directions in which they took me. He was an influence, my thoughts were increasingly similar to his, and the only redeeming aspect of this, because that was the way I looked at it, was that I allowed the thoughts I so shamelessly appropriated from him to find resonance in what belonged to me, my own story and biography, as well as the fact that I likewise played a part in his work and development, though not as significantly and in a quite different way that was less threatening to his own integrity. Six years previously he had traveled to Baghdad and stayed there before, during, and after the American invasion of Iraq. His intention was to write a book about war, and he had entered the country as a human shield, a cover that gave him enormous freedom and allowed him to interview all kinds of people who in one way or another were affected by the war. He had spent the six years since his return writing that book, a process that slowly but surely was approaching its conclusion.

His working title was Against Better Judgment. It could have been his motto.

I poured the coffee into the mugs and handed him his. Outside the window the rooftops and their ridges, red against the sky's blue, seemed to slant inward, it was something to do with perspective, I was looking at them diagonally from above, and it created an illusion. It had struck me the very first time I had stood here looking out. We were being shown the apartment, and that faint feeling of dizziness it had given me made me certain I wanted to live here. Now I was used to it, but Geir being here made me notice again.

"Anything more from him?" he said.

"From Gunnar?" I said.

He nodded, and flashed me a grin I might have taken to be malicious if I hadn't known him better.

"No. Enough's enough, don't you think?"

"Absolutely," he said, still grinning.

"You can wipe that smile off your face, then," I said.

"I'm in a good mood, that's all. Oh, but you wouldn't have noticed, would you? Ha ha."

"My problem's a bit bigger than that."

"I know. Your problem is that you're a bad person."

"Exactly."

"And, I should add, one of the few true narcissists."

"If you say so."

"There's no doubt about it. The only reason I point it out is because I'm one too."

"I'm not sure I follow. You put up with me and all my morbid self-absorption, because you're just the same, morbidly self-absorbed? Wouldn't it be more logical for you to hate me for taking up time better spent on yourself?"

"My ego's big enough for it not to bother me."

He looked up at me and grinned again as he lifted the mug to his lips.

There was a crash from the living room.

"Njaal, what are you up to in there?" he called.

Njaal's little voice said something back.

"Do you want to come outside while I have a smoke?" I said. He nodded and we went out onto the balcony. On our way we saw Njaal sitting on the floor surrounded by toys he'd taken out of the round ottoman, it was the lid that had dropped on the floor. We sat down on either side of the little camping table. I lit a cigarette and put my feet up on the railing.

"Do you want something else to think about?" he said.

"That wouldn't be bad," I replied.

"I was in town the other day and bought a pair of clogs."

"I don't think this is going to be enough to lift me up into the light," I said.

"The reason I bought them was to annoy my neighbor," he said. "If it doesn't work, I'm going to buy some for Christina and Njaal as well."

"You mean you're wearing clogs indoors now?" I asked, and looked at him inquiringly.

He nodded.

"It's a war. As soon as I get home I put them on and jump up and down on the floor for an hour or so."

"Like Donald Duck, you mean?"

"No, Donald Duck gets mad, that's all. He's totally irrational. This is rational. I'm exploiting the advantages of the terrain. I'm higher up than him. My floor is his ceiling."

"Haven't you thought about beating him up? Dragging him out into the woods and giving him a good hiding?"

"That would be too brutal, even if it is touch and go. And we could lose the tenancy. I don't want to risk that. There's no rule against clogs, though. No one can deny me clogs. If he laid a finger on Christina or Njaal, that'd be different. You've got to measure your violence. It's all about violence against over-violence. I could have shot him, but that would have been excessive. The same goes for beating him up. You've got to wait and see how the conflict develops and tailor your violence according to how much is reasonable. That's Clausewitz. Violence is a means of removing a problem. A practical measure."

"So you've thought about beating him up, then?"

"Of course I have. But this is the best solution. I'm going to be wearing clogs until he gives in. If it takes a year, I'll wear clogs for a year. If it takes ten, I'll wear them for ten."

"You're out of your mind."

"Not in the slightest! I'm involved in a conflict with my downstairs neighbor. He attacked me. I tried to be reasonable, but it didn't work. So I'm retaliating. I'm not doing anything against the rules, and he'll discover that soon enough. And then the only way he'll be able to stop it will be to give in. He knows that. There are three ways he can get out of this. One, he moves out. Two, his wife apologizes to Christina. Three, he never speaks to us again and never so much as looks at us when we meet, i.e., stays well and truly away. If you ask me, my guess is he'll go with the latter. But we'll see. For the moment, he's sticking it out."

"You make it sound like a normal way of dealing with things," I said. "But it's not, is it? No one resolves a conflict by buying themselves a pair of clogs and tramping around in them indoors. And the way you talk about it as well. Exploiting the advantages of the terrain. Anyone would think you were an army unit taking a hill in Vietnam or something. But it's an apartment in Stockholm we're talking about."

"A conflict is a conflict," he said. "I know this is going to end it. There's no way he can win. No one can withstand the sound of clogs on a floor. He'll last a month, maybe two. Then he'll come creeping and ask what he can do to make me stop. You'll see. It'll be problem solved."

"Not his."

"No, but his is unsolvable. Mine, on the other hand, isn't."

A few months earlier Geir and Christina had moved out of their two-room apartment in Västertorp to a four-room in the same neighborhood. Even as they were moving in, their downstairs neighbor had complained about the disturbance as they lugged their furniture and boxes up the stairs. He complained about their hammering when they were hanging their pictures on the wall. They told him they would try to move in as quietly as they could, but that it was impossible for them not to make some noise. A few weeks after, he complained about doors being slammed and Njaal running across the floor. Geir fitted rubber strips around the doors and cupboard doors, and put more mats down on the floors. The neighbor wrote a formal complaint to the landlord. Besides the noise from the apartment, there was the noise in the stairwell whenever they went in and out, and the stroller inside the street door. Geir responded in a letter to the effect that they were as considerate as they could be. They never played music, never held parties, and went to bed every night at ten. The noise their neighbor was complaining about was the same as that made by any normal family with children, and there was nothing to be done about it. His letter, as I understood it, only made the neighbor even more furious, he had even confronted Geir one time in the basement. The situation reminded me of when Linda and I lived in Stockholm and had a neighbor who likewise complained about everything we did and behaved threateningly toward us. We too had tried to accommodate her demands, but they had been too unreasonable for it to work. We solved the issue by moving out. I still felt the panic grab hold of me if one of the children was noisy, if they happened to kick a radiator, for instance, or thump around on the floor. A chill of anxiety would run through me, and I'd be there like a shot to make them stop. Our neighbors here had never complained, it was the fear of our Stockholm neighbor that still lived inside me, three years after we moved away. I'd spoken to Christina about it, and her reaction was the same as mine, to try to eliminate the cause and tiptoe around. Geir was made of sterner stuff. He didn't internalize, he retaliated. He had resorted to buying the clogs now, he told me, because of something that had only just happened. Christina had been out on the balcony with Njaal and had gone in again for a moment when she heard shouting from the balcony below. What's going on up there? It turned out Njaal had opened the lid of the parasol stand, which had been full of water, and some of the water had dripped down onto the neighbors below. Christina had no idea what had happened, and said they hadn't been doing anything. Whereupon the wife had shouted to her husband that the bitch was being cheeky. As soon as Geir heard about this he got in the car, drove into town, and bought the clogs he'd been tramping about in ever since, from when he got up in the morning until he went to bed at night.

"It sounds like you're enjoying yourself while you're at it," I said.

"Not the actual going around in clogs. They're a bit clunky for my liking. But the thought of it driving him mad down there without him being able to do a thing about it, that's different. That gives me pleasure, yes."

"I'd prefer if it didn't," I said.

He laughed.

"A few weeks and I can take them off again."

"You're not solving anything. He's just going to find something else to rile you with."

"If he does, I'll step things up. It's a war. The point being that the enemy has to be made to understand you're always going to be ready to go a step further than him. And when he does, that's when you've won."

"But there's a difference between major and minor conflicts, isn't there?"

"That's where you're wrong. The principle's exactly the same. As soon as he realizes he's not going to get anywhere with me, and that I'm willing to take it further than he is, no matter what he decides to do, then he'll surrender. Wait and see."

"I will," I said.

"Your strategy, putting up with everything and hoping it'll all go away, doesn't work with that kind of person."

"That's what you say," I said. "But I'm still not sure you know what you're doing."

Njaal opened the door and stepped outside.

"It's high," he said.

"Yes, very high up," said Geir.

Njaal got down on his knees and peered through the gap between the concrete floor and the railing.

"There's something there!" he exclaimed.

"Is it that paintbrush?" I said. "Vanja dropped that. There are some lighters down there too, I think. Ones I've dropped."

"Can I throw something down?" he asked, and looked up at his father.

"I don't think that's such a good idea, Njaal," Geir said.

"How about we go out to the garden?" I said. "Let him run around a bit? I don't need to pick the kids up for another couple of hours yet. We could go in your car."

An hour and a half later we sat chatting on a couple of chairs by the hedge, in a hum of wasps and bumblebees as we watched Njaal run around on the grass. We had a paddling pool, but he didn't want to go in. Now and again he came up to guzzle some fruit juice, in that unrestrained, greedy way in which children drink, and then he'd be gone again, on his way across the grass in the direction of something else that had caught his attention. When we bought the place it had been one of the neatest of all the cabins. Two years on, and everything about it had fallen into decline. But in the frenzied flourish of summer it wasn't hard to call the garden lush instead of neglected. And anyway, this wasn't a day to worry about it.

There was a sound of lawn mowers, and two gardens from ours two families stood nattering away in their Skåne dialects, but apart from that the place was quiet. I tried to explain to Geir how I felt, to define the emotion so he could understand, and ended up calling it terror. I could easily see how superficial it all seemed to anyone on the outside. It wasn't in the least bit likely that Gunnar was going to call or turn up; he had severed all contact with me, any correspondence went between him and the publisher, with me copied in. Maybe he was afraid of me and hadn't the guts for a direct confrontation? Judging from what he'd said about me, this was wholly unlikely. In his eyes I was a sixteen-year-old layabout with no self-knowledge, a money-grubber inflamed with hatred. It was far more likely he was avoiding me because I was a disgrace. A third and final possibility was because he didn't think I was responsible for my own actions, I was a Knausgaard, after all, and this was his way of going easy on me. At one point this had been what I'd thought, and it still made me feel strangely warm, but I had long since realized it was a kind of wishful thinking.

We talked about it. Which is to say, Geir talked and I listened. I'd heard everything before and was convinced I'd thought every thought that could possibly be conceived on the matter, when all of a sudden Geir asked:

"How old is he, anyway?"

"About fifty-five, I think."

"And here you are. Gray hair. Gray beard. Forty years old. You're about the same age. You shouldn't put up with someone your own age treating you like that."

"That never occurred to me."

"What?"

"That we're the same age."

How odd that this should be such a liberating thought. Most of what Geir had said had already occurred to me and I'd thought about it myself, but not that. Gunnar and I were the same age. He wasn't above me. One thing was recognizing this, another was understanding it.

"He saw you when you were in diapers, that's the problem here. You're always going to be a kid to him. But it doesn't mean you have to be a kid in your own eyes when you're dealing with him."

"He's my dad, isn't he?"

"I know that. But you're more than just feelings and irrationality. You're thoughts as well, and rationality. Let them take over. It'll all sort itself out then."

"You make it sound like I've got a choice."

"And?"

I raised my hand in the air.

"Enough for now. How are things, anyway?"

He laughed. "Oh no, you don't."

"All right, so it was an abrupt change of subject. But only so you'd take the hint. Isn't that how it's supposed to work?"

"What?"

"Social interaction. The conversation has to move on at some point. It's the normal procedure, so I'm told."

"I think we've gone beyond polite convention, don't you?"

"Certainly not. How are things, anyway?"

"Let me see," he said. "I sit in my room and write . . ."

He looked up at me.

"Same as usual in other words. There you go. Should we talk about Gunnar again?"

An hour later, as I carried the two chairs into the open shed at the side of the little cabin, I felt a sense of relief. Maybe things weren't that bad after all. Maybe it wasn't the end of the world. I put the glasses and cups on the counter in the kitchen, heard Njaal running on the gravel outside the gate, locked the door and went out through the garden, breaking into a trot so as to catch up with them. We'd left the car in the parking area a hundred meters away. Every garden I passed was immaculate, with little ponds and sculptures, hedges straight and trimmed to perfection, lawns like billiard tables. The people who owned them moved out here in May and stayed until September, most were retired, and to them gardening was a lifestyle. I found it all so ghastly. I hated the place, really hated it. Being here was like being on display, viewed not as the person you were, whoever that was, but as the person you looked like you were. The fact that I knew the rules of such places from my own childhood did nothing to improve matters, for how on earth had I got myself into buying a property, however small, in the midst of this inferno? How could I have been so oblivious to myself?

I caught up with Geir and Njaal just before the barrier where the parking area began.

"The next novel I write starts here," I said. "Have I told you that? The last world war never happened and Nazism spread peacefully through Europe. The main character grows up here. All through his childhood and youth he's been thinking about Africa. That's the first sentence: 'In all the time I was growing up I read about Africa. It filled me with a yearning so great it was almost unbearable.' Something like that. I read this article once in Dagens Nyheter about the Nazis' plans for the world. They mapped out this gigantic port on the coast of North Africa. The rest of the continent was just darkness, nothing there. That would be a good framework for a novel. A world planned and ordered down to the minutest detail, everything in it utterly controlled in all its aesthetics, and then this other world in which everything is unknown, unpredictable and improvised, where things happen and are then just gone again. Do you see what I'm getting at?"

He nodded.

"I see you needing a hideaway from what you've got going. It's an escape attempt, pure and simple."

"You're probably right. But I mean it, seriously. Africa is something else entirely. I saw that when I went there, and I've seen it in lots of documentaries, too. What we haven't understood yet is that Africa is our utopia, not this."

Geir opened the car door, and Njaal climbed onto the backseat. I waited until Geir got him strapped in, then got in the passenger side. A couple of other car doors were opened and closed a bit farther away, it reminded me of a parking lot next to a marina or a landing stage, people lugging cooler bags back and forth, and camping chairs, people in shorts and skirts, their tanned skins, their lazy movements, the extravagance of the great blue sky and the serene surroundings, broken by such trivial occurrences, objects lifted and carried, doors slamming shut, the mutter of voices.

"We should stop all development aid to Africa. Stop all trade and pull out completely, let them get on with it. The way it is now all we're doing is carrying on the colonial relationship, which says we're better than them, look at the way they do things, they can't govern themselves, can't keep anything in order, they can't even manage to organize schools. It's a mess. They've got wars, child soldiers. All that shit. No, cut them off, leave them all to it. Close the continent. I hate that underlying thought that runs through everything we do in the world, the idea that everyone's got to be like us. That's the real hell. The bigger the differences, the better, as far as I'm concerned. African cultures are so glaringly different from our own. They're the utopia, not us."

"You like that wording, don't you?" said Geir. He put on his awkward-looking aviator sunglasses and pulled slowly away across the dusty parking area toward the shady asphalt of the road at the top end.

"What, the utopia part, you mean?"

"That part, yes."

"But it's what I think."

"I know you do. It's that yearning of yours for the seventeenth century, only in another bottle."

"Maybe. But anyway, a dystopian novel with a main character who grew up here and who longs for Africa, and probably goes there at some point. When the narrative takes place he's an old man living on an island in the Baltic."

"Let me guess. You went there on holiday? Slite, on Gotland, was that it?"

"Thereabouts. It's not much of a plot, but it's a start."

"What are you going to call it?"

"The Third Realm."

"Another Nazi title."

"I suppose, but it's a good title."

"I'm sure it is. Didn't I think of it?"

"I don't know. Did you?"

"I'm pretty sure. But you can't remember, can you?"

We left the cabins, Geir halted at the roundabout until there was a gap, then drew slowly away, accelerating out of the curve. There was a bus pulled in at the bus stop, apart from that the road ahead was empty. It was half past three, still a while before the rush hour got going.

"You've got a funny kind of memory. Someone will say something to you, or else you'll read something, then you forget all about it until all of a sudden it pops up again while you're writing, completely removed from its orginal context, as if you'd thought of it yourself."

"Isn't that what they call plagiarism?" I said, feeling a warmth rise to my cheeks.

He looked at me for a second.

"No, it's what's called freedom. It's because you're made in such a way that you're writing a novel, whereas I'm writing nonfiction. I've been destroyed by academia. It makes me check and double-check everything I do. I can't write a sentence without adding a footnote with a reference. I'm tied down. You're without bonds entirely."

"You're reliable, I'm not."

"All right, no need to be harsh on yourself. What you're doing works!"

"I suppose you're going to tell me it was you who came up with the My Struggle title as well?"

"Well, now that you mention it."

"Seriously?"

"It was in a sentence you said, my struggle, and I said there you go, there's your title. That's how it was."

"Shit."

"It's how you work. Your head's this simmering pot, everything goes into the soup."

We drove along Bellevuevägen, lined with low detached homes in light-colored brick. It looked like Denmark, the way a lot of things did in Malmö and Skåne. Geir stopped at a light by the Statoil station, Njaal kept shuffling back and forth in his seat like he was trying to take in as much as possible of what was going on outside. The light changed and Geir accelerated quickly, soon we were stuck behind a bus. There was a big advertising banner running under the rear window. It was for a local firm of real estate agents and showed four smiling women in dark suits that made them look a bit like airline hostesses. I'd seen the image lots of times before, it was all over the buses in the city, and the bus shelters too, so I'd already had time to consider it before it turned up again in front of us now.

"See that photo there?" I said.

"Yes, what about it?" said Geir.

"I bet I know which one of those women you'd fancy," I said. "And don't deny it just to spite me if I'm right, OK?"

"OK," he said.

"You'd go for the one on the right."

He laughed.

"Correct," he said. "But the only reason you got it right is because you like her too."

"No, mine's second from the left. I've stared at that picture so many times."

"Straight up?"

He laughed again.

"It's not often you surprise me. How did you know which one was mine?"

"I know you. It was a no-brainer."

"Can't say the same for you. I'd never have thought you'd pick her. For me there's only one in it, the one on the right. It's inconceivable anyone could think differently!"

"Make a right here," I said. Geir indicated and changed lanes, the bus heading straight on.

"It's like with those clogs," he said. "Before you told me I was mad, the thought never even occurred to me it was anything but normal. To me it's a completely logical, reasonable thing to do."

"You mean jumping up and down on the floor wearing clogs to get back at a downstairs neighbor?"

"Not to get back at him. To resolve the conflict. To break his will. But apart from that, yes, to me that's perfectly natural. I had no idea anyone could think otherwise."

"I thought you were a sociologist."

"I am. But I'm a human being too."

We passed the Kronprinsen, a high-rise housing project built in the sixties, which until the Hilton went up had been Malmö's tallest building. The road was edged by the trees of the Slottsparken on our right, and we followed the increasing flow of cars, which glittered in the sunlight.

Geir laughed.

"You got me there. You mean you actually knew?"

"Nothing odd about that, surely?"

"Yes, there is. I didn't know myself."

After we'd parked the car, I rode up in the elevator with them and let them in, then went out again to get the children. John got off his trike as soon as he saw me and came running. The girls were in the sandpit next to the little playhouse, they had seen me but weren't letting on. With John on my arm I went over to Karin and asked her how things had gone. Fine, she said, the older ones had been in the park before lunch, John had stayed behind. They were all in good cheer and it had been a lovely day.

"John still hasn't got any diapers, Karl Ove," said Nadje, who was sitting on the bench just behind us.

Oh fuck, I knew there was something I'd forgotten!

"Sorry," I said. "It slipped my mind completely. I can run over and get some now, if you want."

"No need. As long as he's got some tomorrow, that'll be fine."

"I'll make sure of it. Sorry. Were you able to work around it?"

"We borrowed a couple."

"OK, thanks, much appreciated. I completely forgot."

She smiled wearily, I smiled back and carried John over to the stroller so Vanja and Heidi could see it was time to go instead of just hearing me say so.

"Time to go, girls!" I called out.

There weren't that many children there, a lot of them were still on holiday. Of all the parents, we used the nursery the most, at least so it seemed to me, but perhaps it was just because I felt so guilty about all the times ours were on their own here while I was writing. I pulled the stroller over to a chair in the sun and sat down.

"Five minutes!" I called. "That's all, OK?"

Vanja looked across at me and nodded. I leaned back and gazed up at the sky, it was bright blue, the wispy elongated clouds that were so typical of summer floating like vaporous sheets in the distance. I felt the air on my face, a cool breeze sweeping over the rooftops, whirling through the yard, brushing all things, my body too, my sticky skin which shivered with pleasure at the unexpected, delicate chill. I felt the urge for a cigarette, sat up straight in the chair, and looked at John in his blue sun hat, the grime around his mouth, his unworried radiance as he sat there staring at two children who came biking past. Either he wanted something and would be tormented if he couldn't get it, or else he wanted nothing and was simply himself, at ease with the world as it was.

"Vanja and Heidi!" I called out. "Come on, time to go!"

"A bit longer!" Vanja shouted back.

"We have visitors," I said. "Njaal and Geir have come. We can't keep them waiting much longer. Njaal's looking forward to seeing you."

"Are they here now?" she asked, and looked at me inquisitively.

I nodded.

"They came a bit early. Come on, let's go. You can get a banana on the way, if you want."

"An ice cream," she said.

"You and your ice cream," I said, and gave her a stern look.

"Can we?" she asked again with a cheeky smile.

"Well, OK," I said.

"Heidi, we can have an ice cream!" she shouted out.

I looked down at the ground, embarrassed that the other children should hear that mine were having ice cream. Or rather, embarrassed that the staff should hear me say so out loud for anyone to hear.

"We're getting an ice cream, Karin!" said Heidi, her hand already gripping the stroller.

"How nice," said Karin with a smile.

"While the summer's still here," I said.

"Enjoy it!" she replied.

"Will do," I said, pressing the door opener. "Vanja, do you want to run on and open the gate?"

Like a wind she swept past me, pulled the handle down and heaved open the gate, three big steps back, her little body bent almost double as she pulled.

"Well done!" I said. "Say goodbye to all your friends."

Vanja and Heidi ignored me completely, while John, who no one could see in his stroller, waved and shouted, "Hej då!"

"We have visitors at home, Heidi and John," I said as we strolled along the shady sidewalk. A gust of wind pressed Heidi's skirt against her legs and held it there for a moment.

"Do we?" she said. "Who?"

"Njaal and Geir. Can you remember Njaal?"

"A little."

"He's one day younger than you."

"What?"

"His birthday's the day after yours."

We stopped at the crossing, then went over. John protested, he wanted to go on the other side. He twisted around in the stroller and glared at me full of rage and despair.

"Do you want an ice cream too, John?"

"Yes," he said, and turned round again.

When we got to the two yellow mailboxes outside Hemköp, I said:

"Right, I want you to listen now. You can have your ice creams when we've paid for the shopping and not before. OK?"

All three nodded and we went inside into the supermarket's icy environment. Vanja and Heidi ran off, presumably to the ice creams, while John wriggled to get out of his stroller as fast as he could. I stopped and lifted him out, his feet hardly touched the ground before he was off after the girls. I snatched two packets of red sausages, the ones with the highest meat content, something I had suddenly and rather neurotically become obsessed with after someone at the nursery made me realize there were big differences from brand to brand, then dropped a bag of hot-dog buns into the basket along with a regular loaf, a bag of coffee, the dark-roast French blend I'd settled for after six months of experimentation and had since stuck to, a liter of milk, a liter of yogurt, a six-pack of beer, toilet paper, and a packet of four bars of soap, seeing as how we had visitors and they probably washed their hands more than we did, and finally three ice creams.

John wanted to walk the rest of the way home, which meant I could put the shopping in the stroller.

Had it got colder now?

Yes, the temperature had dropped in the short time since I left the apartment.

"I can see Malmö!" John shouted. Somehow he'd got it into his head it was our apartment that was called Malmö.

Vanja looked at me and giggled.

I smiled back at her.

"Is there anyone on the balcony, John?" I asked him.

"No-o-o," he said.

"There's a young gutt waiting for us at home, did you know?"

He looked up at me, perplexed.

"Daddy means a pojke!" said Heidi. A boy!

"Just det," I said. "Jag måste tala svenska nu." That's right. I'll have to speak Swedish now.

"Pappa, inte," said Vanja. Don't, Daddy!

"Are you ashamed of me?"

"No, you're just stupid."

"That's true."

The light changed from red to green just as we got to the crossing. I reached my hand out, John took it, while the girls held on to either side of the stroller. On the opposite sidewalk I gave the keys to Vanja, who ran ahead and opened the door, holding it open for us so I could maneuver the stroller inside and pull it up the three steps after me, while Heidi and John stood heaving at the elevator door without it budging in the slightest.

The laundry. I'd forgotten the laundry.

I opened the elevator and pushed the stroller inside, tipping it onto two wheels to make room for us all. Vanja pressed the button for the sixth floor. Heidi, who had also wanted to press the button, started crying. Vanja mimicked her, Heidi lashed out. Vanja hit her back, so by the time I opened the door of the apartment I had two screaming kids on my hands, both howling for their mother. But as soon as Geir and Njaal came out of the living room they fell silent. The children stood and took stock of each other for a few seconds, the same way dogs do – what kind of children are you, they seemed to be thinking – before accepting the new situation and sliding off into their room, apart from John, who had plonked himself down on the floor in his blue hat and was trying to take his shoes off.

"Sausages for dinner," I said.

"Great!" said Geir.

I went past him into the kitchen, where I put the shopping down on the table and started putting it away.

"I forgot the laundry downstairs," I said. "Can you get the sausages going while I go down and get it?"

"I'm good at sausages," he said. "We ran a sausage business once in Uppsala, did I ever tell you? The Svea Sausage Company. Two bikes with a frying pan and a grill mounted on the front. We went all over town. They were painted the colors of ketchup and mustard, red and yellow. And there was a big metal sausage on the back. It's the only decent job I've ever had, now that I think about it."

"Here are the sausages, then," I said. "There's a pan in the cupboard over there."

"Ossie-Pete," did I ever mention him? He gave free sausages to any girl who showed him her tits. Lots did."

He laughed.

"I think that was probably the first thing you told me when I arrived in Stockholm," I said.

"Good times. We used to sit there drinking until the bars closed and all the students came out, about one in the morning, then we'd light the paraffin lamp and start selling. Huge lines there'd be. It was all about grabbing the best spots before anyone else got there on Saturday nights. Like the square outside the Celsius House, you know, the guy with all the degrees. It's at an angle to the street, because Uppsala burned down and nearly the whole town had to be rebuilt, but Celsius's house wasn't touched. I studied aesthetics there. It's where I met Christina. She was taking photos of our sausage bikes. I'll have to show you some time. Delicious sausages, they were."

"You never told me how much money you made out of that," I said on my way into the hall.

"Oh, you know, up and down, it depended," he said from behind. "I can't remember exactly. No, hang on a minute, there was a first of May when we made twenty thousand kronor. We're talking back in the early nineties here. Twenty-four hours nonstop grilling sausages. We were so exhausted we couldn't be bothered dividing all the takings up properly, it was like here's a pile for you and here's a pile for me."

"That's a lot of money," I said, stopping in front of John, who was still in a struggle with his shoes on the floor.

"The most I earned at one go was at a Danish longball tournament for political economists. They wanted a sausage stand. None of them actually bought any sausages, but they'd guaranteed me a minimum, two thousand an hour. And, of course, I still had all the sausages left to sell afterward. I tell you, though, we were the bottom of the barrel. I mean, this was Uppsala, with all its academic traditions, all the stiff-necked snobbery. A sausage vendor wasn't exactly well respected."

"Do you want to come down into the basement with me, John?"

He nodded.

I put the shoe back on him that he'd managed to take off, then stepped into my own, while Geir stood leaning against the wall reminiscing about his sausage days.

"We put the boiled sausages in the freezer, then heated them up again. Sometimes we could only sell them after it got dark, they were almost green. The students never knew whether they were puking from the alcohol or the sausages. Do you remember Cuba Cola?"

"I do, yes," I said, my hand on the door handle.

"We used to have that. Everyone used to comment on it, I haven't seen it since the seventies, but we hardly sold a bottle. Then we tried Pommac for a while. But who drinks Pommac with hot dogs? It was a disaster, of course. French mustard, we had that. No one wanted it. Too sophisticated, I suppose. Do you know the Swedish slang for a hot dog?"

"No, tell me," I said, pressing down on the handle and opening the door.

"Raggarballe med svängdörr. Dick in a swingdoor. Ha ha ha. You wouldn't believe it, would you? Arf, arf."

"If we're not back in half an hour it'll mean someone's done us in for breaking the laundry-room rules," I said.

"We had our own little sausage logo on the front of the bikes as well," he said. "Made of metal too."

"Anyone would think you hadn't seen another human being in years, the way you're going on," I said.

"Someone has to say something," he said. "Seeing as you're not, I mean. Can't you take your phone with you?"

I closed the door behind me, lifted John up, and rode the elevator down with him sitting on my arm. As soon as we reached the basement he bombed off along the passage on his little legs. In the laundry room itself he immediately started playing with the sweeping brushes. Someone had put our clean clothes nicely in the bags for us. Although this was a kind gesture, with no hint of annoyance in the form of a note about sticking to our times or reporting the matter to the caretaker, I still hurried back out again in case I ran into whoever was responsible, John in one hand, the two IKEA bags in the other. There had been feces on the sofa, I remembered all of a sudden, perhaps prompted by the two beer crates and the carrier bag that someone had left up against the wall, which we passed again on our way back through the basement. And there had been empties all the way up the staircase to the upper floor. The place had been littered with them. Plastic bags full of empty bottles under the piano. But maybe not on the staircase from the ground floor to the first floor? I couldn't remember. Yet Gunnar seemed certain. He said he had proof, if it came to a court case.

What was I going to do if it went to court?

Oh, hell! Hell, hell, hell.

I lifted John up so he could press the button for the elevator, then put him down, only for him to reach out for me again, his arms in the air, perhaps because he wanted to see the elevator arrive, the light of its interior appearing in the rectangular window of the door. I lifted him up again. My body was weak with dread. He was so angry with me. He was so terribly angry with me.

"There!" said John.

And, sure enough, a light descended!

I opened the door, holding John up so he could press the top button, then putting him down again and studying my reflection in the mirror.

There wasn't a trace of my inner turmoil to be seen. Just a serious-looking face with sad eyes, that was all.

John crouched and examined a little strip of red plastic on the floor that had caught his attention. It looked like one of those plastic binder things.

After some trouble he managed to pick it up between his little fingers.

"Look, Daddy!" he said, holding it up.

"Oh yes, that's good," I said.

Inside I was trembling, and nothing outside could help, it was as if everything was trembling there too.

The elevator stopped, I opened the door, John toddled out with his head down, absorbed in his bit of plastic. I cast one last glance at the mirror, stepped the few paces across the landing to the door of the apartment, which John was already trying to open, though without succes, and with ill-concealed annoyance prized his hands from the handle and opened the door.

Inside, the children were watching TV while Geir stood at the stove stirring the contents of the big saucepan he'd found, from which a thin, almost invisible veil of steam rose.

"How's it going?" I asked.

"Fine," he said. "I put the TV on. Is that all right with you?"

"Yes," I said. "I'm not a fan though."

"You might not be, but the kids love it."

I was sticky with sweat, not because I'd exerted myself in any way, but because the air was so humid. Through the window I noticed the sky to the east had gone cloudy and was now gray-white rather than the clear blue of only an hour before.

"If it were up to them, they'd watch TV from the minute they got up till they went to bed," I said. "That's why we've got rules."

"Are we going to debate morals now? I'm not sure sausage is all that good for them either, but it tastes great and they like it."

"There's more than 70 percent meat in those sausages," I said with a smile. "Morally, they're beyond reproach. And now I'm going to have a smoke. Do you want to come with me?"

He nodded and followed.

"Actually, I have one principle when it comes to what Njaal watches," he said from behind. "I try to slip something useful in every now and then, something educational. It's not easy, though. All he wants is entertainment. It's like pornography."

I sat down, held up the thermos, and caught his eye, raising my eyebrows in inquiry. He shook his head, then leaned back against the railing. I poured myself a cup and lit a cigarette.

Here and there the gray-white cover of cloud slashed open, and gashes of dark drifted across the sky.

"Looks like there's a storm on its way," I said with a nod in its general direction.

"Is there?" he said, turning to see, then looking back at me. "But you play with your kids, don't you? You might not like it all the time, but you do play with them. I do nothing. I rely more on warmth and humor."

"So I'm cold and humorless when I play with them, is that it?"

He laughed.

"I don't play with them much at all, to be honest," I said. "I spend a lot of time with them, but I never exactly get down on the floor with the Lego or the farm animals."

"Don't give me that. You take them to the swimming pools on weekends. You take them to the park. You play football with them."

"Sometimes, yes. But that's not playing, is it?"

"True, if you want to be nitpicky, that's up to you. But what I mean is you spend a lot more time and energy on your kids than I do on mine. That's not to say Njaal doesn't give me any joy. I believe the Chinese. They say a man doesn't realize he's a dad until his child's five years old. There's a lot of truth in that, if you ask me."

"You won't be a dad before next autumn, then."

"Exactly."

"You've only got one child, though. That makes it different. Once you've got three, you no longer have any choice in the matter."

"I do tell Njaal I love him. In those words."

"I can't say the same. I don't think I've ever said that. There's a limit."

"Draw not nigh hither. Ha ha ha!"

"Tread not upon the grass, my boy. Skjæraasen, wasn't it?"

"Leave tender shoots to sprout! No, I can't remember. But I think it has to do with the way we are, not just the roles we choose. Some people love to play. My dad's got a way with children, they love him. The neighbor's little boy still invites him to his birthday every year. He's knocking on eighty now. The same outlook on life as Goethe. 'For nothing brings us closer to madness than distinguishing ourselves from others, and nothing maintains common sense more than living in a normal way with many people.' Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship."

"Only someone on the outside, who doesn't live in a normal way, could say something like that."

"That's the big difference between you and me, I think. Nearly everyone I know has a father who failed them in some way. And everyone tries to compensate for that failure in the way they relate to their own children."

"It keeps the world going round, doesn't it?"

"Even if you succeed, like my dad did – and I'd say he was an ideal father – the ideal doesn't necessarily get passed down. What happens then is that the sons haven't got anything to make up for. So you're a better dad than your own father, while I'll be a worse one than mine, and when it gets to Njaal's turn he'll be compensating for that in the way he relates to his own kids, who for their part are going to be just as hopeless as me, their granddad. The ideal doesn't get inherited, that's the point."

"A kind of dialectics of hopelessness, is that it?"

"Exactly. Having a decent dad doesn't help in the slightest."

"Of course it does. It's a good thing in itself. Having a stable and harmonious life, I mean."

"But what do we get out of a harmonious childhood? I know loads of people whose childhood was fantastic, but where did it get them? What have they done?"

"But that's like an industrial viewpoint on life. As if it's got to have a product. If that's the idea, then you're right. Nothing comes of a harmonious childhood. But what if it's the harmony itself that's the point? What if the meaning of everything is just a well-balanced life?"

"Oh, come on, you don't really mean that! I'm much more in line with Ayn Rand, who writes that only a few individuals, a very small number of us, keep the world going. They're the ones who make something of life, who achieve something in the world rather than just using or enjoying it."

"But even in those people there's a sense of restlessness. That's why they create or act the way they do, because there's a restlessness inside them, something incomplete. But what they're aiming for, all the time, is harmony. All through their twenties and thirties and forties. The aim is to be able to sit in a garden and watch the sprinkler watering the lawn, with their children all around them, and to be able to think, right, that's it, I'm happy now. All human urges are about the urge for harmony."

"Listen, Aristotle, didn't you just write that you weren't interested in happiness?"

"Yes, but not that I'm not interested in harmony."

"Same difference. But you're right in what you say about restlessness and feeling incomplete, that it's the strongest force of all. What's happened in our time is that restlessness is no longer translated into action. Restlessness doesn't produce anymore. We live in the age of therapy. Restlessness isn't wanted, we try to remove it by talking about it. We've got one Vision Zero after another, trying to live immaculate lives in immaculately happy families, and our explicit aim in life is to eliminate road traffic deaths. But it's a chimera, a great big lie. It's ridiculous that we even believe it. But we do. Harmony, happiness, and no more deaths in traffic. Give me a useless dad who doesn't give a shit! Give me a godforsaken awful childhood! Because something comes of that. Something gets created there. In the disharmony and the dissonance."

"I can agree to that in theory, but not in practice. I look at my kids and the only thing I want is for them to be happy. To have as good a life as possible."

"Well, all I can say is I hope you fail!"

"Actually, it's something I think about a lot. What kind of impressions they'll be left with from their childhoods when they get older. What all this is to them. I've no idea myself. And what they'll have from me. No idea."

They're very different as well, in character, I mean. What you give to Vanja and Heidi might be exactly the same, but you can bet your life their experiences of it are going to be different, and they'll understand it all differently too, in later life."

"Yeah, I suppose so."

"The truth is we don't know what we're doing. We don't know where it's going to lead. It's a known fact that children of divorce are overrepresented in the crime figures, and the younger they were when the parents divorced, the greater the risk of them getting into trouble. But we won't give up the right to divorce, so instead we say it's best for the kids. In any system it's impossible to foresee all the effects. To get back to the automobile: if anyone had said the invention of the automobile was going to kill thousands of people every year, would we have put it into production and centered our lives around it the way we have? No. So we don't talk about that, we say the automobile brings us freedom and opportunity instead. And when capitalism increased its hold and we needed more labor, did anyone say women have got to leave the home now and start producing goods, so we can double the labor force? Not to mention double the number of consumers? No, they didn't. That was women wanting the same rights as men. The right to work, what kind of a right is that? How's that supposed to be liberating? It's just the opposite, a prison. The consequence of that is that our kids are farmed out to an institution from the age of two, and what happens then? Mom and Dad are almost driven insane, aren't they? They're riddled with guilt, so they spend all the time they can on their kids when they're not at work, trying to be as close to them as possible. Compensation, compensation, compensation."

"The road from sociology to paranoia is shorter than one might think," I said.

"What, don't you agree?"

"Actually, yes. Especially the part about the chimera, as you called it. If you read Marx, Das Kapital, much of it's about exploitation of the workers. They slogged away for sixteen hours a day under the most degrading conditions. So one of the most important goals of the workers' movement was to limit the amount of work. Work was seen as something the employers – the capitalists, if you like – forced on the workers. It was slavelike. Nowadays, though, people work themselves into the ground of their own accord. Why?

Because the idea has arisen that they realize themselves through their jobs. So work has become the opposite of alienating. Now it's self-realization. Everyone works like mad now, because it's good for them. The same with consumption. We find our identities in the purchase of goods that are mass-produced. You'd think it was a joke. But the worst thing is you're not allowed to say that, it means you're paranoid. And what's more, that criticism has turned into a cliché, it's become invalid by virtue of being repeated too many times. I remember when I was a student and read all that criticism and was totally in agreement with it at the same time as I was living my life in exactly the same way as what I was criticizing. It didn't even occur to me then. And even if it had, I wouldn't have done anything about it. The two spheres are separate. What you know, and what you do. They never join up. They're like east and west. Or, at best, like the tie and the vest."

"You couldn't stop yourself there, could you?"

"No, but the point is it's no longer possible to live in any other way. There are no alternatives. It's seeped into everything."

"Do you remember what you said once about Nazism being like amateur night? Well, it's true. We, on the other hand, lead professional lives. And how can we not? I can't ignore thinking about safety when it comes to Njaal, for instance. I can't let him ride his bike without wearing a helmet, or run around at will in the neighborhood, even though it's what I did when I was a kid."

"Why, because you'd feel guilty if he fell and hit his head?"

"No, it's not as simple as that. Once the thought's there, that they have to wear a helmet and you've got to go with them everywhere they go, it's no use trying to escape it anymore. It becomes my thought too. We can't do anything other than wish the best for our children. Now, this is what happens to be best. But what governs that is the thought of what's best. Because whether it really is best is something we've no way of knowing. When Njaal started nursery school, I wanted him to go to the nearest one, because that was the most practical, but Christina went all over, checking out all these different nurseries, because she wanted the best. But how could she know what was best for Njaal? Who knows what's going to happen in a place, who he's going to meet and what it's going to mean to him? We can't control life, only our thoughts about life. So everything that has to do with our kids is actually all about us. It's the tyranny of good intent. All we can do is try for the best, it's impossible to imagine any other way, but the consequences are beyond our control."

"We're starting to get old, that's what it is," I said.

"We are. How old was Voltaire when he wrote that all you need in life is a garden and a library? Certainly not twenty, that's for sure."

"Wasn't it Cicero who said that?"

"Was it?"

I shrugged.

"Anyway," I said. "I got a letter about six months ago with that quote in it. Only I read it wrong. I saw hagle instead of hage: 'He who has a shotgun and a library wants for nothing,' I thought it said."

"Ha ha ha! A lot more credible too, if you ask me."

"Completely in your spirit."

"Yeah, but why do you think men went to war? Why do you think men would put everything, even their own children, aside in order to fight and kill? The answer, of course, is love. The love they felt was no less than the love women felt, just different. Now we connect intimacy and closeness with the truest of feelings. I've lost count of how many times I've read people ridiculing men's ways of dealing with emotions. Slapping each other on the back, that sort of thing. But a woman doesn't know what it means to get a slap on the back when you're down in the dumps. Men's emotions are worth no less, if anyone believes that, just because they're not expressed the way women's are. What I'm saying is there are many different kinds of solicitude, and intimacy isn't necessarily going to be right in itself. There's no monopoly on feelings or caring. What happens if you're all over your kids all the time, what does that get you? Nothing."

"Harmony."

"Nowhere near. I've yet to meet anyone less harmonious than you when you weren't writing and all you had was your family. And when all these men start making amends for their own childhoods, they overcompensate, and in overcompensating they create the opposite problem. We go to the opposite extreme, wrapping them up in cotton wool and giving them whatever they want, in that way making sure they're not going to feel any sense of gratitude or meaning, all they get out of it is an extreme childhood, only in a different way. So compensation doesn't get you harmony or equilibrium. That said, however, I do know I'm a shitty dad. I had to face that when Njaal came along. It wasn't nice. All the bad sides of me suddenly became significant. I try to be good for him, but most likely that's not good enough. When he grows up he'll be able to judge me for it. That's his prerogative. But I can never judge him. Never. That's a right I don't have. And that's where your uncle is wrong. He can't take your father's side and judge you. He hasn't the right. No human being has. The children can judge the parents, but never the other way round."

"Did you have to bring that up?"

"What?"

"Gunnar. I'd just managed not to think about it for five minutes."

"It's not worth worrying about."

"Of course it is," I said.

Next to us the door opened and Heidi put her head out.

"When's Mommy coming home?" she wanted to know.

"Tomorrow," I said.

"I want Mommy," she said.

"I know," I said. "Do you want to speak to her on the phone?"

She nodded. I stubbed out my cigarette and got up, went inside with Heidi following on my heels, picked up the phone, and pressed Linda's number.

"Hi, it's Karl Ove," I said when she answered. "The children are missing you. Want to say hello?"

"Yes, of course," she said.

"Here's Heidi, then," I said, and handed her the phone.

"When are you coming home, Mommy?" she said.

I went into the living room.

"Do you want to speak to Mommy on the phone, Vanja?" I said.

She nodded and got to her feet.

"Me too," said John.

"Not just yet," I said. "Heidi's talking to her now, it's your turn when she's finished."

Vanja sat down again and stared at the television. I recognized aloofness in her body language and could tell she was holding back her feelings, it always happened sooner or later whenever I was on my own with them, but meant nothing other than that she was missing Linda. If Linda had walked in through the door now she would have run toward her and hugged her and told her about all the things she'd done while she'd been away, and not moved an inch from her side the rest of the evening. She accepted the distance I kept as a necessity, not consciously of course, but still for her there was always an element of enduring when we were on our own together, of holding out, the opposite of letting go and living.

I went back out to Heidi again, she was looking at herself in the mirror while listening to what Linda was saying at the other end.

"Can you say hej då to Mommy now," I said, "so Vanja and John can talk to her too?"

"Hej då!" she said, and handed me the phone.

"Are you ready for the other two?" I said.

"Yes, put them on."

I stood in the doorway.

"Vanja?" I said. "Do you want to speak to Mommy now?"

Vanja shook her head.

"She doesn't want to," I said. "But here's John for you."

John took the phone and pressed it to his ear. His entire little self lit up in a smile as soon as he heard her voice.

"Yes," he said with a nod. "Yes."

"Bit of a disaster with the sausages, I'm afraid," Geir called out from the kitchen.

I went to see what was the matter.

"They've split. There are two things that matter when it comes to heating up sausages. One is to to put a laurel leaf in with them. The other is they're not supposed to boil."

"You're trying to teach your grandmother to suck eggs," I said, and peered into the pan. The pink meat peeped out from the red skins of all the sausages.

"I'd never be so presumptuous."

"It doesn't matter," I said. "They still taste the same."

I took five hot-dog buns from the packet, put a sausage in each, placed them all on a dish, squirted ketchup on, and took it all into the living room.

The phone was dumped on the sofa. I picked it up.

"Hello?" I said, but it was dead and I dropped it back in the charger under the mirror in the hall. When I came back into the living room they'd each taken a hot dog.

"There's more if you want," I said. "Just say the word. We'll be in the kitchen."

I went in and got the mustard out, a coarse local variety from Skåne I'd been putting on everything for a while, fished out a red sausage with its split skin, put it in the bun, and sat down at the table, where Geir was already demolishing a hot dog.

"They're good, the Danish ones," he said.

"Mm," I said. "You should taste the mustard, it's good too."

"I'll have some on the next one. It reminds me, do you remember that advertising campaign a while back for Gilde sausages?"

"No."

"You must. Gilde sausages have a slight curve to them. They made this slogan about them putting a smile on your face. Some feminists reacted, claimed it was sexist. They even confronted Gilde's managing director about it. But he had no idea what they were talking about. They're sausages! he said. Ha ha ha!"

The sky was completely dark in the east now, and where it was lighter, above the outskirts of the city, it was streaked by what had to be rain. I felt a headache coming on.

"It was good, what you said about Marx," Geir said after a while. "The way we work just as much, only now it's because we're realizing ourselves. The fact is, people made fortunes from other people's work then, and people make fortunes from other people's work now. There's no difference, it's all the same, apart from the way we look at it."

"Mm," I said. "I think it has to do with having to learn to live with something. It's an adequate response to a real issue. As long as we can't stop working, we have to change our reasons for doing it. The motivation, I mean."

"It's funny," said Geir, and got to his feet. "A job was a job to my dad, something that had value on its own. The job in itself was what it was all about. He went to work because he had to. Did his best and kept his head down at the same time. The idea of him realizing himself would have been completely alien, I'm sure."

He lifted a sausage out of the saucepan, placed it in a hot-dog bun, and sat down again. I shoved the jar of mustard across the table toward him.

"But your argument about us doing everything in order to compensate isn't right," I said. "Normally, we've always reproduced the pattern, repeated what we ourselves experienced as children. My dad's dad used to hit him, so Dad hit us. Not often, only occasionally, but the fact that it existed as a possibility meant it was something he could resort to every now and then. He never made any effort to compensate for anything at all. It wasn't a part of the role. You were brought up in a certain way, and that's what you did with your own children. We're the ones trying to compensate all of a sudden. Do you remember what I said about Rudbeck that time? From his biography? His father hit him and humiliated him, but he didn't internalize that, never saw it as part of his psychological makeup, but as something objective, an action belonging entirely to the external world. That was in the seventeenth century."

"I remember. It was my university lecturer who wrote that book."

"So the question is, on the one hand why we give such weight to the traumatic, or construe things as traumatic at all, and on the other, why we bring up our own children differently, in a new way."

"You think that's something we choose, then?"

"No, just the opposite. Things have changed, beyond doubt. And all of us are a part of that change. I think it's a response to something. I think the very fact our kids are in nurseries from the age of one, and that we surround ourselves with all sorts of crap that just alienates us, TV, computer games, all that kind of stuff, on its own means we just have to get close to our children. Kids used to be at home all day, a place they felt was theirs, and there were grown-ups around, maybe not close in that sense, but they were there. When that place no longer exists there has to be some compensation. That has to be compensated for. No one planned it that way or probably even thought about it. It just gets like that, and becomes an imperative. That's what I think, anyway."

John came into the kitchen and stared at Geir.

"Do you want another sausage?" I asked.

He shook his head.

"Korv," he said.

"Ah, a korv," I said, and smiled. "Yes, you can have a hot dog, of course you can."

I made him another, taking the mild mustard from the fridge and squirting a long ochre-colored dribble along the length of the sausage before handing it to him. He started munching at the same time as he turned and went back in.

"There's no alternative either," I said. "The only alternative to capitalism in our time has been Nazism. The Nazis attempted to change society from the bottom up and start something radically different. And we know how that turned out."

"It's a shame the Germans lost the war, but a good thing the Nazis didn't win it, as I usually say," Geir said. He had a red streak of ketchup across his cheek.

"Daddy?" Heidi called out from the living room.

"Yes?" I called back.

"I want another hot dog!"

"Come and get one then!"

"No, you have to come!"

"No!"

"What?"

"No!"

Silence.

"And what does all this thinking about safety actually do?" said Geir. "What happens when we're in this state of high alert as to what can go wrong and what we can do about it? All it does is increase anxiety and heighten our fears. We used to walk to school. None of us got killed. Now they're all taken in cars. None of them gets killed either."

"Daddy!" Heidi called out.

"Yes?" I called back.

"Come here!"

"No, you come here!"

"OK," I heard her say, and I got up to fix another hot dog. It was ready for her when she came in.

"Do you want a glass of water too?"

She nodded.

"Does Njaal want another hot dog, do you think?"

She gave a shrug and went off again. I filled four glasses with water from the tap and took them in, handing one to each.

"Do you want another hot dog, Njaal?" I said.

He nodded without taking his eyes off the TV.

"How about you, Vanja?"

She shook her head.

"When's Mommy coming home?" Heidi asked.

"Tomorrow," I said. "Do you miss her?"

Heidi nodded. Vanja stared. John looked up at me and smiled.

"Mamma!" he said.

How I ever could have produced such a happy little boy was a mystery.

"Want a beer?" Geir said when I returned to the kitchen.

"Yeah, why not?"

"So we structure the social space," he said, opening the fridge. I sat down, and he handed me a beer. "We redesign the physical environment. We're on high alert as to everything. We know who designed the fork we use to eat with. We eliminate every peril and take precautions against everything. Spontaneity goes out the door. Why do we want to get rid of our spontaneity? Where does that get us? Spontaneity can't be predicted, it can't be repeated, and repetition is the key to all control. That's where we are."

"In a way the circle's complete," I said.

"How do you mean?"

"The Neanderthals," I said.

"Ah, your favorite subject. And what insight have you gleaned from their sad life today, I wonder?"

"Do you think they were spontaneous?"

"If you put it like that, the answer's probably no."

"In the two hundred thousand years they lived in Europe they didn't develop in any way whatsoever. They were still doing exactly the same things, in exactly the same way, when they disappeared as when they came. They even inhabited the exact same places. There was a tribe in France that lived in the same cave for forty thousand years. They only moved on when it started to collapse. Imagine one and the same family living on the same farm for forty thousand years. It's completely unthinkable. But not to them. They were making the same tools, hunting by the same methods, eating the same food. Nothing about them changed. Fascinating, don't you think? The fact that our closest relatives were incapable of change. The fact that progress was a completely unknown concept to them. No improvisation, no spontaneity, it just didn't exist. The first humans were an inconceivable revolution when they turned up. What set us apart from the Neanderthals was exactly what we're now trying to get rid of."

"Is this where you say it's not that long since the first humans arrived?"

"Yes, but it really isn't that long! And at that time there were many different kinds of humans living side by side. It's got to happen again. Think, say, three hundred thousand years in the future. By then there should be other kinds of humans here too. Maybe even in sixty thousand years."

"Well, give them my best."

"Ha ha. But you know how many Neanderthals there actually were, don't you?"

"No, tell me."

"At most around twenty thousand. Perhaps as few as ten thousand. Somewhere in between. And that was the lot! So imagine what Europe looked like then. Completely devoid of humans, only animals and birds, and forests and plains, and these fifteen thousand inflexible Neanderthals dotted about a few caves around the continent. That's it."

"Your utopia."

"Not far off. But do you know what the biggest difference was between the first humans and the Neanderthals?"

"No hot dogs?"

"The humans had jewelry. They wore the teeth of the dead around their necks. Meaning they were thinking in symbols. There's something more than this. And to the Neanderthals that was a completely impossible thought."

"I wonder what the idea was," said Geir. "The teeth around their necks."

"What it says is there's something more."

"Yeah, that's what makes me wonder. Teeth are just teeth. The way the Neanderthals existed in the world seems more reasonable to me."

"There's a decent chance we've still got Neanderthal genes in our DNA somewhere. Not in Africans, because there weren't any humans when the Neanderthals left Africa. But in Europeans, certainly. I don't think the Neanderthals died out. I think they mixed with humans and merged into them."

"You do, huh?"

"Yes, why not? It's not unlikely, is it? And so far the Neanderthals were here longer than us. They didn't know that, of course."

"I don't suppose they did."

"So we've gone from a world without mystery to one that's full of mysteries, then back to one without again."

"It's amazing the state actually gives money to people like you to sit around and ruminate, and write books about what you've been ruminating on."

"There was a small subspecies of humans on an island called Flores in Indonesia. They lived in a cave there. By all accounts no more than fifty to a hundred individuals. They were only about a meter tall."

"Midgets?"

"No, a completely distinct species of human. They lived there well after humans came along. The people who live there now tell strange stories about small people coming and stealing their vegetables. I've actually heard one of those stories. This man said the women slung their breasts over their shoulders when they ran. Where the hell would a detail like that come from? The way he described them they were like little trolls of some kind, creatures of mythology. Goblins, or something. But then they found the skeletons in the cave. Tiny little people."

"Where do you get all this?"

"Late-night TV documentaries. I watch them a lot. I've no idea how much is true and how much is nonsense. But it fascinates me all the same."

"Obviously."

"It's got to do with the utopian as well, I think. Things actually were different once. Not just the environment, but being human itself was different too. I want alternatives, that's all. Anything would do, really."

"So you'd like to be a Neanderthal, is that what you're saying?"

"No! But the fact that history is over, that there's no future anymore other than the repetition of what we've got now, makes me feel insanely claustrophobic. I don't necessarily have to do anything different, or be anything different, that's not what I mean, but I do want the possibility of a completely different life to exist."

"We live in the age of Vision Zero. It means we have zero visions."

"That was neat."

"I know."

I stood up and went into the living room. Geir came after me. Bolibompa was finished, they were watching something for older kids now. I switched it off and glanced at Geir.

"Should we get them bathed and off to bed?"

"Why not."

"Who's for a bath?" I said.

"Come on, Njaal," said Vanja, slipping down off the sofa. Njaal followed her, then Heidi too. I picked John up and carried him to the bathroom after the others. I put him down on the floor, got the detergent from on top of the cupboard and sprinkled the white Ajax powder into the bottom of the bath, got the scouring pad from under the sink, moistened it, and began scrubbing the enamel. As it dissolved in the water, the white powder not only became liquid, it turned yellow too. I was fond of yellow. Yellow on white, yellow on green, yellow on blue. I liked lemons, their shape as well as their color, and I liked the great fields of rape that spread their intense yellow out across the Skåne landscape in the spring and summer, beneath the tall blue sky, amid the green. And I liked the white Ajax powder that turned yellow when it dissolved in water.

As I scrubbed, the children undressed, and I sensed how the room behind me was all arms in the air and little bodies bent double. I turned the shower on and rinsed away the detergent and the hairs that were left behind from the last time they were in the bath, put the plug in, flicked the diverter valve, and stuck a finger into the thick spout of water that came plunging like a little waterfall from the tap.

"In you go!" I said.

Vanja and Heidi climbed in, Njaal was a bit uncertain and looked up at his father, who had been standing silently the whole time watching them, while John put his arms in the air in front of me. I pulled off his T-shirt, his shorts and his socks, and once I'd got his diaper off and dropped it into the bin under the sink I lifted him up and into the bath, his legs dangling like a little monkey's.

"In you go, then, Njaal," said Geir.

"You can sit here!" said Vanja, indicating the space between herself and Heidi.

Njaal hesitated. But after a moment he gripped the side of the bath, lifting first one leg then the other over the edge and into the water. His limbs were as delicate as his features, his brown eyes and fair hair, the slight blush of his skin. He was a sensitive boy, his eyes were attentive, but he was full of energy as well, and the two sides of him seemed to collide. There was a lot of Christina in him, not quite as much of Geir, at least not in any way that was immediately apparent.

Geir had turned away from a lot of stuff, but that wasn't to say it wasn't still there inside him, only that it was concealed. Now and then I wondered if it was concealed from him as well, and in what way it then existed. Geir's mother had always tried to keep him as close as possible, making him feel guilty when he wasn't there, a possessive, dominating woman. She had been ridden with anxiety, as far as I could gather, and it seemed to me that freeing himself from her had required quite a vast effort. He had scant respect for feelings and the emotional, he hated anything that wasn't rational, everything that said one thing and meant another, he was rational almost to the very extreme, and since he was always on his guard, always examining the reasons behind any emotion, he was a total cynic. He didn't care what other people made of him. More than one of his friends had broken off contact with him for not making any bones about what he thought. On one occasion I'd come close to doing the same. Somehow or other I'd managed to offend him without realizing, and the next time we spoke he launched into me, going straight for my weakest point, the children, in this case Vanja. At first I didn't realize what was happening, he was laughing and joking about her sensitivity and the problems she was going to have later in life with me and Linda being her parents. He was specific and very pointed about it, but I didn't understand what was going on, not even after we'd hung up, apart from finding myself thinking that I didn't want to talk to him anymore. A few minutes later he called back to apologize. He said he'd been offended and that he hadn't meant what he said. I accepted his apology but still didn't call him for a few days because what he said had been so cruel. He must have considered it and meant what he said in order to say it, I thought to myself, regardless of how irrational his behavior had been. But it all blew over, we stayed friends, and I'd learned something. The odd thing was that he'd said exactly that during the first few days after we met each other in Stockholm. If you offend me, you'll never know about it, he said. He was proud and self-respecting, it might even have been his foremost characteristic. And true enough, I'd offended him without realizing, or rather I knew, but had no idea how. Then, toward the end of my first year in Stockholm, he simply left one day. Christina called a few days later to say he'd gone to Turkey. It was only half true, the fact was he'd gone on from there to Iraq, so I discovered by chance a few weeks after.

Geir in Iraq?

A human shield?

Without a word to me?

It didn't stop me exploiting the fact to make myself interesting in social gatherings. The imminent invasion of Iraq was a matter everyone was talking about, and now I could say I actually knew someone who was in Baghdad at that very moment, and not only that, he was there to be a human shield.

A little more than three months later, he called me. He was in Stockholm, did I want to meet up? He was buzzing with vigor when we met at a restaurant in Gamle Stan, beamingly happy, a completely different person from the disillusioned man who, sunk into despair, had left the city a few short months earlier. It felt like he'd been off in outer space and gained a completely different perspective on life as it was led on Earth; what had tormented him earlier, tormented him no more. From the war he had brought back endless amounts of data, raw material he would spend the next six years working from, and which now, as we stood here in the bathroom of a Malmö apartment this evening in August 2009, had become a finished documentary book. Not one day had he taken off from that work, as far as I knew. Every weekend, every holiday, he had worked. When I began writing my autobiographical novel, our lives had become almost parodically similar, everything was suddenly about what we were doing in our little rooms, practically cut off from the rest of the world apart from our families. I read what he wrote, he listened to me reading out loud what I wrote, but the relationship was not symmetrical, for whereas I had lived my life with the flock, reading the same books as everyone else, thinking the same thoughts, he had headed off on his own even at the age of twenty, and the knowledge he had thus acquired independently was what I drew on, to such an extent that what I was writing now would have been unthinkable without him. Even though it was an autobiographical novel I was writing. It was uncomfortable in that I had turned out to be so weak and amenable to influence, and the fact that I had been compelled to borrow from him in order to become stronger and better effectively undermined my sense of self even more. At the same time I didn't feel inferior to him when we were together or spoke on the phone, if that had been the case we couldn't ever have been friends. It was actually the exact reverse, it was the very fact that I didn't need to adjust myself according to him, didn't need to take into consideration what he might believe or think about what I said, that was the important thing. I felt ashamed with everyone I met, and by that I mean pretty much everyone, there was always something there that made me feel I wasn't good enough, something I couldn't live up to, or some mark I overstepped, if only in thought. The fact that I'd started to write about this, the way I actually saw myself, was madness, sheer madness, since it meant exposing myself to the only thing I was really afraid of: the disapproval of others. Without our regular phone calls I would never have managed, during them I built up a kind of defense, and my transgressions seemed almost to lose their force accordingly. So yes, his influence being as great as it was gave me freedom and independence, which were strangely and despairingly closely bound up with the opposite, constraint and dependence.

But what is influence exactly? Parents showing the world to their child and explaining how it is ordered? An Iago whispering in Othello's ear? And when does influence go from good to bad? Or, put differently, what is independence?

The most shameful thing that can happen to a writer is to be caught plagiarizing the work of another writer. The second most shameful thing is for one's work to imitate that of another writer. Being unoriginal is not shameful in quite the same way, but it is equally degrading – to call a novel unoriginal is one of the worst things a reviewer can say about it. That it is shameful for one's work to imitate that of another writer, and not shameful, merely degrading, to write something that is deemed unoriginal, is a crucial distinction that speaks volumes of the importance we attach in our day and age to the cult of personality, how imperative it is that something may be traced back to a single, wholly independent individual, who in many respects is considered sacrosanct insofar as the distinctive characteristics he or she has developed are not permitted to occur anywhere else. The important thing is not what such a voice says, but that it says so in a way that is peculiar to itself.

The reader, however, is unconstrained by such insistence on independence or individuality, on the contrary, literature's entire system is based on the reader submitting to the work and vanishing within it. Admiration of, and submission to, the individual was by no means a dominant characteristic of our culture prior to the Romantic era and may be understood only as a result of a fundamental shift within the social world whereby the I took on a whole new aspect compared to just a few generations earlier. Yet the Romantic I, swelling above its banks, whose foremost feature is to be unique, is no unambiguous marker of this alteration of the I, for the very reason that it presupposed that every other I, which is to say the readers, or, as our own language would have it, the consumers, subordinated themselves and accepted their status as nonunique. The Romantic or political genius, Goethe or Napoleon, functioned in much the same way as kings always have, representing sovereign power, excess, pleasure and pomp, living their life on everyone's behalf, and the celebrities of our time are one extension of that. This is a mechanism of social security in that we are brought up to believe we are unique and genuinely assert our own selves whenever we utter or do something, whereas in actual fact we are as good as identical, and in order not to be crushed by that truth, which naturally would pulverize any conception of who we might be, we elevate to a superior level all those individuals who in some way stand out and excel, who go beyond what is normal, whether by running exceptionally fast, jumping exceptionally far, writing exceptionally well, singing exceptionally beautifully, or simply possessing exceptionally good looks.

Should we wish to remove someone from such a pinnacle and return them to earth, the most effective regulatory mechanism is parody: he is not unique, someone else exists who talks like him, looks like him, behaves like him. And we laugh. Should we not only wish to remove someone from such heights, but furthermore destroy him or her, we need only to demonstrate that whatever he or she has done or said is a copy of something someone else has done or said. Identity is thus a kind of taboo because it is found all around us, though cannot obviously be named, since it refers to something else that is greater and more dangerous. In a number of primitive cultures shared identity was indeed taboo, as is shown by prohibitions on imitating another person's gestures or voice, and through the ritual killing of twins. The frequent occurrence of the doppelgänger motif in literature during the second half of the nineteenth century, and the great horror that was attached to it, is an expression of the same thing, though almost with renewed intensity, as if the threat of the identical had come closer with the advent of the urban masses of the cities. In the century that followed this was the one great issue, the relationship between the one and the all, between authenticity and identity. It is impossible to comprehend World War I without this background, or indeed World War II, which was a direct repercussion of the first. The consequence of that enormous disaster was that the unique and the local were irretrievably lost. Or rather, they exist still, but are hidden from us and may no longer be invoked, existing no more as a value, a goal, or a utopia, which is to say as something superordinate, but only as something subordinate, in the life of the individual and in the form of a paradox: each individual I is unique and inalienable, though in exactly the same way as every other. We elevate some individuals among us but are unable to acknowledge the fact, and we are permeated by others, unknowing that this is so, or unwilling to recognize it. Yet it is in terms of influence that this becomes tangible and visible to us in its entirety, in the striking difference between acceptable influence, that which the culture deems desirable to reproduce, and unacceptable influence, that which cannot or must not be reproduced. The harmless form of influence concerns that which belongs to us all and which runs through the social and intellectual domains – if I read Foucault and am enthused by what I read to such an extent that I absorb it entirely and make it my own, beginning to think and write in the manner of Foucault, I have made no transgression, nor have I lost anything, for Foucault is of such status now that his thoughts belong to everyone, in the same way as Kant's or Hegel's, or for that matter Plato's or Aristotle's, comprising a kind of intellectual foundation, a place from which our thinking might issue, by now quite impersonal, albeit attached to certain names. Our entire world of ideas is made up of similar such places, this is what our culture is. We vanish within that culture, though without losing our identity in so doing, since our identity is formed by the culture, for instance through general conceptions of what comprises a subject, an atom, the air, or a home, expressed in every dimension of the language and the culture. The fundamental principle of that identity of which our we is comprised, and which is also the locus of what we call morality, is unoriginality, receptiveness to influence and subordination. Identity is synchronistic, which is to say complete at any given time, and yet changeable. Its borders are temporal; what was generally seen to be true two generations ago – for instance that it is acceptable to punish a child physically or that homosexuality is shameful – is no longer so, and if we were to put those assumptions forward today we would either be ignored or condemned. What applies in the area of morality applies also to science; the structuralist model of understanding that was ubiquitous in the arts during the sixties, for instance, is now invalid and no longer applicable. This we-identity is non-individual, which reveals itself not least in the fact that the same people who in the sixties believed it was acceptable to punish a child physically, or who found homosexuality shameful, or considered the structuralist model of analysis to be an adequate tool by which to understand the various expressions of culture, no longer hold the same views, or, if they do, no longer make them public. The fact that we nevertheless think all our opinions and beliefs to be personal and individual, reached by way of our own mature consideration, completely ignoring the role played by time, is one of the most important social mechanisms of all, since without it the apparent relativity of morality and science would dissolve all imperative and we would be destroyed in a chaos of independence. This is why we cultivate independent expression in art, that which is unique and particular, and only there do we apply such a powerful mechanism of sanction as the concept of plagiarism, whereby we are able to sustain the idea of our individuality. If this had not been the case, there would have been no difference in meaning between socialization and plagiarism. All learning takes place through imitation; as children we imitate the language and behavior of our parents, as we grow up we imitate the language and behavior of our friends and teachers, and once we reach adulthood we imitate the language and behavior of those around us at that time. Nearly every instance of language uttered in the public sphere is nonindependent and unoriginal, which is to say devoid of any personal mark of the sender. The most widespread form of public language is journalism, which stands out by its very anonymity, and it is impossible to trace back the language used in any newspaper article to the individual journalist who wrote it, all is written in the same way, in the same style, and moreover they write about the same events and source information from each other without the notion of plagiarism ever occurring to anyone. They imitate each other, one article is copied from another, and this is so because it is we who are writing. The same is true of manuals and instructions for use, and dissertations, and textbooks. Only in fiction is there any expectation of a unique "I," whose greatest and most important constraint is not to imitate, not to copy anyone else or say what they've said, at least not in the same way. The more distinctive a writer is, the greater he or she is perceived to be. Many people seem to think that literature has to do with the creation of knowledge, or the generation of insight, but such things are merely a by-product, something that may accompany literature or not; the most important aspect is its individuality, which lies in the inimitable tone of the particular. But this individuality is not without limit, it can occur only within the boundaries of the we; when it transgresses those boundaries, stepping outside and expressing something utterly unreasonable, it will be condemned or ignored. A writer who for instance advocates the physical punishment of children or who condemns homosexuality in our day, fifty years after these were generally accepted viewpoints, needs to be extraordinarily inventive if he or she is to be accepted, which is to say forgiven, whereas a writer who for instance denies the extermination of the Jews in the Holocaust would never be accepted or considered to be great, regardless of how exceptional a level of literature he or she might otherwise achieve. These two premises of literature, that on the one hand it should be as individual as possible, meaning it should express the inimitability of the singular I, and on the other hand that it should exist within the boundaries of the general, meaning it should express the we, are at odds with each other, since the more unique I am, the further I am from the we. The fact that Knut Hamsun could pen Adolf Hitler's obituary and include in it the most outrageous sentence in all of Norwegian literature, we bow our heads, and the fact that Peter Handke, perhaps one of the world's three best living authors, if not the best, could speak at the funeral of Slobodan Milošević, thereby disqualifying himself completely from anything that might be called the cultural majority, are two obvious expressions of the inherent opposition between the unique I and the social we, otherwise known as morality, that literature embraces. Only a writer could have penned the Law of Jante. The fact that the Law of Jante found such widespread resonance is ironic, since what Sandemose's rules express is the very tyranny of the majority, but it is no more ironic than readers cultivating the value of the individual while collectively submitting to one. But precisely by being so closely joined to a particular individual, the voice of the best literature concerns not only the collective, as an example of an I-possibility all I's consume, but also in fact the one, which is to say the actual person in that actual place and in that actual time, and that identity in itself bears with it an insight not found anywhere else. For this reason, literature is inalienable. Because regardless of how consumed we are by each other, regardless of how collectivist our I's happen to be, they are in fact alone, experiencing everything alone, and that experience, that of being human, of existing in the world, cannot be expressed generally, within the horizon of the we, since in that case no we exists. A newspaper article or a TV report is always about one or more people in some other place, an experience none of us knows. A novel or a poem is also always about one or more people in some other place, but is presented in a language that renders its experience unique, and that unique experience intervenes in a completely different way in our unique existence. It is not about recognition or validation, but about truth.

But what is the truth of our social existence? Writing about socialization and plagiarism is one thing, quite another is to witness someone mimic you in a parody, imitating your voice, your gestures, your pose and bearing, the sheer unpleasantness of that, or to sit writing in the knowledge, deep down, that what you are writing is not something you have thought of yourself, not something you have drawn from your own chest, but something you have taken from someone else, and not just anyone else, someone belonging to the great we, but someone close to you, someone you need to be able to look in the eye. The full force of the social world resides in this. Not in the superordinate structures, the great community, the we that is all of us, for these are abstractions, but in the direct encounter, one person face-to-face with another. The force is in our gaze. This is the truth of our social existence. The social world is local, it belongs to the individual, in any given situation. Indeed, every gaze is unique, it belongs to the individual, and for this, and nothing else, we are responsible. This is the truth of our social existence, and therefore it is also the truth of our morality. A morality that proceeds from the community of an all, that proceeds from we, is dangerous, perhaps more dangerous than anything else, because committing to an all is to commit to an abstraction, something existing in the language or world of ideas, but not in reality, where people exist only as separate individuals. In this sense, Knut Hamsun and Peter Handke's morality is utterly superior to that of their critics.

The I of literature resembles the I of reality in the way the uniqueness of the individual may be expressed only through what is common to all, which in the case of literature is the language. All I's of literature make use of the same words, the only difference, that which separates one literary I from another, is the way in which those words are ordered, and the fact that it is possible, in that nonuniform distribution, so very marginal when seen from afar, for an I as vital and significant as Emily Dickinson's to emerge, is remarkable indeed. And it becomes no less remarkable when we consider that practically no one read her poems while she was alive. The overwhelming loneliness and longing she apparently felt is long since dead and buried as we read them now, all that remains is their articulation, which we awaken the very moment we allow our gaze to fall upon the words she wrote such a long time ago, and succumb to them. From that moment she sings within us. But what did she get from it, one might wonder, given that she never could have predicted that her poems would find readers throughout the world, be considered among the very best of the period to which she belonged, and be read long after people would normally have forgotten all about her and her life, though presumably they were written without thought of any reader at all? Why articulate what it feels like to be alive, rather than simply feel and think?

Why write?

I am alone as I write this. It's the twelfth of June, 2011, the time is 6:17 a.m., in the room above me the children are asleep, at the other end of the house Linda is asleep, outside the window, some meters into the garden, the early sun of dawn is slanting down on an apple tree. The leaves are mottled with light and shade. A short while ago a small bird sat in the fork of the tree, in its beak was something that looked like a worm or a grub, it paused there for a moment, throwing its head back as it tried to swallow. It's gone now. Behind that same fork in the tree where it sat the girls' bathing suits have been hung out to dry; all day yesterday they were in the wading pool a bit farther down the garden, half hidden by a willow. The grass outside, which is mostly in shade, is still wet with dew. The air is filled with the twitter and song of birds. Six months ago I sat in exactly the same place, in the early mornings, the children sleeping above me, Linda at the other end of the house. There was a fire in the stove then, and outside it was pitch dark, the air filled with whirling snow. For more than three years I have spent my mornings in the same way, sitting here or at home in the apartment in Malmö, bent over the keyboard, writing this novel, which is now drawing to a close. I have done so alone, in empty rooms, and as I have worked, my publishers have published what I have written, five volumes so far, about which I know there has been a lot of talk, much written and said in newspapers and blogs, on the radio, in journals and magazines. I've had no interest in that discourse and have kept out of it as much as possible, there's nothing there for me. Everything is here, in what I am doing now. But what is that, exactly?

What does it mean to write?

First of all it is to lose oneself, or one's self. In that it resembles reading, but while the loss of the self in reading is to the alien I, which, by virtue of being so obviously apart from the reader's own singular I, does not seriously threaten its integrity, the loss of the self in writing is in a different way complete, as when snow vanishes into snow, one might think, or any other monochromism with no privileged point, no foreground or background, no top or bottom, only sameness everywhere. Such is the nature of the written self. But what is this sameness of which it is comprised and within which it exists? It is the singular language of the self. The I comes into being in the language, and is the language. But the language is not the property of the I, it belongs to all. The identity of the literary I resides in the choice of one word rather than another, but how poorly held together and centered that identity is. In a way it resembles the one we have in dreams, where the conscious self distinguishes just as little between us and what constitutes our surroundings and experiences, and our I is in effect deposited inside a room in which the green bench to our left is quite as central to who we are as the wriggling fish to our right, or the Neptune-like figure rising out of the water that at that same moment floods the floor beneath the sky across which a red biplane passes. The difference between dreaming and writing must surely be that the former occurs without our control, in one of the body's unconscious modes, and is without purpose, whereas the latter is controlled and goal-oriented. This is true and yet not, for the crux of the similarity has to do with the absence of any localization of the I, the fact of it being dislocated and no longer centered, and the question that is thereby raised, for is it not the property of being centered that in actual fact makes up the I? The very act of holding together? Yes. But the truth of the I is not the truth of one's own particular being. What rises between all the various fragments, far out in the realm of all that is not held together, is also the hum of the own, the peculiar timbre of the self that resonates throughout our lives, that part of us to which we wake up in the mornings, beyond any thought we might happen to think, any feeling that situation might give rise to within us, and which is the last part of us we release before succumbing to sleep. And is it not this hum of the own, this distant reverberation of the self, that pervades all music, all art, all literature, and moreover all that is alive and able to sense? It has nothing to do with the I, even less with the we, only with our very being in the world. When I look at the little sparrow outside, the way it perches on the branch in the sun and throws back its head to swallow the worm or the grub, I cannot imagine that it should be completely without awareness of its own being. Perhaps that awareness is even stronger than ours, since it cannot possibly be overshadowed by any thought. The thoughts that hold together the I can be dissolved in the acts of reading and writing, though in two different ways, in the first instance by entering that which is alien and comes from without, and in the second instance by entering that which is alien and within us, which is the language at our own disposal, in other words the language in which we say I. In writing we lose control of that I, it becomes incalculable, and the question is whether the uncontrollable and incalculable properties of the singular I in actual fact are a representation of its true state, or at least the closest we can get to any representation of the actual self.

What do we say when we say I?

A famous diary from 1953 begins as follows:

Monday
Me.

Tuesday
Me.

Wednesday
Me.

Thursday
Me.

To me, this is a lesson in literature. The I behind this "me," on its own and uncommented upon, may refer to anyone at all, such an I is without identity and open. The issue of who the writer is, when the reader has nothing more to relate to, cannot be resolved. It may be your downstairs neighbor, the man from the kiosk on the square, your child, August Strindberg, Sølvi Wang, or Niki Lauda, to mention just a few of the names that for some reason spring to mind at this moment. The I is absolutely anonymous, in the sense of being nameless. But a nameless I may nevertheless, by virtue of the words surrounding it, convey a clear sense of a certain character, a kind of I-mood that prompts us to relate to it as if to a real person of flesh and blood, even in fact allowing us to come closer to it than to any real person, because the language of the literary I is explicitly tied to inner thoughts and feelings, the I when the I is alone, a dimension that vanishes in the physical encounter, where the body's frame is a barrier, not hostile or protective, but simply as it is, possessing its own language, besides the encounter between I and you also establishing a we, with its own particular rules and regulations, a social world, which only the intense infatuation of love can dissolve, though never completely, the social attaching also to that connection; no couple in love behaves uniquely. Against this can be said that the literary I, no matter how naked or how intimately it presents itself, is social too, by virtue of the expectation of a you that any I contains, and therefore is always already a we. Indeed, this lies in the very nature of the I, which is an appeal – we have no need to utter I in the presence only of ourselves – and in that appeal there is always another, and thereby a we. This applies too to the I of this diary. An I, or me, on its own is anonymous, neutral, and without character, but precisely by playing on the you, in this case the expectations we have of any I in a text, this particular I is able to infuse itself with meaning and say something about what an I is, without stating anything beyond "me." What happens when it is repeated four times? In a sentence, together with all sorts of other words, we wouldn't notice, but unencumbered, naked and accorded a line all to itself, the utterance becomes preposterous. Me, me, me, me: I, I, I, I. It expresses narcissism. But at the same time, by its nakedness it is as if that narcissism is being exhibited, and in this lies a conscious mind, someone saying, I know what I'm doing. What is the nature of that knowledge? I know it's narcissistic, but I'm doing it anyway. That is, I am not hiding myself. I'm telling it like it is. I am at root narcissistic. But who am I? As of yet, the I is all of us. That is, every me is narcissistic, but this it admits, and in this admission lies a duality: narcissism is a weakness, something unwanted; if it were not, then we would not attempt to hide it, so the fact that narcissism is being exhibited here is an admission of weakness, at the same time that admission also lifts up the I and distinguishes it, because it is candid, and candid narcissism stands in opposition to hidden narcissism in that the former aspires to truth, whereas the latter seeks to conceal the truth.

There is also something aggressive and hostile in the repetition of this "me." Fuck you, it says. You can believe what you want. Here, I, and only I, prevail.

"Me" completely on its own is anonymous, neutral, and without character. Repeated four times it becomes a literary and social program, since after having read the first four diary entries, one understands that this is a me in opposition to the social world, which it considers to be hypocritical and insincere, unlike its writing, which aspires toward that which is true and sincere by sticking to its own, which is to say the me that opens out toward us by putting itself on display, at first anonymous, neutral and without character, and which by virtue of the repetition then sheds the neutral and the characterless, and in its fourth instance stands trembling, truth-thirsty, reality-craving, superior.

And then it is literature.

But if I had begun this novel in exactly the same way it would not have been literature. Although the pronoun "me" does not in any way belong to Witold Gombrowicz, the author of that diary, and he likewise has no right of property to the repetition of that pronoun four times, meaning that legally or morally there would not have been anything in the way of my making use of that exact same opening, this would not have been the case with regard to literature, since the entire value of that opening lies in its uniqueness and its expression of uniqueness. If I had used the same words, Witold Gombrowicz's me would have superimposed itself onto my own, and my "me" would thereby have become a parody, expressing lack of originality where Gombrowicz expresses the opposite, originality, and thereby I would have undermined what the utterance is saying, that truth lies in the unique I, and only there, since the I that would have been saying this would not have been unique and primary, but Gombrowiczized, socialized, plagiarized.

My literary I was most likely Gombrowiczized, because his diaries had such a great influence on the way I thought about identity, sociality, and literature, but it was also Larssonized, Proustized, and Célinized, if not to say quite Sandemosial and thoroughly Hamsunified, and if I were to attach an image to those influences it would perhaps involve a boy, let's say he's fourteen years old, living next to a river, with a section of rapids about three kilometers down from the house, and the rock over which the water rushes, swollen and shiny as steel, is smoothly eroded and covered with algae, meaning that a person can swim out above the rapids and allow themselves to be swept along by the current, something he often does, this boy, together with his best friend and all the others who congregate there in the summer evenings, there being hardly a better feeling in life than this, to sense the might of the river, the increasing velocity, the surge of descent as he is swept away and slung into the depths downstream, plunged into the turmoil of tiny bubbles, allowing himself, if he wishes, to be carried into more gentle waters, there to clamber up onto the land again, or else swim back upstream as far as he is able, until the current becomes too strong and he is brought to a standstill, unable to progress any farther no matter how hard he struggles, eventually to be swept away downstream again. To sail down those rapids is like writing, carried from one point to another by forces beyond your control, but what you experience on your way is experienced by you alone, since I cannot imagine the other kids could have seen or felt the same as he, and if those evenings, with their setting suns and as yet warm rocks through swiftly cooling air, where great swarms of insects hung suspended in pockets of light, the resounding rush of the river and the joyful shrieks of boys and girls, the almost electrically illuminated trees, behind which an old-fashioned gravel track led to a manor farm presumably built in the nineteenth century in connection with the sawmill at the falls, and beyond the manor farm the sunlit, tree-covered slopes above which the sky slowly dimmed, eventually, towards midnight, opening to the light of the few stars bright enough to pierce the pale night of summer – if those evenings, with the slant of farther slopes on the other side of the river, dark and shadowy at the bottom, shimmering orange at the top as if ablaze, and an asphalt road with a bit more traffic along whose straights and bends the kids who lived there would cycle or race their mopeds to call on each other – if all this remained in their memories it would be in ways completely different to the way it did in his, this fourteen- or fifteen-year-old boy with no greater joy in life than this, to be within this space that resounded with the clamor of its thunderous waters and the exuberant voices of young humans, lit by the sun or dimmed by its absence, so strangely desirable that the very thought of it fills him with joy even now, twenty-eight years later. The feelings that come to him on this reflection may be no less intense than those of the others who were there, this is certainly possible, since different things will attach themselves to us, and his experience is by no means more significant to him than to the others, it is simply different. It is unique. And a starting point for a hundred novels at least. Boy at river below sawmill one evening in summer. A writer of Sandemose's ilk would most probably have zoomed in on the girl in the red bikini both he and his friend desire, then followed the three of them through life, since here we have a very fundamental psychological as well as social structure, two on one, and archaic in nature, the taboos surrounding it are basic. A Proustian writer would probably have ignored the physical-concrete aspect of the situation and emphasized its reminiscence in memory, which by virtue of being a representation is connected with all other representations, which is to say that it shares the characteristics of the work of art, the reproduction of something no longer here but which nevertheless remains within us, in the almost dreamlike haze that is such an important element of our reality, where the girl in the red bikini, dipping her toe in the river in the shade of the trees, perhaps resembles one of Rembrandt's young Dutch women of the seventeenth century, Susanna, for instance, or that of one of the figures seated or standing on the smooth rocks, dressing or undressing, are fleetingly reminiscent of Pierre Puvis de Chavannes's paintings from the latter half of the nineteenth century in which the human has a near-sculptural quality, certainly not psychological, and where the various poses, which lead the mind back to the high classical phase of Greek Antiquity, four and three hundred years before Christ, when the self did not turn inward to seek harmony there, but outward, might claim this to be a constant quality of the human, rather than something cultural or relative, which would also be the case here with these youthful Scandinavian figures on the rocks by the river. A Hamsunite, where would he or she have gone with this? To the drone of the moped as it rounds the bend beneath the fell? To the rush of the river, the sudden bashfulness in the eye of a girl as she glances down? Or to the house of the fat mini-mart owner on the new estate from the sixties and his efforts to make a living independently of the supermarket chains? The tattered remnants of aristocracy in the family who perhaps own, perhaps no longer own, the manor farm by the river? Or perhaps to the self, the self observing itself, suspiciously monitoring, cracking down at the slightest hint of pretense, in that impossible desire for authenticity that once led Nagel to suicide in a town thirty kilometers from this place in distance, ninety years in time. Oh, here were already priests and the daughters of priests, lensmenn and their sons, blood that rushed in the veins, hearts that pounded in the chest, here were the most refined and the coarsest of emotions, all a writer would have to do would be to start.

I first read Pan when I was fifteen years old, in the house that lay three kilometers from those rapids, and the forceful feelings it described found resonance in my own. Maybe that was why my love life proceeded so miserably in the years that followed, my understanding of girls, falling in love, and having relationships being too rooted in the late nineteenth century. But the novel that made the deepest impression on me in those years was Bram Stoker's Dracula. Reading it was a feverish experience. I had no idea why, and still don't. I never identified myself with the Count, he who drained the blood of others, but with his victims, who after having been bitten by him lost not only their blood but also their independence. Knowing me, I most likely read Dracula as a novel about submission and liberation from submission. Not that I ever thought that explicitly, I never thought at all when I was reading, but it was what I felt. The sheer sense of triumph and joy that gathered in my chest when finally they drove the stake through the vampire's heart would seem to indicate that was the case. And rather than seeing the writer as a vampire sucking the blood of those around him, which is a tantalizing trope for the business of writing about other people, at least as this is perceived by the public, I saw the writer as someone in danger of losing his independence, a person held captive and paralyzed by the power of another, who fawningly acts like him, pale, bloodless, and ghostlike. Perhaps because I have always had such a weak ego, always felt myself inferior to all others, in every situation. Not only the brilliant individuals I have met, who with their charisma, intelligence, and talent have outshone all others, but also taxi drivers, waiters, train conductors, in fact every kind of person one can possibly meet out there. I am inferior to the man who washes down the stairs and the corridors in the building in which we live, he possesses an authority greater than mine in that situation, so if he says something about the stroller, for instance, and the bikes left outside our door, in a voice that carries even the slightest hint of annoyance, I tremble. I am inferior to the female assistant in the shoe store when I go in to buy shoes, she has me in her hands, so to speak, full of an authority to which I yield. But the worst for me are waiters, since their role is so obviously to serve and be there to please, it is their job to submit to the wishes of their customers, and the fact that I feel inferior to them, at their mercy even, the fact that they can see that I'm not a good diner, for instance, and don't quite know how to taste a wine, or what it's supposed to taste like, matters in which they are expert, is a humiliation every time. And it goes on. All the journalists I meet, even those twenty years younger than me, are my betters, and I always do what I can not to bore them, I often say things I don't even mean simply in order to present them with something. When I moved to Stockholm at the age of thirty-three, outwardly a man, inwardly still a sixteen-year-old, and met Geir Angell there, who I hadn't seen since the spring we went out drinking together a few times in Bergen twelve years before, it was one of the first things he said to me. You've got the most warped self-image of anyone I've ever met, he told me. You've got absolutely no insight into yourself. Hasn't it ever occurred to you that it's the others who are boring? That it's the others who are unoriginal and haven't a thought, that they're the ones who are imitative and full of platitudes? No, I said, because it's not like that at all. Listen, he went on. I saw you when you were twenty. You were totally different from anyone else I knew at that time. You were out on your own. It didn't surprise me in the slightest when I saw you were getting a novel published. Who else back then did anything like that? No one. There was an intentness about you that . . . well, no one else had. Those sad eyes of yours. If only you could have seen yourself! Ha ha ha!

And now you've written an amazing novel. You'll write another, and another one after that. You've got to stop measuring yourself against people who are only bureaucrats in their own lives and in those of others. And you've definitely got to stop thinking they're the ones who are interesting while you're the nonentity. They're the nonentities, and it's glaringly obvious to anyone.

I continued to deny it but felt flattered nonetheless, who wouldn't?

I resisted. What he said felt like a poison spreading through my veins.

Not only did he listen to what I told him about my life, he also found it interesting and wanted to talk about it on our endless wanderings around Stockholm. How everything had centered around my father when I was growing up, my attempts to please him, the terror that was always there, the circumstances of his death. My relationship with my brother, which had been complicated when he got together with a girl I was in love with, and which was close and distant at the same time. The confidence I shared with my mother, her analytic approach to reality. My various romantic realtionships, though these were not numerous. The way I was in awe of women, to such an extent that I was unable to approach them. How twice I had slashed my face in fits of despair. My vanity. My fear of coming across as feminine. My joy at being drunk, my infidelities, my constant feelings of inferiority in every respect. My triumphs, which could not outweigh my failures, neither in number nor in their sheer intensity. He took all of this and composed a picture of my psychological and social character he then analyzed and discussed. He construed me as a kind of baroque entity, abnormal and warped, whose inner being was utterly out of sync with its outward expression – completely the opposite of how I saw myself, which was ordinary to the point of self-erasure, this very ordinariness being my problem as a writer. I enjoyed football, both playing and watching; I enjoyed lightweight American films and could still read comics now and again; I watched the weather forecast on TV, or the news, because of the gorgeous women who sometimes appeared on the screen, and could develop small crushes on them; I enjoyed much the same music as when I was twelve, and if I liked a book or a painting I would never know why and would have to resort to words and thoughts I had picked up from others and which thereby were wholly lacking in authenticity. I had nothing special to say about anything, because I was a nobody, with nothing distinctive about me. Yet by simply talking about myself to someone who was not only genuinely interested but also analyzed everything, identifying or establishing connections between all the various parts, that ordinariness was turned into something extraordinary and unique, even to my own mind. It was as if my self had been kept frozen and had now begun to thaw. It creaked as it stirred, so long had it lain stiff and immovable. I soon got the feeling my inner being was inexhaustible. It was a good feeling. The idea that things I said could be interesting was a new experience. I'd always found myself dull. What was interesting was connected with the feeling of inexhaustibility, because there were no limits to the inexhaustible, and limits were what had kept everything out of reach and frozen. I almost never confided in anyone, thinking nothing I had to say could be of interest to anyone, and from that perspective, which was the social perspective, the expectations of the you as constructed by the I, confidence was a nonstarter for me, and this was basically how I was with everything. I was mute in the social world, and since the social world exists nowhere else but in each individual, I was also mute toward myself, in my inner being. Only once before had I felt such inexhaustibility, and the situation had been almost the same: another person had seemed to be genuinely interested in what I saw and in what I had to say about myself. That person was Arve, he was ten years older than me and had acquired such insight into the world it meant he could laugh at everything. He was on a completely different level to anyone I had met until that point. Arve was supreme, in a way, independent in the true sense of the word. He was also demonic, or at least played the demon with me, forever tantalizing. What did he tantalize me with? Freedom. What was freedom? To be free was to transgress. To identify everything as being subject to constraints, stuck, ossified, and to remove oneself from that. Not necessarily the social world as a set of rules for behavior, which then Bohemian-like could be ignored, but the mind-set those rules entailed. What Roland Barthes referred to as doxa. But Arve hitched up with wife Linda, who I had very quickly fallen in love with, and I closed the door on everything that had happened, including what I had learned from him in his capacity as freedom's demon. None of it mattered anymore. I returned to my own life, that's how it felt, as if for some days I had been living another life entirely, only then to find it wasn't for me, it simply wasn't mine. I had no business encroaching on the wild. I was pleasant, thoughtful, and responsible, apart from the times I was drunk, when a strong urge always rose in me to let people down. Eventually I did, and when that came to light, a year later, I ran away to an island and lived there completely on my own for several months, during which I felt I needed to make a decision and stick to it for the rest of my life. I needed to become a good person. It was in the winter and spring of 2001. In the spring of 2002 I left everything behind and uprooted to Stockholm. There I met Geir and eventually Linda. While meeting Geir gave me a viewpoint on myself and a space in which it could be articulated, in other words remoteness, which was invaluable, meeting Linda gave me the opposite, in that encounter all remoteness was dissolved, I became closer to her than I had ever been to any other person in my life, and in that closeness there was no use for words, no use for analysis, no use for thoughts, because when all is said and done, which is another way of saying in life, when it presents itself in all its intensity, when you're there, at the center of it all, with your entire being, the only thing that matters is feeling. Geir gave me the chance to look at life and understand it, Linda gave me the chance to live it. In the first instance I became visible to myself, in the second I vanished. That's the difference between friendship and love. That the two things came into my life simultaneously meant for a while everything was turned upside down, all of a sudden, almost from one day to the next, I found myself plunged into something completely new. Everything was wide open, nothing was impossible anymore. And in the sky, in that fantastic summer of 2002, the sun shone, sinking red into the Mälardalen every night, as if shrouded by a veil of blood, its last rays glittering gold on all the city's towers and spires, and I was immortal. Seven years later, toward the end of the not-quite-so-fantastic summer of 2009, here I was with Geir again, in the bathroom of our apartment in Malmö, watching the four kids splashing about in the bath as the sky outside, which I couldn't see but whose light I could sense through the rectangular windows, gradually darkened.

"Looks like we've got the hang of it," he said.

I turned my head to look at him. He was smiling.

"How do you mean?" I said.

"Kids."

"What are you talking about, Daddy?" said Vanja.

"We're talking about being fedre," I said.

"What's that?" she replied.

"It's what Geir and I are," I said, leaning forward and turning off the tap. "Fathers."

I wondered if his pleasure came from seeing Njaal with other children, a relatively rare occurrence with Njaal being an only child, and the fact that he seemed to be handling it so well, or whether it was down to Geir himself having organized the trip, since normally it was Christina who took care of everything to do with Njaal, while Geir mostly sat in his study writing. He had never immersed himself in the daily routines I dealt with, the clothes and the laundry, food and cooking, children's play and bedtimes, it was his choice and he had always been quite clear on the matter, that he didn't want anything to do with any of that, and yet I often thought he must feel he was missing out on something occasionally, not the practical things but what came with them in terms of involvement. I didn't think that was the case, but the sudden pleasure I saw in him as they sat there playing in the bath perhaps suggested it. I wasn't going to ask him, it was one of those things I was reluctant to bring up, sensing it would be touching on something I didn't want to touch on. It would be an infringement.

What was so dangerous about closeness?

Getting close to someone meant seeing things the other person didn't, whether it was because they didn't want to, or because they couldn't. Geir had an explanation for everything, but that didn't mean that everything about him was explained. He controlled every situation in which he was involved, with the exception of those that included children; the intimacy they afforded, so unaccountable in nature, was something he was unfamiliar with, and this unfamiliarity was plain to see. I had always thought he wanted it that way, but when I saw the smile on his face as he watched Njaal with the others, the sudden sense of pleasure that came over him, it struck me that perhaps he felt the lack of complete familiarity that Christina for instance enjoyed to be something lacking in his life.

What would he say if I told him this?

That it wasn't true?

That it was true, but it was the price he paid for being able to do what he wanted?

That it was his problem, not Njaal's, and therefore unimportant?

That it was no price at all?

After writing this yesterday morning, I took Heidi and John to the nursery, where I was putting in a shift. The staff told me I could get off early to go to Vanja's last-day-of-school event if I wanted, so I took Heidi and John with me and went to the church a few blocks away where it was taking place. Compared to the last-day assemblies of my own school days, which had taken place in a chapel with hymns and a priest in full garb in an atmosphere that was starched and solemn, the last thing we had to endure before the summer, which seemed to us to be ready and waiting outside, Vanja's last day was like something from a different world. A choir of nine- or ten-year-olds sang pop songs by the likes of Christina Aguilera and Mariah Carey; two kids of the same age played piano; some others, slightly older, perhaps twelve or thirteen, performed a rap. After each performance the church erupted into exuberant applause. It was like an audition for American Idol. The priest spoke about how important it was to be joyful, he told them fame and fortune didn't matter and that everyone was equal. There was no mention at all of God, Jesus, or the Bible. After the sermon, which lasted all of five minutes, the pupils who had stood out most during the year were called forward. They received diplomas. Some for their fantastic grades, some for their fantastic personal qualities, which, judging by what was said, consisted of taking responsibility for others and caring. The whole hour-long event concluded with the graduates from the ninth grade being called forward in turn to receive a flower. As I walked back with Heidi and John holding my hands, we came up behind a group of kids, maybe thirteen or fourteen years old. All were crew-cut, dressed in jacket-and-trouser combinations, boisterously backslapping, laughing, and shouting exaggeratedly, as many had done in the church. They had clasped hands when greeting each other, applauded and whooped when one of their own, or someone they respected, took the stage to perform. This macho-like behavior, which seemed so out of place in their ungrown bodies, several sizes too big as it were, and which for that reason came across as rather comical, was nevertheless genuine in that this was their ideal, and nothing else. These boys wanted to be hard, strong, and tough, and they were in the majority. The others, pale and spindly youngsters with glasses and smidgeons of gel in their hair, hadn't a chance against the swagger of the immigrant-community kids. After we got back to the nursery and I was busy filling the dishwasher and wiping the kitchen counter, the nursery head asked me how the event had gone. I said it was like being in the United States. That I'd never seen anything as Americanized before. The best students singing and performing for the others, diplomas awarded to those who had stood out. And the absurd sermon given by the priest, who said everyone was equal, while everything that was going on around him said the opposite, with some students singled out as being more valuable than others and put on display in all their glory. Yes, said the director. When I was a kid, the last day of school was a solemn occasion. We sang the national anthem. But that was banned. They said it was racist to sing the national anthem. Can you imagine?

I could indeed. Equality was the supreme principle, and one of the consequences was that expressions of the singularly Swedish were seen as exclusive and discriminatory, for which reason they were shunned. When it came to religion, one had to tread carefully, church had long since been separated from state, and now things had got to the stage where priests no longer mentioned God or Jesus or the Bible when addressing schoolchildren, since this could cause offense to the many who came from Muslim homes. It was this same ideology, hostile to all difference, that could not accept categories of male and female, he and she. Since han and hun are denotative of gender, it was suggested a new pronoun, hen, be used to cover both. The ideal human being was a gender-neutral hen whose foremost task in life was to avoid oppressing any religion or culture by preferring their own. Such total self-obliteration, aggressive in its insistence on leveling out, though in its own view tolerant, was a phenomenon of the cultural middle class, that segment of the population which controlled the media, the schools, and other major institutions of society, and it existed, as far as I could tell, only in northern Europe. But what did this ideology of equality actually entail? A recent study said that differences between pupils in Swedish schools had never been greater than they are now. The gap between the ablest children, for whom the future is bright, and the least able, whose futures lie outside the zones of influence and wealth, is widening year by year. The trend in the study is clear indeed: the strongest pupils are those from Swedish backgrounds, the weakest are from immigrant backgrounds. While we might be concerned not to offend people from other nations and other cultures, and go so far as to eliminate everything Swedish, this happens only in the symbolic world, the world of flags and anthems, whereas in the real world everyone who does not belong to the Swedish middle class, which is hostile to all difference, is kept down and excluded: most immigrants in Malmö, welcome as they are, live in ghetto-like public housing projects outside the center, in miserable apartments, areas where unemployment is massive and prospects are dim. It is also the case that the middle class, hostile to all difference, prefers not to send its children to schools attended by children from immigrant communities, thereby further reinforcing the segregation, with a knock-on effect on the next generation. Many immigrant children have parents with no education, and what the Swedish school system formerly considered to be a priority, lessening differences by providing equal opportunties to able and less able students alike, has now been completely invalidated as a guiding principle, the result being that the haves receive more, the have-nots less. Equality in Sweden is confined to the middle class, they alone are becoming more equal; elsewhere the only equality is in the language, managed by the same middle class. In Sweden something happening in language is much worse than something happening in reality. An instance of one moral code applying in language and another in reality used to be called a double standard. This was what was going on at Vanja's last-day-of-school event; the ideal of everyone being equal, and fame and wealth being unimportant, applied in the language of the priest, whereas the reality surrounding that ideology said the opposite: the most important thing is to be rich and famous. Every child there harbored that dream, it was in the air. And the more I see of it, this self-blind and self-satisfied ideology of equality, believing as it does that the conclusion it has reached is universal and true and must therefore govern us all – although in fact it is valid only to a small class of the privileged few, as if they comprised some little island of decency in an ocean of commercialism and social inequality – the more the significance of my life's struggle diminishes, for what difference does it then make if I spend more or less time with my children, if I change their diapers or don't change their diapers, if I do the dishes or don't do the dishes, if I spend time on my work or don't spend time on my work? Oh, how then, for crying out loud, can we make the lives we live an expression of life, rather than the expression of an ideology? All the thou-shalt-nots by which our small middle-class lives were constrained, all the things we weren't supposed to say or do, or else were obliged to say or do, how I longed not to give a damn and do as I pleased.

But that wasn't possible. I become panic-stricken at the thought of anyone feeling annoyed, I want everyone to feel comfortable and am willing to give up everything that is mine in order for that to happen. If someone does not feel comfortable, I close my eyes to it or withdraw, since the only way I can deal with people not feeling comfortable is if they do so somewhere other than right in front of me. Out of sight, out of mind. It can even get to the point where for long periods I won't open letters I receive for fear they might be unpleasant, since what other letters are there but letters from reality? Something's burning in the Rosengård District, but the papers aren't reporting on it because reporting on it might lead to other problems, might put racist ideas in people's heads, so they close their eyes, shut their mouths, turn away. As such, I am the very epitome of Swedishness, but to be Swedish is also to possess something else, something alien to me, which is social adroitness. The ability to talk about matters great and small in a personal way without ever getting personal, which Swedes master to perfection, is something at which I am utterly inept; either I blurt out something so private that people look down or become ill at ease, or else I go on about something so remote from myself that everyone else quite naturally is bored to death. There is a colloquial elegance about Sweden that is collective and very much a part of the social world, something sophisticated and impressive, quite absent in Norway, where such casual refinement is always individual, attaching to those who have been fortunate, either in something they've just said or in their lives altogether.

A siren suddenly screamed out of nowhere, rising sharply, then stopping abruptly outside the building. I leaned forward and looked out; most likely it was over the road at the hotel, which with its many guests sometimes had to call for an ambulance. Businessman with a heart attack, I usually thought to myself; what else could happen to a person staying at a hotel?

This time it was a police car.

"What's going on?" Geir wanted to know.

"A police car outside the hotel. Maybe they caught that dyslexic thief, the one with the misspelled youth."

"Ha ha."

"Should we get them dried now?" I asked, and looked at him inquiringly.

Geir shrugged and threw up his hands.

"Looks like they're still having fun, if you ask me," he said.

"Can you keep an eye on them for a minute then? I just need to check my e-mails."

"Gunnar haunting you?"

"Not only."

I went past him and into the bedroom, sat down on the chair, and clicked into my in-box.

There was a new message, from Jan Vidar.

Hi Karl Ove

Sorry to get back to you so late on this, came home Sunday and have been a bit busy since, a lot going on at work. I'm not shocked, and not angry either. Why should I be? Past is past, and writing about it isn't going to change anything. Besides, there's nothing there that can't see the light of day as far as I'm concerned. I think I've got a fairly good idea of who I am and the way I was, and I really don't care too much about what other people might think anymore. So if it benefits your story you can do what you like, it's all fine by me.

Apart from that I must say the book knocked me out. Maybe because it's all so close to home – or maybe it's the way you write that does it, I don't know, but others besides me are bound to get off on it. Fantastic and gut-wrenching at the same time. So incredibly exact about what it was like. Lots of stuff I'd forgotten – suppressed, maybe . . . but it all came rushing back full power. Fantastic, the way it set off so many thoughts about how and why.

Anyway, there I was, in the wilds of Finnmark, reading more than I was fishing. Came across an old peat hut and spent a lot of hours inside with your book. Incredible place, Bilbo Baggins could have lived there . . .

Hope it works out with your uncle and the rest of the family. And that they get the point.

If you're up for a coffee or a beer next time you're around, just give me a call. It'd be nice.

All the best to you and yours too.
Jan Vidar

It had been a long time since I'd felt as glad as I did after reading something. But there was also a tinge of what felt like grief in that joy, because with him coming across as generously as he did here, it became clear to me that I hadn't done him justice. I was indebted to him. I had no problem with that; the sliver of despair I felt had to do with the time that had gone, it was there, in the past, back then, and I wished I could make up for that imbalance. Another thing which occurred when he said the novel had knocked him out was that I then assessed the forthcoming book in that light, and it was so radically different, having so little of the narrative thrust of the first book that no one would ever be able to say the same about it. In other words, it was less of a book, and that thought deflated my spirits.

I sat there for a minute in front of the computer in the bedroom, staring out the window, first at the railing of the balcony, then at the front of the hotel on the other side of the road, the three elevators which slid up and down in their unpredictable patterns, as the gleeful sounds of the children in the bath swelled and diminished in the background. I felt a sudden and very strong sense of closeness to Jan Vidar. The emotions of that time welled inside me, I saw the faces of his parents and his sister, recalled the smells of their home, and the landscape that had been ours, with all of its little places, glowed with the intensity of the most compelling memories. At the time it was just a landscape, almost insignificant, certainly when compared to the landscape in which I had grown up, which even then had been saturated with emotion, but now it too had become the Landscape, laden with significance and meaning. The same thing occurred with respect to those who had lived there. The number of people we come close to during our lives is small, and we fail to realize how infinitely important each and every one of them is to us until we grow older and can see things from afar. When I was sixteen, I thought life was without end, the number of people in it inexhaustible. This was by no means strange, since right from starting school at the age of seven I'd been surrounded by hundreds of children and adults; people were a renewable resource, found in abundance, but what I didn't know, or rather had absolutely no conception of, was that every step I took was defining me, every person I encountered leaving their mark on me, and that the life I was living at that particular time, boundlessly arbitrary as it seemed, was in fact my life. That one day I would look back on my life, and this would be what I looked back on. What then had been insignificant, as weightless as air, a series of events dissolving in exactly the same way as the darkness dissolved in the mornings, would twenty years on seem laden with destiny and fate. The people who had been there then would become even more important, infinitely significant in as much as they had not only been shaping my perception of who I was, had not only been the people through which my own face emerged and became visible, but embodied the very understanding of how this particular life turned out the way it did.

I thought about all of this. And then I thought about how I had always considered time to be vertical. Time was to me a kind of ladder one climbed, whose rungs were ages – at the bottom one's time at preschool, then school, gymnas, university, and so on. That thought had never been explicit to me, and I had never pictured it as such in that way, but somewhere in the depths of my conceptions some idea of that nature must have existed, subconsciously shaping the way I perceived things, and perhaps the most surprising thing I discovered while writing this novel was that everyone who had appeared in my life, even my friends at nursery, my mother's co-workers at Kokkeplassen, the neighborhood kids in Tybakken, the cleaning lady we had there, my old teachers, and everyone else who had been there in my vicinity from when I was six months old to when I was thirteen, existed simultaneously with me now, and had always done so. Moreover, everyone I had known from my time in Tveit and in Kristiansand, at school and at the gymnas, existed on exactly the same level, in that same horizontality. Not one had sunk into the depths of history! All had lived their own lives, lived through exactly the same things as I myself, and had been contactable throughout this time, through all these years. They were a phone call away.

It had never occurred to me before. I had thought my life to be lived only in my immediate and most intimate surroundings, and that every place I ever left had gone from my life at that same moment.

Naturally, I didn't really think that to be true, had never even entertained the thought, but something inside me had certainly experienced things in that way, that the places I left, and the people who populated them, died away after I was gone. For that reason it had not been them I had written about, but my recollections of them. The fact that they still existed in their own right, at the same time as my writing about them, had not occurred to me.

At the time they took place, the events of my life had possessed a weight of which I had been wholly unaware. Now that I could sense that weight, paradoxically it was gone, as if my life and the person I had been were now fixed, and that nothing of what had taken place then could change the fact. It was only a feeling I had, but it was strong. I was somewhere else. Now it was my children who were living through days heavy with destiny and fate. Although I knew this was so, I had difficulty putting myself in their place, seeing things through their eyes, not the way they saw them now, but the way they would later realize they had been seeing them. To me, the life we lived together was a long series of everyday events, and all I could do was behave accordingly, as if caught in their trap. The idea that this time too would one day be gone often filled me with consternation. Now was the time I could be close to them, my children, now was the time I could give them all my love and attention. In only a few years – and a year in the life of a forty-year-old passed with the hurtling speed of a locomotive compared with how to them it crept along – they would be beyond it all, adults in whose past, the time and events by which they were formed, I had never quite been present. This and nothing else would be what they judged me by. But even when they judged me I would still be the person I was, with the knowledge of what everything had been like and why, something to which they would not, and perhaps never would, have access. So what I hoped for was for them to grow up in a world that received them well, and in that way to gain independence from me and us.

I got up and went back to the bathroom. The sky rumbled abruptly over the city.

"Did you hear that?" I asked.

"It's thundering," said Vanja.

"Time to get dried," I said. "Come on, out you come."

One by one I lifted my three children out of the bath, draped a big towel over each of them, and quickly rubbed their tummies and backs before sending them out to make room for Geir and Njaal. I got some underwear out of the drawer in the bedroom for Vanja and Heidi, and a fresh diaper for John from the little bathroom, then handed nightgowns to the girls, who had already climbed into bed, before helping John with his pajamas.

"When's Mommy coming home?" said Vanja.

"Tomorrow."

"I want Mommy now!" said Heidi.

"It won't be long before she's home," I said. "First you go to sleep, then you go to dagis tomorrow, and then when you come home she'll be back."

"Mommy," said John.

"You'll see," I said. "She'll be back before you know it. Vanja, do you want to choose a book?"

I sat down on the bed. Heidi and John sat down next to me. The sky rumbled again. Vanja and Heidi both looked at me, Vanja from the bookshelf over by the wall.

"It's nothing to be frightened of," I said. "It's a nice sound, don't you think?"

Heidi shook her head. Vanja took a book and brought it over to us, then sat down slightly behind me.

The air in their bedroom felt dense and clammy, my head was still thumping slightly.

The book was about a little girl who was very timid and unadventurous, she was in nursery school, and one day they were on a trip, she got separated from all the others and met a pack of wolves, who at first were scary, yellow eyes among the trees, but then when they came up to her it turned out all they wanted was to play. The game they liked best was one where they were patients in a hospital, they could lie there on their backs without moving while she went around and tickled them. The next morning they took her back to the nursery, and on the last page she could finally do what she hadn't had the courage to do before, which was to jump down from the roof of the little playhouse.

Their little breathing bodies cuddled up to me, absorbed by the story. The thunder rumbling closer in the sky. The drumming of the rain on the balcony and on the square below. The innocence, all that was pure and fine in them.

I got up. They wanted more, but I told them one book was enough, it was late and time to sleep, they had to be up in the morning. I lifted John up and carried him over to his crib, pretending to drop him from on high, catching him again as he fell. He laughed and said, again, Daddy. I said no, turned to Heidi and told her to climb up into her bed and Vanja to get into hers, and then I would come and tickle them.

I sang Heidi a song about a mommy troll putting her children to bed, and another for Vanja about a little songbird, and the one about sailing without a wind for John. They seemed ready to sleep, but a bit overtired too.

"Can the door stay open like that?" Vanja asked.

"Of course," I said.

"What if the lightning strikes here?" she wanted to know.

"It can't," I said.

"Will we die?"

"No, no, no. The first thing is it can't happen, because lightning always strikes the highest point. What's the tallest building here?"

"The hotel?"

"Exactly. So if lightning strikes here it'll strike the hotel instead. And the hotel's got lightning conductors, so nothing will happen there either."

"But if," she said. "Will we die?"

"No, we won't. We're safe here. And now it's sleep time for little tots. We've got to be up early in the morning."

"Night night," said Vanja.

"Night night, Vanja," I said. "Night night, Heidi."

She didn't answer. I went over to her bunk and peeped in. She was fast asleep. Sometimes she could just fall asleep from one moment to the next.

I smoothed my hand over her head. She was snoring slightly.

"Night night, John," I said.

"Night, Daddy," he said.

"Heidi's snoring," said Vanja.

"Yes, she is," I said. "She's fast asleep. And in a minute you'll be asleep too."

"But she's snoring!"

"Just ignore it, you won't hear her then," I said, stepped out and closed the door behind me.

"DADDY!" Vanja shouted.

The door.

I opened it again.

"I forgot, that's all. Go to sleep," I said, left the door ajar and went into the living room. I heard Geir's voice in the other room, opened the balcony door, stepped out and sat down in the chair.

Oh, the air was so cool and delightful.

A diagonal bolt of lightning cracked out of the heavy gray cloud and vanished again. I lit a cigarette. Another lightning bolt, to the south this time, sliced through the sky. The thunder came rolling in. Raindrops splattered white against the black roofing and were felt six floors below, and on the roof of the building opposite it looked like they were rebounding. Another peal of thunder, this time accompanied by a crackling fracture, so loud that no other sound compared, it seemed almost to make the entire city shudder.

It was fantastic.

I inhaled, put my feet up on the railing and stared out. Lightning lit up the sky in different places, now to the south, now to the north.

Fantastic.

Next to me the door opened. Geir put his head around.

"How about a beer?"

"That wouldn't be bad," I said. "Just the one, though."

"If I meant two, I'd have said so," he replied, closing the door again. I got up and went inside after him.

"Just need to call Linda first," I said.

He nodded as he opened the fridge door. I went out to the mirror in the hall, picked up the phone from its charger on the table underneath, pressed her number, and stepped over to look in on the children. Vanja was lying on her side and looked up at me.

"Who are you calling?" she asked.

"Aren't you asleep yet?" I said.

"I can't," she said.

"Is it the thunder?" I said, and at the same time Linda's voice came on the other end.

"Hi!" she said.

"Hi," I said. "How's it going?"

"Fine. How's everything at home?"

"Fine," I said, going into the bedroom. "The kids are, anyway. Heidi and Vanja have been playing with Njaal."

"That's good," she said.

"It's thundering like crazy here," I said. "The whole sky's lit up with lightning."

"How exciting," she said. "Are you and Geir all right?"

"Yes, I think so. We were out at the cabin. Now we've just been in all evening. Gave the kids a bath. Heidi and John are asleep. Vanja's awake. They're missing you."

"I'm missing them too!"

"You'll be home tomorrow, though," I said.

"Yes," she said.

There was a silence. I bunched the duvet up against the wall, then lay down with it under my back for support. Thunder cracked again, closer now.

"Did you hear that?" I asked.

"No," she said. "What was it?"

"Thunder. Åska, as the kids say. When I first came to Sweden I thought it meant ash, like from a volcano erupting. Which is a whole lot more dramatic, I suppose."

She laughed.

"I miss you," I said.

"Honestly?"

"Yes. But you're coming home tomorrow."

"Yes," she said. "How's it going with Geir, anyway? What are you doing? Sitting around talking?"

"Basically."

"What about?"

"All sorts. My uncle, mostly."

"Any more e-mails?"

"Yes. A long one. He's threatening to take me to court. He says he can prove I'm lying. I don't really know what to do about it. I have no idea whether he's right or not. If I've exaggerated things, I mean."

"But it's a novel, Karl Ove."

"Yes, but the whole point is it's meant to be true."

"Who says you have to have seen things the same way?"

"That's not the issue. It's the facts that matter. But it goes a lot deeper than that. It doesn't make sense otherwise. It feels like I've gone to hell. I can't explain it. It's just hell. And then I start getting scared about all the other people I've written about. You, for instance."

"There's no need to worry about me. You've nothing to fear there."

"You don't know that."

"Yes, I do. At least, I think I know pretty much what you think about me, and about us. Not everything, of course, and not in detail, but more or less."

"What if it's worse?"

"I can deal with it. As long as it's true."

"I hope you're right. But there's your mother as well."

"She'll be fine."

"Are you sure?"

"Yes. She'll cope. I know she will."

I got up and opened the balcony door, leaving it slightly ajar. Fresh, cool air tumbled into the room. The rain was beating down, pelting against the wooden decking.

"Are you outside now?"

"No, just at the door in the bedroom. How's the weather where you are?"

"Nice. Blue skies. We've been swimming all day. I've been lying in the shade reading."

"Sounds great."

"But I miss you all."

"It's funny," I said, "but when you're not here they always seem to behave a bit better. I mean, they don't pester in the same way, or fight like they usually do. At the same time, they're not quite as much at ease. I'm sure of it. They stick it out with me, in a way, they know what rules apply and abide by them, but what you have is what they miss. It doesn't matter how nice and amenable I am, or how strict and distant. It's not the same kind of intimacy."

"Is it so bad?"

"No. It's strange, that's all. They hold something back. Not John, of course, but the girls do. It's my role, and I think it has to be like that, but I get something different back from them than what you do. Something less."

"Sometimes I wish they were like that with me. They're all over me when we're together. It's like they have to be right up close all the time. Pestering and going on. You can actually sit and read the paper when you're with them. I can't do that. They crawl all over me if I try."

"You need to set a limit."

"When I'm on a high, it's fine. When I'm down, it can be unbearable."

"I know. I live here too."

"Anyway, let's not talk about it. Are they asleep now?"

"Yes. I said before. Apart from Vanja."

"That's right, you did."

"Do you want a word with her?"

"No, not when she needs to go to sleep."

"What time will you be back tomorrow, anyway?"

"Sometime in the afternoon. Three or four-ish, I think."

"Christina will be here by then. I was thinking prawns. Is that all right? And white wine?"

"Yes, fine."

"See you tomorrow, then."

"Yes, see you tomorrow. I love you."

"Love you," I said, then hung up, closed the balcony door, and sank back onto the bed with the phone still in my hand.

All I wanted now was to be in the midst of my family, to live my life there, and so strong was that desire that it filled me with impatience, as if it would soon be too late.

I got up again, dropped the phone back in the charger in the hall, went to the bathroom and took a leak, washed my hands, discovered there was no towel on the hook next to the sink, went back into the bedroom and found one in the knee-high pile of clean washing beside the bed, dried my hands on it, and hung it up, before going back out onto the balcony, where Geir had sat down in my chair, and for a few seconds I stood there staring at him, nonplussed.

"Anything the matter?" he asked. "Your beer's on the table."

"No, nothing's the matter," I said, and sat down on the other chair. I was so attached to habit that everything seemed wrong from there. Only by an effort of will was I able to remain seated. It was no big thing, and yet something inside me had to be held down in order for me to stay put.

Lightning flashed in the sky. I counted the seconds until the thunder followed. It wasn't far off.

The sound that came was like a rockfall, an irregular, tumultuous crash that made me look up into the sky as if it could be seen – it was impossible for the instincts to comprehend that such a noise wasn't from something material, but arose on its own.

"Cheerful as ever," said Geir.

"Are you criticizing me too now?" I responded.

He laughed.

"No, that's right, I forgot. I came all this way to comfort you and cheer you up, didn't I?"

"You make me sound like a seven-year-old."

"It wouldn't be far off. I've never seen you so out of yourself. You're in shreds, man. And all because your uncle's angry at you. It's beyond me. I've never cared one way or another if anyone wanted to be angry at me. That's up to them. You're taking it pretty badly, I must say."

"It's not just that long nose of yours that makes you look like an elephant. It's the thick hide you've got as well."

He laughed. I lit a smoke. It helped, him being there.

"In the nineties there was some trouble with elephants in South Africa," I said. "Whether there were too many of them or whatever, I don't know, but anyway the authorities set up this program. They shot all the adult elephants, captured the young ones, and moved them to a different part of the country. Those elephants are adult now. And they're deeply traumatized. They're aggressive, hostile to humans, and antisocial. They've got all the symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder. The point is they're sensitive. They saw their parents killed, and elephants always react when one of the herd dies, they become beside themselves with grief, circling the place where the dead elephant lies or lay for days on end. They're very social animals. So with seeing what happened and then being moved to a different area, the young elephants freaked out. They're not well. They're angry and destructive."

"So what are you trying to say? That I'm sensitive even though I'm thick-skinned, or that a traumatic childhood will always leave its mark, whether you're an elephant or a Tromøy goat?"

"Neither. It just came to mind, that's all. It made an impression on me. And I thought it might interest you, having written about PTSD and all."

"It's a bit gushy for my taste. And I'm not that sure whether elephants suffering from it too adds or subtracts."

"Adds. It becomes universal."

"It limits our scope as well though, doesn't it? If elephants can be traumatized, then trees can too. There they are, all depressed in the forest after that nice little fellow alongside got chopped down on Christmas Eve. On the other hand, what's to say we can't just care less? As Nietzsche says, empathy merely increases the amount of suffering in the world. Instead of just one, there's two."

"He was a hard case. But all told probably the nineteenth century's most sensitive man."

I took a swig of the watery beer. The can was cold against the skin of my fingers. Its metal yielded with a snap when I tightened my grip. I put it down on the table, lit another cigarette with the stub of the first, leaned back in the chair, and let out a sigh.

"Another one of your east-European sighs," said Geir.

"I got an e-mail from Jan Vidar," I said.

"Yeah?"

"He had no issues about being in the book."

"I never thought he would."

"No. It made me feel happy."

"But it doesn't help?"

"Of course it helps. It doesn't change anything for Gunnar, not by a long shot. But at least he didn't say anything about being unreliable. Neither did Yngve actually, come to think of it."

"That's not what it's about, you can see that, surely? He just doesn't want you writing about your dad, period. He must have had it in for you for years. You and your mom. The way he made out in that one e-mail that it was like a sociological demonstration of the sum conflicts between town and country, urban and agrarian, bourgeoisie and peasantry, rich and poor. The Hatløys unworthy of the Knausgaards. Ha ha ha! Who ever heard of Hatløy and Knausgaard? Who knew there was any difference? It's Olsen and Fredriksen. Only not for Olsen, because Olsen's Olsen, and Fredriksen's something else altogether!"

"That's just it. Every family has its own story, and even if everyone else has too, it's still theirs. What I've done is make ours public. Now everyone's going to be able to read about it, and it won't be just the family's anymore then. I'm giving it all away. And it's not mine to give. That's the crux, I suppose."

"It is. But it's hardly against the law, is it?"

"Legally, you mean?"

"What else?"

"I don't know. Libel is, but then they've got to prove that what's written is incorrect. That's what Gunnar says he can do. If he can, and the court upholds that, I'll be found guilty. Otherwise it's all down to invasion of privacy, as far as I understand it. But privacy can be invaded even if what's written is true. Then it would have to be weighed up against freedom of speech and so-called artistic expression. Dad and Grandma are dead too. That's probably a part of it as well. In which case he's offended on behalf of the dead."

"Think of it. You're calling witnesses. He's calling witnesses. The whole damn book's going to have to be read out loud. The proceedings are going to take weeks. The papers will be writing about it every day. You'll become a millionaire out of this, Karl Ove. The book's going to be selling like hotcakes."

"How come what I see as absolute hell on earth, the worst thing imaginable, can sound so appealing when you talk about it?"

"I wouldn't know. Maybe it's my healthy, unsentimental outlook on life?"

"But what if he really can demonstrate that what I've written isn't true? What if I really am found guilty?"

"All the better! Everyone wants to read a book full of lies about real people!"

"Come on, be serious for a minute. It is actually serious."

"Certainly! But OK. What do you want me to say? Bad boy! Boo-hoo! Bad man! Come on. We've got the legal aspect. That's a gray zone. You might be found guilty, you might not. It's all relative. Then we've got the human side. That's where you're suffering. Your uncle's taken your father's place, and you're scared of him. It's all to do with you, your childhood, and your psychological makeup, not the novel. You've got to keep the two things apart. I'd say your anxiety here is verging on the pathological. In a way, you're a wreck. No offense! But that's how I see it. You write about all this, and it's got to come from somewhere. You look at your mom's family. You look at your dad's family. You try to understand. There's nothing wrong with that. You shouldn't believe there is. It's not wrong. It may feel like hell now, but that's a different matter. That's basically how I look at it."

"You can look at it like that. But as soon as doing what you have a right to do starts to affect others, it all changes."

"You are going to publish this book, aren't you?"

"Yes."

"Then there's nothing more to be said. You've made up your mind. Made your decision. It's going to affect others. So what? Did you kill someone? Did you assault someone? Did you steal from someone? Did you write anything bad about them? No. You've written very kindly about Gunnar. You've got to try to see things in their actual proportions. Gunnar's not your dad. You're not a child."

"No."

"End of story. Comfort and support enough for one day. How about another beer?"

"All right."

He got up and went past me, his face pale in the dim light of the storm. The raindrops were smaller now, they fell in curtains outside the balcony and over the city. To incur the wrath of another person was bad enough in itself, but nothing compared to my no longer knowing what had actually occurred. What was actually true. I couldn't rely on myself and my own recollections, they were infected by the writing. I knew that from earlier, that writing about a recollection changed it, all of a sudden you no longer knew what belonged to the recollection and what belonged to the writing. I didn't know what was true. In order to find out what was, I had to rely on external factors. Which was to say what others had seen and could recall.

There was a tremendous crash as the sky cracked above my head.

What the hell was that?

I jumped to my feet and went inside, my heart beating like a frightened animal's. I'd never heard thunder that loud in my life. The lightning must have struck right where we were.

Geir was at the window looking out. Njaal lay fast asleep on the bed by the wall.

"Did you see that?" Geir said, astonished. "The hotel took a direct hit."

"No, I didn't. But I heard it."

"Thunder and lightning at exactly the same moment."

"Daddy!" cried a voice from the children's room. I went in. Vanja and Heidi were sitting up in their beds. Heidi was crying. John was asleep on his side, his mouth pressed open against his arm. His hair was damp with sweat.

"I'm scared," said Vanja.

"Me too," said Heidi.

"It's all right, nothing's going to happen, little loves."

"I don't want to sleep on my own," said Vanja.

"But Heidi and John are here," I said.

"It's not the same," she said. "I want to sleep with you."

"Me too," said Heidi.

I looked at them for a moment.

"All right, then," I said. "Come on."

Heidi held her arms out and I lifted her down from the bunk bed. They scuttled out into the hall. By the time I came after them into the bedroom they were already tucked under the duvet.

"We don't want to be on our own," said Vanja.

"Is it going to thunder again?" said Heidi.

"It might," I said. "But it's not dangerous. And I'll be coming to bed as well soon. OK? Do you think you'll be all right on your own for a few minutes?"

They nodded.

"But the door has to be open!" said Vanja.

"Of course," I said. "Night night."

I went back out into the living room. It was empty. But the door onto the balcony was open, so I stepped outside.

"Everything all right?" he asked from my chair.

"I think so," I said, sitting down in the other one. "But I think I'll be off to bed in a minute. John's probably going to be up at five. And if I don't get my sleep, everything's bound to go off the rails. But stay up and have a drink, by all means."

"Very generous of you," he said.

"The Elephant Man sat on his own a lot," I said.

"Didn't he wear a paper bag over his head?"

"No, no. A paper hat. He had a whistle as well. Here comes the Elephant Man! he'd shout, and blow his whistle when he was out for a walk. It was never a dull moment with him."

"You'd better get off to bed. You clearly need a rest."

"You're right," I said, getting to my feet. "Have you got everything you need? Sheets, bedding?"

"All sorted."

"Goodnight, then. Sleep as long as you want in the morning, no need to get up with us."

"Will do. Goodnight."

I went inside, paused in the doorway of the kitchen for a second, decided to leave the dishes until the morning, disconnected the phone, and went into the dim light of the bedroom, where Vanja and Heidi lay with eyes closed, their breathing regular and heavy, like two little animals. Vanja was lying crosswise. I lifted her up and laid her down straight, side by side with Heidi. She didn't stir. I got undressed and lay down next to them. How small they are, I thought to myself, staring at them for a moment before closing my eyes and drifting into sleep, the night inside us that seems so vast and boundless when we are within it yet can never be greater than ourselves.

A few minutes after five thirty John was standing by the side of the bed shouting at me to wake up. I put on my clothes from the day before and took him into the kitchen. Outside, the sun was coming up over the horizon. Its rays were sharp and penetrated the room. Everything became visible in its light, the bits of food on the floor, the trail of coffee stains that ran from the counter on the right to the sink on the other side, the globules of fat that specked the surface of the sausage water in the saucepan, the two bloated sausages that lay at the bottom, split open, the two empty milk cartons next to it, the open packet of margarine, so soft it was almost a fluid, its yellow color much deeper now than when it had been taken from the fridge. The Wetex cloth, stiff as a shell when dry, draped over the lip of metal that separated the twin bowls of the sink, like some odd fitting that was a part of it, originally white, now a grimy gray. The glasses and cups, plates, and bowls that were piled up in the sink, spilling out over the stainless-steel draining board like some encroaching plant of glass and crockery. The two empty jars of pasta sauce left unrinsed behind the tap, insides red with what remained of their contents. The transparent plastic cheese wrapper, which to a distracted eye made it look like the label with the logo on it hung in midair above the chopping board that had been pushed back against the wall. The beetroot juice the wood had absorbed. The withered plants in the window, dead for months, so much a fixture now that no one thought of throwing them out anymore. The table, with its glasses and plates, the jug of water with its tiny bubbles, the dried-up crumbs and other detritus that pointed to where the children sat, the empty bags of fruit that lay dumped, like little hangars of plastic among the drawings and drawing pads, crayons and felt pens, not to mention the two shelves on the wall next to the window, swelling like some coral reef with objects the children had collected and kept over the past couple of years, from sweet dispensers in the shape of princesses or Disney figures, little boxes full of beads, bead boards, sticks of glue, toy cars, and watercolors, to oddments of jigsaw puzzles, bits of Playmobil, letters and bills, dolls, and some marbles with little dolphins inside that Vanja had wanted when we were in Venice the previous summer. The shelves were a kind of station; once something was put there it was out of circulation and stayed there. We had a number of such places where the lives of objects came to a sudden end, most notably the long counter in the hall, presumably once used as a kind of sideboard for serving food before it was taken into the dining room, since it had those kinds of cupboards above and below, which were now crammed with all manner of stuff we must once have thought we needed but no longer knew we had, some three cubic meters of discarded lamps, used and unused lightbulbs, candles, piles of printer paper, rolls of undeveloped film, heaps of photographs, loose as well as collected in the little yellow folders in which they had been delivered, cookery books, assorted children's clothing, woolen tights from winter, odd socks, odd gloves, a pink Hello Kitty rain hat, a number of T-shirts, most likely outgrown, a hoodie, a thick sweater, napkins bought in abundance from IKEA, flowerpots, cables from old computers, extension cords, ballpoints and lighters, old paperbacks, washed but unironed tablecloths, invitations and advertising brochures, glossy weeklies, unused sparklers, a collapsed rice-paper lamp shade, the children's birthday train with wagons with numbers on them in which you could put little candles, balloons and whistles, bits of their wooden train set, including a station building and a locomotive, drawing pads, DVDs, CDs, tea towels – all in all a mountain of stuff that from time to time sent Linda into panic mode, the sudden feeling of utter chaos it could bring about would be too much for her. Not infrequently she came home with organizers and storage boxes to help her get on top of things; different boxes for different objects, a shelf for my mail, another for hers, with our names on them, like other people had, people who were tidier than us, but these systems would collapse after only a few days and everything would be chaotic again. It could get on my nerves too, and about once every six months or so I went through the lot, sorting and tossing, whittling down these bulging piles, only for them to swell again within weeks. It was as if they were alive, drawing objects toward them and consuming them, growing bigger and stronger all the time.

Happily, the children didn't seem to be bothered. Conceptions of inner and outer chaos were not yet relevant to them, they approached the world as an unproblematic place most of the time, which was probably right, I thought to myself now. The material world was neutral, we wove our inner psychological landscapes into it, coloring it with our conceptions until it couldn't help but be messy. But it was a practical issue, nothing to do with morals. We weren't bad people for being messy. Our messiness was not a sign of poor moral fabric. I could tell myself this, but it didn't help, the feelings it stirred in me were too strong; as I moved around in all our mess it was as if it were accusing me, accusing us, we were bad people, unfit to be parents.

"What do you say, John, do you think I should clean things up a bit while you're having your breakfast?"

He looked up at me and nodded. I let the blinds down, lifted him into his chair, gave him his cornflakes and milk, which he seemed happy with, and began emptying the dishwasher.

"Coffee, Daddy," said John.

"Yes, in a minute," I said.

"No, now!" he said, jabbing his spoon in the direction of the coffeemaker.

"All right, then," I said, and switched it on. The shadows from the blinds were slats of darkness on the table, between them the light shone with particular intensity, almost scintillating, so strongly that the shadows had no definite boundaries but were as if diluted by the light at their edges.

John kept looking at the coffeemaker then back at me as I finished emptying the dishwasher and began rinsing the plates and glasses, cups and saucepans, before loading it again and switching it on.

There was a patter of bare feet against the linoleum in the hall. Heidi appeared in the doorway and blinked at us with bleary eyes.

"Hi, Heidi," I said. "Did you sleep well?"

She shook her head as she came in and sat down on her chair. Her hair was sticking up, her face streaked, as if it had yet to regain its elasticity after the inactivity of night.

I put a bowl and spoon out in front of her, the box of cornflakes and the carton of milk. I got myself a cup, poured the now brewed coffee into a thermos and took it out with me onto the balcony, where I sat down with a smoke, leaving the door half open so I'd know if anything happened inside. Gazing out over the kilometers of rooftops I remembered I'd had a dream. I'd been sitting in the same place. The sky had been black and crisscrossed by planes. Some had been very close, great jumbo jets with every detail of their fuselages plain to see, others merely lights passing beneath the stars. The feeling it had given me had been intense and fantastic. Fantastic, fantastic it had been, and then I'd woken up.

I leaned back and put my feet up on the railing. The sun, bright and blazing, had warmed up the air around me considerably, and its rays burned against my face, sparkling in the window, the tabletop, and the shiny metal of the thermos.

Low-flying planes sweeping between tall buildings, sometimes skyscrapers, sometimes ordinary towers, were something I dreamed about recurringly, perhaps two or three times a year. Sometimes I was on board myself, other times I looked at them from a distance. Even in the dream I found myself marveling at how beautiful and unreal they were. Occasionally, I saw great plane disasters too, entire scenes in which they came hurtling from the skies to crash into a building or a street, exploding into flame. For that reason, the attack on the World Trade Center in 2001 was like watching a dream to me. All the elements were there. The skyscrapers, the great shining airplanes, the impact, the flames. But while these dreams were oddly concentrated, always centered on some single point around which all my feelings in some way seemed to be gathered, the true-life event was quite differently open and expansive, and I felt I could both remove myself from it and connect with it.

The job of the terrorists was to penetrate into our subconscious. This had always been the aim of writers, but the terrorists took it a step further. They were the writers of our age. Don DeLillo said this many years before 9/11. The images they created spread around the globe, colonizing our subconscious minds. The tangible outcome of the attack, the numbers of dead and injured, the material destruction, meant nothing. It was the images that were important. The more iconic the images they managed to create, the more successful their actions. The attack on the World Trade Center was the most successful of all time. There weren't that many dead, only a couple of thousand, as against the six hundred thousand who died in the first two days of the Battle of Flanders in the autumn of 1914, yet the images were so iconic and powerful that the effect on us was just as devastating, perhaps more so, since we lived in a culture of images.

Planes and skyscrapers. Icarus and Babel.

They wanted into our dreams. Everyone did. Our inner beings were the final market. Once they were conquered, we would be sold.

I took another slurp of coffee, wiped my mouth with the back of my hand, stood up, pressed an index finger against one nostril, and with a swift, forceful exhalation expelled a glob of mucus from the other out over the balcony.

"You do your morning ablutions al fresco, I see," said Geir. He was standing in the open doorway watching me. "Lovely!"

"I'm glad you appreciate it," I said, and sat down again. "I did that on a beach in Greece once when I was nineteen. There was an American girl lying there sunbathing, she turned to her friend and said, Did you see that? How disgusting!"

"She wasn't far off the mark, if you ask me," he said. "Is there any coffee around?" His voice was rusty, it had been idle all night.

"Sure," I said. "Cups are in the cupboard in the kitchen. Coffee in the thermos here."

I was about to go in and check on Heidi and John, and I would have to get Vanja up at some point as well, but I stayed put, thinking it would be rude to leave him on his own just as he'd come out to chat. I shoved the thermos across the table, stubbed my cigarette out on the side of the upturned flowerpot, whose terra-cotta red was almost obliterated by a blackness of soot and ash, like the wall of a fire-ravaged house, then dropped the end into the little hole in the top. But I hadn't done it properly, smoke began to curl up into the air. I reckoned it would burn out on its own, and lit another as Geir came out and sat down.

"Are they all right in there?" I said.

"Think so," he replied. Blinking up at the bright sun, he unscrewed the lid of the thermos, removed it, and poured himself a cup of coffee.

"You don't need to take the lid off every time," I said. "All you have to do is unscrew it a bit."

"Engineer all of a sudden, are we?" he said, leaning back and putting the cup to his lips.

"I'm an engineer of the soul," I said.

"That's the smuggest thing I've heard anyone say in ages," he said, and closed his eyes completely after taking a slurp. He opened them again and looked at me as he put his cup down on the table. "I'd say garbageman of the soul would be more accurate."

"Refuse disposal officer, if you don't mind," I said. "You know they call the garbage room in the basement here the Milieu Room, don't you? That makes 'milieu manager of the soul' the most correct title."

"Milieu consultant of the soul."

"That's it."

"Your ashtray's on fire, in case you hadn't noticed," he said.

"So I see," I said. "I was hoping it was going to put itself out. Doesn't look like it though."

I lifted the flowerpot up, and all the cigarette butts that had been crammed inside its thick earthenware walls tumbled out into the saucer. A couple of them were still burning and I stubbed them hard before trying to put the pot back on top. The sheer number of cigarette butts meant I couldn't get it to stand level, even when I tried grinding it into place. Eventually, I lifted it up again, swept the cigarette butts into a pile with my hand, and put one edge of the pot down on the saucer, flicked the cigarette butts that had already fallen down again back into place, and was finally able to put it back like it had been before.

"Looks like it's going to be a nice day," said Geir. "What should we do? Any suggestions?"

"We could go somewhere, I suppose," I said. "After I've taken the kids to the nursery."

"Sounds good. Not to a beach, though. I hate that."

"A town, then? Lund? Trelleborg?"

"Lund. I've always wanted to go to Lund."

"Lund it is, then."

I got to my feet and stubbed the half-smoked cigarette against the side of the ashtray.

"Let me get them dressed and ready."

When I went inside and into the hall, Heidi was standing on the little kids' chair in front of the cupboard, rummaging through the top shelves. She was the only one of the three who chose what she wanted to wear. Now it was the blue top with the white flowers that she was after, and a denim skirt, apparently, with a pair of pink Hello Kitty tights.

"That'll look nice," I told her as she climbed down and put her arms through the holes of the sleeveless top.

"Take the chair back into your room when you're finished," I said, and cast a glance into the kitchen, where Njaal was sitting without a shirt on, his legs dangling in the air as he ate his cornflakes, Geir leaned against the counter watching him, arms folded against his chest. I went into the living room, where John was sittting on the sofa dropping a buzzing locomotive onto the cushion next to him, picking it up, dropping it again.

"Time to get dressed," I said. "Stay there and I'll get you some clothes."

I found a yellow T-shirt with a red ladybug on it in the cupboard, and a pair of green pirate-style trousers with a drawstring at the waist, took a clean diaper from the bathroom, where I also wet a facecloth with warm water and rubbed some soap into it, washing him as he stood with legs apart on the floor in front of me to get rid of the faint, yet pungent, salty odor of urine left by his diaper. It was a smell that stigmatized, belonging to children whose parents were less than rigorous with hygiene. Once it was done, I went out and dropped the used diaper into the bin under the sink, took a towel back in with me, dried him, put his clean diaper on, and his clothes, and straightened his hair with my hand.

"There you go!"

"Socks!" he said.

"You can put your sandals on today, the weather's nice. You don't need socks."

"I want socks!"

I went into their room and rummaged around for two matching socks in the drawer. There must have been forty socks or more, and amazingly no two seemed to be alike. I took them all out and dumped them on Heidi's bunk, laying them out as if on a shop counter to be sold, and began sorting through them systematically. Yellow, green, blue, red, pink, purple, turqoise, brown, white, black, gray, orange, and every shade in between. Striped, spotty, patterned. Some with cars on them, others with rabbits or dogs or cats. But all were different. I had to go into the bedroom and rummage through the pile of laundry on the floor. Socks were always at the bottom, they percolated down through the layers, as if consciously seeking the ground, and after finding five I took them back into the children's room to see if they matched up with any of those I'd laid out. Luck was on my side. I now had a single pair of purple socks. While they were slightly on the feminine side for John in my view, I took them into the living room with me and put them on his outstretched feet.

I found a dark red sweatshirt with long sleeves and a unicorn with long hair and big eyes on the front, and a pair of thin, mint-green cotton pants, and took them into the bedroom, where Vanja was still asleep, the duvet kicked aside. Her spine was visible, a faint rise under the skin of her slightly hunched back, from whose upper part the shoulder blades curved away on each side of the fair hair that veiled her head and neck so finely and was such a radically different material to the skin. The hair was to the body rather like the petals were to the stalk of a flower.

I lifted her onto my lap. Her skin was so warm, the way it is only after a night's sleep. I held her tight with my arms, opened the neck of the sweatshirt with my hands and put her head through. She put her hands into the sleeves herself and wriggled them into place, then pulled the bunched-up garment down over her belly. I put her feet into the trouser legs, first one, then the other, and inched the trousers up to her hips, then she arched her back, I gripped the waistband and pulled them up over her bottom.

"There we are," I said. "Do you want a macka to take with you and eat on the way?"

She shook her head.

"A nectarine," she said.

"But we haven't got any," I said. "An apple."

"OK," she said.

I followed her through the hallway. The whole of one wall was built-in cupboards, whose light-brown color and fittings harked back to the fifties. Some were so full that clothes and shoes fell out if you opened them. Baggy coveralls, ankle-length boots, thick sweaters, everything from winter was here, as well as all the other stuff we didn't need on a daily basis. Behind the jackets and coats on their hangers under the hat shelf there were hooks in the wall where we hung all the backpacks and tote bags that over the years had accumulated to such an extent that they no longer really hung there at all, but were more like a growth. In the children's smooth backpacks were sandwich boxes whose contents, when we forgot to empty them, molded away, and the thought of their organic matter following the laws of the organic while buried among layers of synthetic materials, independently, without being in contact with any like matter, was something that fascinated me, at least after the box had been discovered, its contents thrown out and its plastic surfaces scrupulously cleaned. All over the floor, though mainly up against the wall, under the row of cupboards on the one side, the mirror and a long white bench on the other, were toys and dolls, scattered like debris from a plane crash. Normally I tidied up and did the cleaning if we were having visitors, but this time it was only Geir and I hadn't bothered. Besides, I'd been too worried. But today Linda would be back, and Christina was coming too, so there were no two ways about it. It would have to be done after I took the kids to the nursery, I told myself, following Vanja into the kitchen. The sun had moved upward and across the room in the short time we'd been awake, and its light no longer shone horizontally into the kitchen, but slanted down onto the wall where the counter and the dishwasher were. Vanja went to the cupboard and opened it, took one of the big red apples from the plastic bowl we kept our fruit in, and handed it to me.

It was a Red Delicious, most likely genetically modified, for the white flesh never went brown in the air the way the apples of my childhood always did, and they never seemed to rot, either. It was scary and went radically against all my conceptions of right and wrong. The fact that I still bought them was because Red Delicious had been such a luxurious apple when I was growing up, something special that we normally only ever had at Christmas, when they nestled, shiny and red and magical, in the fruit bowl, simultaneously hard, crisp, and succulent, the way no other apples were.

"What are you giving it to me for?" I said.

"The label," she said, putting her finger on the little sticker with the fruit company's logo on it, a little red-and-black ladybug on a white background.

I took the apple in my hand and scratched at the label with my fingernail, but it was so short it wouldn't catch, and I had to press through the skin of the apple in order to remove it.

"You ruined it!" Vanja said as I handed it back to her. "I want a new one!"

"Well, you can't have one!"

My reaction was so firm she gave up at once, put the apple down on the table, and marched off. I followed her. When she went into their own room, I went into the living room, where Heidi was sitting on the sofa drawing, John was sprawled on his back with his feet up, gazing at the ceiling, and Njaal was crouched on the floor putting Brio train tracks together. I sensed Geir was in the other room and went over to the sliding door and looked in. He was standing in front of the bookshelf with a book open in his hands.

"What have you got there?" I said.

"A book about Joyce," he said, holding it up so I could see the cover.

"Oh, that," I said. "Someone who knew Joyce in Trieste. A ship's captain, I think. Not literary at all, as far as I remember. They became friends and he wrote a book about him years after."

I turned toward Heidi.

"Time we were off," I said. "Go and put your sandals on."

"Is Njaal coming?" she asked.

I shook my head.

"Njaal's on holiday. Aren't you, Njaal?"

He didn't answer, his brown eyes looked at me nonplussed.

Heidi got down. I followed her out into the hall, brushed her teeth, then Vanja's and John's, said goodbye to Njaal and Geir, and went out onto the landing, not unnoticed by the neighbors, I imagined, for the children's noise levels were always in the upper reaches whenever we were on our way in or out, and the sound they made ricocheted off the walls and down through the floors. I had often heard them on the sixth floor while standing waiting for the elevator at street level.

That'll be the Norwegian's family setting off, I imagined them thinking. They're running late today. Or else, That damned Norwegian and his kids again.

Arriving at the nursery, Vanja keyed in the code, I opened the gate. The children already there were out on their trikes, the staff were sittting about on the benches. Heidi clung to me, her arms around my legs.

"I've got to go now. Mommy's picking you up today."

"Is Mommy coming home?" said Heidi.

I nodded.

"And it's Friday today. You can all have ice cream."

I lifted my hand and gave the staff a wave, pressed the door opener, opened the gate, and went back the same way we came.

It was hot in the sun, but in the patches of shade I passed through the air was cool and had a dampness about it, as if the autumn had come too early and decided to wait there so as not to disturb the grandness of summer, master of all seasons.

I veered right into Hemköp and went in through the doors that automatically slid aside, grabbed a basket before going through the two barriers that likewise opened automatically, glanced up at the monitor above the fruit display, and saw my image looking up and to the right, something Heidi and Vanja had yet to understand, for how could they be looking to the side when they were staring straight at the screen? Vanja and Heidi would sometimes do a little dance there on the supermarket floor, while John waved to himself from the trolley, we were like a traveling circus with dwarfs. I put some tomatoes in one of the plastic bags that weren't entirely transparent but grayly translucent as if they were full of smoke. The tomatoes were from the Netherlands and still attached to their little green vine stems, in contrast to the Swedish ones next to them, which lay packed together, red and shining, with neither vine nor stalks, presumably the reason why they cost five kronor more per kilo. After putting the bag of tomatoes in the basket, I picked up a shrink-wrapped cucumber and placed it next to them, then went over to the cheese display and tried to decide between a Danish Gouda, which was cheap, a Swedish Grevé, which Linda preferred, and a Norwegian Norvegia, which tasted much the same as the Grevé but cost almost twice as much. We had guests, I told myself, we could save money another day. Besides, the advance on the novel would be paid soon. What difference did forty kronor make?

With the Norvegia cheese in the basket, I went on to the bread. The bakery was one of the supermarket's biggest sections, I guessed they had somewhere between fifty and seventy different kinds of bread, maybe more, all arranged on displays that stood like islands in the middle of the floor. In Sweden bread came sliced and wrapped in plastic. That way it had a long life, but was always soft and lacking both crispness and the very particular good taste of fresh bread. Here, though, they also had a shelf of fresh-baked loaves, mostly with names evoking a simpler, more natural life, words like rustic, country, or farmer's were splashed all over them, and they emphasized the grain varieties too, unlike the sliced breads wrapped in plastic, which were more inclined to words such as sport, energy, and health. When I was growing up, in an age that to my children would one day appear as remote as the 1950s of my own parents had to me, bread came in paper bags, and its consistency and taste changed from day to day, from the delicious freshness of the first evening, when the crust was still crisp and the crumbs soft and moist, until the last hard crust was devoured two or three days later, with all possible degrees of taste and consistency in between. I remember many other families put their bread in a plastic bag as soon as they brought it home, which kept it moist a lot longer, but the crust would lose its crispness. We kept ours in a paper bag, meaning the crust stayed crisp, whereas the moisture disappeared. There weren't nearly as many different kinds of bread back then, I could think of only five off the top of my head: Kneippbrød, grovbrød, wittenberg, loff, and one that was introduced when I was maybe eight or nine, grahambrød. That was it.

I had become a man of yesteryear, and it had happened fast, I thought to myself, and turned to the shelves of fresh-baked bread. They had seven rolls for ten kronor, so I took one of the paper bags meant for loaves and put seven rolls inside, scrunched the top end together and dropped it in the basket, then moved on to the milk and dairy, grabbing a packet of coffee and a one-and-a-half-liter Pepsi Max on the way.

I also remembered the supermarket where we used to buy our bread. I remembered what it looked like outside, and what it looked like inside. I remembered when it was built, the enormous flat expanse of concrete they laid next to the road only a few hundred meters from our house, and the shop that rose up bit by bit on top of it, with its name proudly displayed on the side, like on a boat: B-MAX. To us it was Bemaks, a place on the same footing as other places in the vicinity, like "ubekilen," "the fell," "the main road," "Gjerstadholmen," "the floating jetties," "the bridge." Even after the supermarket changed its name, it was still referred to as Bemaks. It was my first supermarket; before that there was nothing. Not a single recollection of a single shop. I was about five when they built it. God knows where my parents did their shopping before.

Besides Bemaks, we soon had Stoa, the cash-and-carry where we went maybe twice a year to buy in bulk. Ten-kilo sacks of sugar for preserving fruit or making fruit syrup in the autumn, a crate of lemonade for Christmas or the summer holiday, economy bags of flour, that kind of thing. Dad was fond of it, I think, he liked shopping for food, not in the local shop, where people would recognize him and where it was only ever the day-to-day items we tended to buy, he left that to me or Yngve or Mom, but in the bigger supermarkets outside the center, where you bought in bulk, he liked that. I think he liked the idea of throwing his money around on those occasions, the big man about town, that must have been it. Or maybe it was the opposite he was looking for, the security of gathering provisions, keeping a stock.

I stopped at the dairy section and took a carton of milk; it was for the children, so I chose the one with the highest fat content, 3.5 percent, then moved on and picked up half a dozen eggs the box said came from "cage-free hens indoors," prompting me to scan the other kinds to see if there were any from "mistreated hens crammed together in cages," which didn't seem to be the case, and so I carried on toward the checkout, along the deserted aisles, between the refrigerated counters and the shelves of shampoo, through a small section of "organic sweets," then the glitzy inferno of normal sweets, which took up about the same amount of space as the bread.

But from all the numerous times I'd been to Bemaks, and it was from Bemaks I caught the bus to school, to Bemaks I came running with a shopping list in my hand from Dad at least twice a week through all those years, I had retained only one real memory. It was one time when I was there with Mom. I'd seen a special offer sign saying the yellow boxes of Nesquik, the chocolate milk powder, were down to only one krone. It was so cheap I felt sure Mom could be talked into buying some. Only one krone, only one krone, I kept saying as I dragged her over to where the cardboard sign was. But it says minus one krone, she said. They cost one krone! I insisted. No, she said, it means one krone off. There's a difference. And so I had to do without Nesquik that day. But the memory has stayed with me.

Why would that be? There were myriad things I'd seen and done there, a whole galaxy of events.

I stood in line at the checkout to the left. There were only two people in front of me, both with so few items they held them in their hands, as was often the case at this time of day. In the afternoons the place came alive with customers dragging the new wheelie baskets along behind them. It was one of the saddest sights I knew, all semblance of human dignity evaporated the moment a person went with that of all options. The feeble, characterless action of trundling instead of carrying. The fussy little wheels, the long black handle, the basket that followed on behind like a small dog. The clatter of the wheels was earsplitting from the moment one became aware of it.

The very thought deflated me.

Life was there to be felt, that was what we strove for, but why? For our headstones to say, "Here lies a person who liked to sleep"?

When I opened the front door I found the apartment completely silent. For a moment I wondered if they'd gone out, but then I heard a noise from the children's room and guessed it to be Njaal playing while Geir sat reading somewhere.

"Anyone home?" I called out.

"Ah, there you are," said Geir from the living room.

"I bought some bread rolls if anyone wants some," I said, took my shoes off and put them in the cupboard, picked up the bag and went into the kitchen. The dishwasher was finished, so I dumped the shopping on the table, switched it off, and opened the door, the steam billowing out into my face, making me step back instinctively.

I took the cutting board out and put it on the table, found a bread basket in the cupboard, and tipped the rolls into it. Fresh rolls with lots of butter and yellow cheese, I could hardly think of anything better. But my tastes were simple. The salt of the cheese and the butter against the mild wheat flavor of the bread, and the thin, yet hard, crisp crust that broke into pieces the moment you bit into it was something I'd never grown tired of. So my mouth was watering as I cut into one of the rolls and covered its surface with butter and three thick slices of cheese.

"Njaal wants one too," said Geir, coming to the table.

"Help yourself," I said.

"Don't speak with your mouth full," he replied.

"Have I told you what Vanja's excuse is whenever she does something wrong?" I said.

He shook his head.

"She says it's our fault for not bringing her up properly. And not only that, she says it's too late now."

"She may have a point there," Geir said, angling the knife and scraping it across the surface of the butter, causing it to collect at the blade like a lateral moraine.

"Of course she has. I just hadn't thought it would be so obvious to her, that's all."

Geir spread the butter over his bread, picked up the cheese slicer, and cut off a slice.

"No fingers on the cheese!" I said.

"Seriously?" he said. "You mean there's a rule against it?"

"Isn't there?" I answered. "You're the sociologist."

"Amazing how much I get to be the sociologist here, isn't it?"

"I only mentioned it once yesterday, and once now."

"Well, it's twice too often," he said, taking the two halves of the roll into the living room. I went after him, cramming the last bite into my mouth.

"I was thinking of cleaning up a bit before we go out. If it's OK."

"I'll give you a hand, if you want."

"Great."

Njaal sat with his elbows on the table, bread in hand, looking at me while he ate.

"When will Vanja and Heidi be coming back?" he asked.

"This afternoon. About three o'clock, I imagine."

"And what are we going to do today?" he said, and looked across at his father.

"We're going to Lund," Geir said.

I started picking up all the towels, trousers, tops, and socks that were lying around the living room.

"Can I take my bike?" said Njaal.

"Of course you can," said Geir. He gathered some apple cores together on a plate and stacked some plastic cups. I went into the bathroom and pressed the clothes down into the laundry baskets, which were already full. I straightened up again. Maybe I should check and see if the laundry room was available in the basement?

No, it would only complicate things.

I left the bathroom and picked up the dolls that were scattered around and put them in the dolls' bed in the children's room. One of them had blue marks drawn on its face, they looked like a tribal tattoo, a rather unnerving contrast to its innocent baby features, which made me turn it facedown. I gathered up all the soft toys and dumped them on the end of Heidi's bed; she was so small she only took up a third of its length. Mostly, they were dogs, cats, and rabbits, but there was a lynx too, as well as a panda, a lion, a tiger, a parrot, a crow, a lamb, a cow, an elephant, and a crocodile. I positioned them so they were all looking out into the room, above and below each other, and that was unnerving too, perhaps because there was something accusatory about the combination of staring eyes and silence, or else it was because they looked like dead creatures with faces and eyes that seemed to be watching us from the other side. I picked up the toys strewn about the living-room floor and put them away in the round brown ottoman and the three mesh baskets we used for the purpose, while Geir picked up all the children's books and magazines he could find.

"I want to help," said Njaal.

"You can pick up the toys in the hall and put them . . . I don't know, where should he put them?" Geir said, looking up at me.

"I'll get you a basket," I said, went and got it and put it down on the floor in the hall. But after putting a few odd toys in it, Njaal decided he would rather play with them instead. Geir tousled his hair as he went past with a pair of purple plastic shoes in one hand, I noticed, and I stepped aside to let him through, then emptied the dishwasher in the kitchen; the heat had nearly left the dishes now, but remained in the cutlery.

"It always looks a lot worse than it is," I said to Geir. He was standing in the doorway now, looking like he was about to ask for another job.

"I find the impression of mess and the mess itself to be quite congruent," he said. "But maybe that's because our place is always tidy. I put everything back right away. It never gets a chance to get out of hand."

"I'd like it to be like that here too," I told him. "Only there's always something that prevents it. It just isn't possible, apparently."

"I like it here," he said. "There's something relaxing about messiness."

"As long as it's not your own," I said.

"Exactly," he said. "Christina always says I need some chaos around me in order to get things done. Like the war in Iraq. It doesn't get more chaotic than that. Then I can get to work cleaning it all up."

"That's not a bad theory," I said, closing the cupboard where we kept the glasses and cups, then opening the one next to it where the plates were. "You've got no chaos inside you at all, so you need some outside instead. I'm the opposite, chaos on the inside and a need for tidiness on the outside. Only I fall short on the last part."

"You recreate your chaos, I recreate order. We're as much geometry as we are psychology."

"I know," I said. "Does that mean the living room and hall are OK now?"

"Not quite. I don't know where things go."

"Wherever you think's suitable. As long as it's out of the way."

With all the dishes put away, I filled the dishwasher again with what was left, sprinkled some powder in the little compartment, snapped the cover shut, closed the door, and put it on the sixty-degree program. After that I went into the living room, got the vacuum cleaner from behind the door, pulled out the cord, plugged it into the socket, and switched it on. The bag was full, so there was practically no suction at all, I had to put the nozzle on top of everything that was heavier than dust and hair for it to be sucked up. Beads, crumbs, scraps of paper, the odd fruit pastille, little unidentifiable bits of whatever. A small insect scuttled along the baseboard; in Swedish they were called silverfisk, what the Norwegian was I had no idea and had no recollection of ever having seen one before I moved here, though I couldn't be sure, it sounded wrong that there should be an insect that was only found here. They looked like a little tail with feet, tiny in size, and they lived wherever they could keep themselves hidden; in piles of clothes, underneath mattresses, in the folds of blankets, and in laundry baskets. If I went to the bathroom at night they could be in the middle of the floor, dark against the light-colored linoleum, immediately darting for cover in the nearest place they could find, like behind the baseboard. I squashed the ones I could, but their resources were clearly inexhaustible, since they never at any time seemed to be fewer in number.

Silverfiskarna. A novel by Vilhelm Moberg.

I reached under the sofa with the head of the cleaner, sweeping it back and forth a couple of times, then moved on to underneath the table, which was the area I really wanted to get at, the children had at least one meal a day there. When that was done, I sucked up the dust that had accumulated around the doorsills and behind the doors before switching it off, pulling the plug out, and finally, the highlight of any vacuuming session, pushing the button that made the cord come swishing back at high speed into the belly of the device.

"All done," I called out, returning it to its place.

Geir came out from the children's room.

"Are we finished?"

"It'll have to do. We can always do a bit more when we get home."

"No need. It looks fine as it is. Shall we get going?"

I nodded.

"Just need to check my e-mails first."

Njaal came sneaking up on Geir from behind and walloped him on the backside as hard as he could.

"You little terror," Geir explained. Njaal shrieked with laughter. "I'll get you for that," said Geir, reaching out and grabbing him as I squeezed by into the other hall, past all our beach things, which had been dumped against the wall, a green parasol, two folding chairs, a kind of sunbed, baskets full of beach toys, as well as our two big suitcases, one a hard plastic shell, the other soft and made of some kind of fabric, gray and black respectively, and the two drying frames, folded and leaned up against the wall, with yellow and green towels draped on them from when we were at the beach the previous weekend, and the children's beachwear. The light was dim in the bedroom, the air dense, so I opened the door onto the balcony and left it ajar before sitting down and switching on the computer. I heard them laughing and carrying on while I waited for the computer to start up, stared at the blinds without seeing them, it was Gunnar I was thinking about, and the fact that Linda was coming home and that I had to remember to buy white wine somewhere before we came back.

Right.

I opened my e-mail account.

Gunnar.

Should I wait? I could wait, surely? Wouldn't the day be ruined otherwise?

If I waited, though, I wouldn't be able to think about anything else.

I opened the message and started to read.

He had signed himself as my father's brother.

I sat for a moment without moving.

"Are you coming or what?" Geir called from the hallway.

"Just a minute," I said back, hardly managing to raise my voice so he could hear me. "I've got a new message here."

I heard him approach.

"Didn't hear you," he said.

"Another e-mail," I said.

"Gunnar?"

I nodded.

"Mind if I have a look?"

"Be my guest," I said.

He stood behind me while he read.

"So shall we go now, then?" he said after a while. "You can't let this throw you. There's nothing new in it."

"True. But now he says he's got a lawyer. And he's using the word vendetta."

I got to my feet.

"It's really getting to you, isn't it?" said Geir.

"Yes, it is," I said.

"Come on," he said. "Let's go to Lund."

"I need to speak to Yngve first," I said.

"OK," said Geir, and followed me back out of the bedroom. Njaal had been standing with both hands on the door handle looking in at us. I took the phone out of the charger and pressed Yngve's number as I crossed the floor, opening the door of the balcony before it even started ringing.

"Hello," said Yngve.

"Did you get that e-mail?" I asked.

"Yes," he said. "I'm writing a reply right now."

"A reply?"

"That's right."

"Are you sure that's a good idea?"

"Listen. He's putting forward a whole load of accusations against me. It's completely unreasonable what he's doing. I'm going to tell him so."

"What do you think you're going to achieve by that?"

"I don't know. But I need to tell him now that he's gone too far and it's not going to be without consequences. He can't say whatever he likes just because he's angry. Besides, I'm not you. And nor is Mom."

"I'm really sorry I got you into this mess," I said.

"What you did is the reason he's reacting, but it's not your fault he's taking it out on us. And you can hardly be to blame for his reaction being so completely out of proportion either."

"I'm sorry all the same."

"We lose an uncle, that's all."

I went in and dropped the phone back in the charger, then looked at Geir, who had sat down on the chest, or whatever it was called, that we had in the hallway.

"I just need to read it again," I said.

"No, you don't," he said. "Come on, I don't want to be sitting here all day. You've already read it, for Christ's sake!"

I didn't say anything, but went back in and sat down in front of the screen again.

"Right, we're off!" Geir called out.

"I'm ready now," I called back, switched off the computer, got up, and went into the hall. They were outside on the landing, waiting at the elevator. I put my shoes on, got my sunglasses from the study, then remembered we needed to go out the back way, and went into the kitchen again.

"Now what?" Geir shouted after me. I didn't answer him, lifted the trash bag out of the bin under the sink, tied a knot in the top, picked up the other full bag I'd left up against the wall on top of some newspaper, and went out to the elevator. Njaal, who was wearing a pair of khaki shorts and a white sleeveless top, held his nose as we went down.

The elevator came to a gentle halt in the basement, I held the two trash bags in one hand and opened the door with the other. I rummaged in my pocket for the key, then realized I'd forgotten to lock the door upstairs. But then again, what did we have of any value? Three computers, that was it. The TV was from the eighties, only a very nostalgic thief would want to run off with it.

"Yes?" said Geir.

"Won't be a minute," I said. "Just wait here."

My fingers finally got hold of a key, allowing me to retrieve the bunch from my pocket. I tapped the key card against the panel until the green lamp flashed and there was a click as the door unlocked. My energy was almost gone as I walked the fifteen meters down the passage to the door, after which came the stairs, then another door into the refuse room.

I stopped and placed my palm against the cold wall, wanting to put my face against it as well, and if I'd been on my own I might have. Instead I put my hand, which had already absorbed some of the coldness of the wall, to my forehead. Geir and Njaal stopped in front of the door and stared at me just as I was about to go on.

"Is this it?" Geir asked.

"Yes," I said. "It took me weeks to find my way around down here with all these doors."

"There are four," he said. "How difficult can that be?"

I didn't answer him, opened the door, and went up the stairs.

"You can wait here," I said. "I'm only tossing the garbage out."

The stairs on the other side of the heavy steel door were black and slippery, presumably from the liquid that forms in the bottom of garbage bags, deposited by months, perhaps years, of minor leakages. The smell was pungent and mellow at the same time. Ventilation ducts were suspended from the ceiling, the rest was bare wall. I opened the lid of the nearest garbage container, which was big enough to conceal an entire dismembered family, and slung the bags over the side. I felt sick, my whole body was aching. I couldn't trace it back to anything specific – something in particular that I'd done wrong – it had to do with everything, me in my entirety, and for that reason it couldn't be helped. Even if I did retract the damn book it wouldn't make any difference. Apart from pleasing Gunnar and making him think he'd put me in my place, perhaps even crushed me, and that justice had been done. His demands were justified, his rage was justified, and it was the sheer force of it all I was unable to withstand, it pinned me to the ground, took me apart, rendering me and everything about me worthless. Worthless. Even my own children vanished in his rage, even they lost their worth, for I was the only father they had, a person unable to keep himself in check, whose outline was blurred, so fundamentally lacking in empathy, he could destroy the lives of others without even knowing.

When I came out of the refuse room they were waiting in the light of the open door. Which is to say that Geir was standing there, holding the door open, while Njaal had gone outside into the yard that lay in the deep shadow of the tall building at whose foot he stood. He stared at a small white van that was reversing. Probably deliveries to the back door of the Chinese takeaway; the delivery man would knock on the door as hard as he could with a length of piping left there for the purpose, and if he was lucky one of the people who worked there would come out after a minute or two. Boxes containing canned soft drinks, canned goods, and noodles.

Njaal ran across the yard and out onto the sidewalk, where the light was bright and warm.

"Mind the road!" Geir shouted. "Stay on the sidewalk!"

Njaal sent us a look as if to say he was being underestimated.

"I know!" he shouted back.

"All right," said Geir. "It looked like you didn't, that's all."

He twirled his key strap around his finger.

"Are you going to start whistling now?" I asked.

"What do you mean?" he said.

"Your body language is so cheerful."

"It's a nice day. The sun's out and I'm on my holidays. Of course I'm cheerful! Not even a misery guts like you can alter that."

He started whistling.

Fifteen meters ahead of us, Njaal had stopped next to their car, a red Saab from some time in the nineties, which meant it was anything from ten to twenty years old. I hadn't a clue about cars, and the nineties were like yesterday to me. That twenty years had gone since they started was incomprehensible.

"Ouch!" said Njaal, putting his hand against the bodywork.

"You didn't think of parking in the shade?" I said.

"Like you would have done, you mean?" said Geir.

"If I were as anal as you, yes."

He laughed and unlocked the car, strapping Njaal into the child seat while I got in the front of the boiling-hot vehicle. In front of the three cars in the parking area at the bottom of the cul-de-sac was a tree, its leaves glittering in the sunlight, and on the other side of it lay Föreningsgatan, along which I'd walked a couple of hours earlier with Vanja, Heidi, and John.

Geir got in, shut the door, and put the key in the ignition. I fastened my seat belt, discovering the sunglasses I'd slipped into my pocket. I put them on. They were Polaroids and I'd bought them on the Lido in Venice the previous summer. I liked them, there was something of the seventies about them. Vanja had said I looked like a thief. I liked that too.

Geir pulled his seat belt across his chest and clicked it into place, released the hand brake, threw the car into gear, and pulled slowly away down the road. There was something rash about his driving; not that he drove too fast or took chances, it was more his movements when he was behind the wheel, the abrupt way he looked over his shoulder when changing lanes, the suddenness with which he flicked the indicator, as if only just remembering at the last minute, or the way he kept glancing to all sides on straight stretches of road. Most people I knew drove as if they were at one with the vehicle, as if the instruments and controls were an extension of their own bodies, but Geir drove like he was operating some unfamiliar machine.

"Which way?" he said.

"I'm not sure," I said. "I usually just go straight on until there's a sign out of Malmö. It tends to work OK; the motorways take you out of town, and they all connect up in one way or another."

"You don't say," he said. "Well, I like to know which way I'm going. Still, render unto Caesar the things which be Caesar's."

"I'll render you in a minute," I said.

"I refuse to laugh. Not even a smile for that."

We passed the Konserthuset, following the wide, avenue-like road in the direction of Värnhemstorget, a ribbon of glittering cars reflecting the sunlight from their various parts, a wing here, a windshield there, a bumper or a door handle.

Geir pressed a button on the inside of his door and my window slid down. The wind rushed in as if through a funnel.

"You've got the technology, I see," I said. "What year's this thing from, anyway?"

"Two thousand one."

"Two thousand one? I reckoned it was from the nineties. You mean it's only eight years old?"

He nodded. I looked up at the signs above the roadway.

"The highways are that way," I said. "Any will do, it doesn't matter."

"Gothenburg or Stockholm or Ystad or Copenhagen or Trelleborg?"

"Take your pick. The worst that can happen is we end up having to go back."

He sighed.

"Go with Gothenburg, then, if it means that much," I said.

"I will, then."

We approached the big junction where four different roads converged, all multilane. I glanced at the faces in the cars alongside, the way they were all in their own worlds, as if unaware that they were barely half a meter away from other people, separated from them only by a transparent sheet of glass.

The lights changed, the first cars pulled away, and a few seconds later the movement was transmitted to us. Our line of vehicles snaked onto the on-ramp, its members accelerating onto the motorway according to individual preference, soon drawn out over several hundred meters of road. Geir kept to the inside lane, observing the speed limit, meaning that we were continually overtaken as meter upon meter vanished beneath us and the landscape outside changed from the built-up topography of the city, almost devoid of vegetation, to the more open lots of industrial sites and car dealers, fenced off from each other by tall wire mesh.

"What did I tell you?" I said with a nod toward the sign telling us the Lund exit was a kilometer up ahead.

"I never said you couldn't get lucky," said Geir. "How are you doing, Njaal? All right?"

"Yes."

"Shall we have an ice cream when we get to Lund?"

"Yes."

We passed from rural landscape to industrial sites, then residential areas, and eventually found ourselves in the city center, which was markedly smaller than Malmö's; the buildings were lower, the streets narrower, the pace slower. Geir's head was going back and forth between the side windows and the windshield as he scouted around for a place to park, hopefully still keeping an eye on the traffic around us.

"There's a big parking lot in the center, I seem to remember," I said. "If you keep going straight, I'm sure we'll find it."

Instead of doing as I said, he signaled right.

"But it's down there!" I said. "Look, just around that corner!"

"It's no entry. You see that big round sign there?"

"Oh, is that what it means?"

He looked at me.

"You are joking, I take it?"

I shook my head and he burst out laughing.

"I was pretty impressed that you could pass your written exam after only reading up the night before. Now I understand things a bit better."

"I keep telling myself I should brush up a bit on road signs. Only I can't bring myself to do it. I have my license now, don't I?"

"Here we are," he said, and signaled left, turning onto a short ramp that led into a parking area.

After the rush of wind from the road, the air into which we stepped seemed oddly still. It shimmered in the heat above the asphalt, but was otherwise as calm as the waters of a small inlet, and we were beneath the surface, if that was what it was.

One day in the middle of the nineteenth century in one of the villages that line the Vestland fjords, during the hay harvest, the sun shining as it was now, when all the villagers were hard at work in the fields, a disaster occurred. Everyone died, and no one was spared to tell what happened. They were found the next day. A young man who was meant to be working for his uncle that day discovered them. The house was silent when he got there, he went in, his uncle's wife lay dead on the floor of the kitchen, her face twisted almost beyond recognition, her eyes bulging, the blood had run from her ears and nose. He rushed out, up the steep hill, whose grass was only half mown, and there he came upon a group of men who looked like they were resting, only they turned out to be dead too, presumably struck down on the spot, with exactly the same appearance as the wife in the house. Bulging eyes, blood seeping from their orifices.

It was the beginning of a novel. Something had happened, no one knew what, and after a few generations it became just a tale, eventually, in our day, all but forgotten.

But then it happened again. And someone, the novel's protagonist perhaps, stumbled upon the tale and uncovered the connection.

Yes. The unfathomable depths of the fjord beneath its blue-green surface, the green sides of the valley, so exceptionally intense in color, the white-clad tops of the fells under blue, cloudless sky. The grass tickling against moist skin, the steady hum of insects. The scythe that sang as it mowed, the clatter of its metal against the sharpening stone, the feeling of vast silence beneath it all, evoked by the fells and the fjord and the sky together. And then, disaster.

I stood there, staring down the street as Geir opened the trunk, took out Njaal's yellow balance bike and assembled it. The black jeans I was wearing stuck to my skin, and my feet, encased in tight black man-made fiber and the black leather of my shoes, were so hot and slippery with sweat it was like they hardly belonged to my body at all, but were creatures in their own right. Two blotchy red brothers, perspiring stokers of coal.

Njaal got on his bike and gripped the handlebars tightly, feet planted on the ground. The bike was made to look like a lion, with a face painted on at the front and a little tail at the back.

"That's a cool bike you've got there, Njaal," I said.

He was so proud he didn't know where to look.

"Yes," he said eventually.

Then he set off, paddling along, scooting faster and faster across the parking lot. Geir checked to make sure the car door was locked, put his keys in his pocket, and went after him.

"Not too far ahead, Njaal!" he shouted. "And keep to the sidewalk!"

As he reached the curb he stopped abruptly by putting his feet down hard on the ground.

"Impressive technique," I said.

"Yeah, he's really good," said Geir.

"What do you want to do? Are we hungry?"

"Let's see the cathedral first, eh? Then grab some lunch afterward."

"Sounds good."

It was the air that had gone. Sucked up from the earth by some thunderous implosion, first a rumbling in the distance, then louder and louder, the wind picking up as the noise increased, until suddenly, as they stood bewildered and anxious, everything went totally silent. Not a sound was heard. They looked at each other, all was still and they found themselves unable to breathe. They dropped to their knees. Clutched their throats. The blood thumped in their veins. Their stomachs turned. Eyes wide and staring. They fell to the ground, twisting and writhing like worms. And all in silence. The life vanished from them, one by one, and there they lay, motionelsss one and all. Everyone in the fields, everyone in the houses. All the birds, and all the animals. And then, perhaps seven or eight, maybe ten minutes later, the air returned in an earsplitting tumult, as when a dam is opened and the water comes crashing down on the dry riverbed.

But what then?

What would happen then, and why?

Njaal scooted along, now behind us, now in front, as we walked toward the cathedral that rose up so serenely over the rooftops as if it were the most natural thing in the world. All around us people strolled with their shopping bags, and on a square we crossed they were sitting on benches and at café tables, some with bikes parked in front of them, students most probably, while cars rolled sedately by, their tires rumbling gently over the cobbles. There was an ambience of peace and tranquillity about the town, bordering on the slumberous. It was hard to imagine that Malmö was only minutes away by train, life there was so very different. Malmö was a working-class city, built not for the eye or the mind, but for the body, with its long rows of identical brick buildings, its streets a busy turmoil of life and contrasts. Lund was complete, and probably nearly always had been, built up around a small number of more or less permanent structures established by the church and the university, institutions concerned with preservation, whereas Malmö had been built up around production. In Lund it was the town that shaped the people, in Malmö the people that shaped the town. The fact that Bergman's main character in what was perhaps the best of all his films, Wild Strawberries, journeyed to Lund, was surely by no means incidental, for the journey is the journey toward death, and while life may be fluid, death is stable and immutable, and of all places in Sweden Lund would have to be closest to such a state. The people of Lund were of course just as alive as the people of Malmö, and their town just as alive; the difference was between the expected, that which is already established and which people merely populate, and that which is created in the moment. It was a matter of forms and roles.

"The people in your subdivided community have fled from exactly that in Malmö," said Geir as we crossed the area in front of the church. "They've built themselves a little Lund out there. You're right to call it death."

"The average age must be seventy," I said.

"Ugh!" he said. "How the hell you could ever be so stupid as to buy that little dolls' house out there, I'll never know. It's exactly what I've spent my whole life trying to get away from."

"And with so little success," I said.

We stopped and looked up at the church exterior, whose Romanesque weightiness appeared not to strive toward the heavens in the way of the great Gothic churches, appeared not to want anything but this, endeavoring instead to make the best of its own place. The distinction here was not between down and up, but between in and out.

"Fantastic church," said Geir.

"Do you want to go in?"

"Yes. Where's the entrance? This way or that?"

"We went in the other side when we were here," I said.

We walked around the side of the church. Geir turned and called out to Njaal, who was perhaps forty meters behind, scampering along on his yellow lion bike. On the other side was a park. Green trees rose from green grass and stood motionless with their swells of foliage, through which not a breath of wind passed. Njaal came biking past.

Where were the children? Had I forgotten them? Were they at home in the apartment?

No. I'd dropped them off at the nursery.

Or was that yesterday?

No. I was certain of it. We tidied up after I got home. They weren't there then, they were at the nursery.

"There's a door over there," said Geir. "It can't be the main entrance though."

"No, they usually put the main entrance at the front in the olden days," I said.

"Your irony only reflects poorly on yourself," said Geir. "You're the one who's been here before." And then, abruptly: "Njaal!"

"Yes," Njaal shouted back, by now some way farther down the path that led through the park.

"Come here!" Geir called. "We're going inside!"

"OK," said Njaal, and came paddling back toward us. I gazed at the enormous blocks of stone, which had once been light in color, but which now in places were almost black. At the base they were green.

"Leave your bike here, we're going inside the church now," said Geir.

"I want to take it with me," said Njaal.

"It's not allowed, you little terror. No bikes in God's house."

"No balance bikes, anyway. Pedals would have been different."

"What?" Njaal looked up at me.

"Karl Ove's only joking," said Geir. "Leave your bike and come here!"

He did as he was told and we went into the church, which seemed so much bigger and vaster than it looked from outside. Here there was any amount of striving to the heavens.

I wasn't in the mood for churches and wandered around halfheartedly, sitting down on a pew after a short while, not even trying to identify myself with what the surrounding imagery expressed. Geir and Njaal disappeared from sight, when they appeared again they came up to tell me they'd been down in the crypt. I went outside for a cigarette, Geir wanted to look around a bit more, so I sat down on the steps and stared out into the park, the smoke of my cigarette a wispy cloud about my head while I thought about the new idea I had for a novel, how it might connect up with what little I already had. The dystopia. The world that never was. The man who grew up in a place where Nazism constituted the social order. Why Nazism? I'd seen a picture not long before, from a Nazi propaganda poster, depicting a bridge in a mountainous landscape, and it was so stirring and filled me with such an odd sense of longing that I wanted to investigate it. To create just such a world. I knew instantly that the lower-middle-class horror of the subdivision gardens in some way joined up with that image. I'd read another article, in Dagens Nyheter, about the biological manipulation of animals, dealing partly with an experiment in the sixties when a team of scientists had implanted electrodes in the brain of an ox and succeeded in making it walk and stop – a picture showed how the ox, which had come running toward the scientist, had halted abruptly in front of him when he flicked a switch on the box he held in his hand; and partly with an ongoing experiment with a fly in which they had implanted a light-sensitive gene from an eel which allowed them to steer it, albeit not minutely or with any exactness; every time someone directed a light at the fly it took off. What these experiments stood for was horrendous and shook me to my very foundation. The problem was that it belonged to our time, structurally, politically, socially, the whole mentality of it, and that its myriad meanings would evaporate as soon as I tried to insert it into another, counterhistorical reality. Perhaps what I had were two different novels. That would become apparent to me as I went along, I thought to myself. The world was so big and diverse that opposite forces were always at work somewhere, no particular outcome was ever guaranteed, the future was wide open and uncertain, and if the sun went down in that future, it would go down on us, not on those who were to come; for them it would rise.

"There he is, all on his own, the friendless wretch," said Geir behind me.

I turned.

"Are we ready for some lunch now?" I said.

He nodded and I got to my feet. My legs felt like they were shaking, but it was only a sensation. I tossed my cigarette onto the gravel as Njaal got back on his bike and we walked off, me with my inner being in turmoil, Geir in good cheer, I assumed, since he was twirling his key strap again and trying to tell me how marvelous the church had been inside. Friendless, he'd said, and the situation I was in returned to me. Gunnar's awful e-mails. The lawyers poring through my manuscript. The court case that lay ahead. The newspaper headlines.

"You seem a bit miserable," he said.

"Yes," I said. "Sorry. I'm not the best of company."

"Are you going to start apologizing for that now as well? As far as I'm concerned, you can be as miserable as you like. Everything has its value."

"No, the moods of others can hardly be said to seep in and affect you," I said. "You're always yourself, regardless."

"What you're saying is I'm thick-skinned. You said that yesterday too."

"But you are."

"If you say so. How about that place?" he said, indicating a restaurant maybe twenty meters up a side street we were passing.

"Can't we sit outside?" I said. "So I can smoke?"

"Sure. On the square, then? There were some outdoor cafés there."

We went over and sat down at a table inside a roped-off serving area. A girl in her early twenties was sitting at a neighboring table with a woman I supposed was her mother, about fifty years old. Apart from them the place was deserted. The girl was typing on her phone, the mother smoking and staring out over the square.

"Do you want pizza or spaghetti?" Geir asked Njaal, who had produced a toy car from somewhere and was now playing with it on the edge of the table, his chin supported by his hand, elbow on the table.

"Spaghetti," he said.

"Good," said Geir. "How about you?"

"I don't know really. Carbonara, I think."

"Nice choice. I'll go with the carbonara as well."

He put the menu down on the table. The waitress came over and we ordered. While we waited for the food, Geir expounded on the concepts of sensitivity and insensitivity. He pointed out how odd it seemed that I, with my wish to write about all that was authentic, and who had written so freely about death and the body, had not written about sex. I was too sensitive, he considered.

"I'm discreet, that's all," I said. "Besides, as I see it sex is overamplified in our culture."

"Overamplified?"

"Yes. Do you remember what you told me once, about the guy who vanished in a huge avalanche and was buried alive under meters of snow?"

"I do. You often come back to that, don't you?"

"Yes, because he disappeared to go jerk off. It's a superb illustration of our sexual urge."

"The way it exerts itself on every situation?"

"No, the minuteness of it. It's so incredibly small. A tiny little ejaculation in a huge mass of snow. Sex is completely out of proportion, we give it so much space and attach so much meaning to it, but in actual fact it's nothing. Totally verging on zero."

"I may be a fool, but I'm not an idiot!" he said in English. "We're talking about the way it is. Not the way we want it to be. You want life to be big and meaningful. Noble, even. Sorry. It is small and lonely. It's never going to be better than that orgasm in the snow. Sex and death, that's all there is."

"Then why do you even bother talking to me, if that's the case? Shouldn't you be at home jerking off? Or sticking your head in a bucket and putting a gun in your mouth?"

"What do you know? I often jerk off when I'm talking to you."

"So that's where those funny noises come from. I thought it was the dog slobbering over its dinner."

"We haven't got a dog."

"No, exactly. The truth's always something else."

"Good point," he said, and smiled the way a person who is basically rather pleased with themselves may sometimes smile, as if they can hardly contain their pleasure.

The waitress came over from the counter with a plate of pasta in each hand. I looked at the table, there was a basket of bread on it, and a small bottle of olive oil; had she put them there without my noticing?

"Two carbonaras," she said, putting two plates down in front of us. "Yours is on its way," she said to Njaal.

"Have some bread while you're waiting," said Geir, handing him a piece. He took a bite as he watched a pigeon wander about between the tables, then glanced up at me.

"It's all about the difference between is and ought to be," I said.

"Do you remember what Pessoa says? 'How can I face Leopardi's atheism with gravity and pain when I know this atheism may be cured by sexual intercourse?'"

"Yes, but that's just it. I can accept reducing things down in order to get to some form of truth, but what I don't understand is why that reduction always has to end in sex."

"The reason you don't understand it is because you're an aesthete. You shun what is base. You shy away from the body. You know what Luther wrote?"

"No."

"Dreams are untruthful. Shitting the bed, that's the only truth."

After we'd eaten, we strolled toward the botanical gardens. In the middle of the park there was a small pond full of water lilies, and next to it a little café where we sat down and had coffee in the flickering shade beneath a tree. There were some ducks whose young – which last time I was here, with Linda in the early summer, had been small and fluffy – had grown considerably while they had retained their youngness, the offspring of both animals and humans had awkwardness in common, as if, because of their sudden size, something monstrous had come over them. Of course, Njaal wasn't bothered about such things, he chased them around for a while, trying to get close enough to pet them, but every time he got near they scuttled away, their heads held still on relatively slender necks, and eventually he lost interest and began tossing stones into the pond instead, until Geir told him to stop, and he sat down in the gravel by the table to play with his car again.

I thought about something Vanja often asked, about why grown-ups never played. She couldn't grasp that we found it tedious, and the conclusion she drew was that in that case she never wanted to grow up. Life was running around and laughing, playing with long-maned plastic ponies and little Japanese figures with big eyes, swinging on swings, spinning on carousels, climbing in trees, splashing in wading pools and pretending to be a whale, a shark, a fish. Not sitting in a chair reading a newspaper, looking serious.

Or, like now, sitting still at a table and talking, with long pauses in between where nothing was said and no one did anything.

The people at the other tables, mostly elderly, conversed in low voices, now and then there was a chink of cutlery, a fork against a plate, a spoon against a cup, which then died away in the still air under the treetops.

It felt like we were in the depths of summer. As if we were a part of some Impressionist painting, for no one had captured that feeling better than the Impressionists, and the question was whether it had actually been they who created it. Whether such a feeling had even existed in the world before they came upon it, with all their conceptions of color, light, and shade, their endeavors to reproduce the exact moment. Before that, painting had always been geometric, had always been concerned with the solidity of objects and people, and with the borders between them. That which is here, the ways in which entities that are here are connected, and that which is there, which is to say beyond here, is what such paintings investigate. But in a world sunk into shadow, specked with flickering light, where one thing merges into another, the questions are different. What is visible and what is invisible, what is clear and what is obscure, what can we see and what can't we see, and, not least, what is this feeling that so compellingly pervades what we see? A writer such as Marcel Proust would be unthinkable without Impressionism, since his entire work is built around the relationship between recollection and oblivion, light and shade, visible and invisible, and the compelling feeling the world, especially the sunken world, yet also the prevailing world of the present, awakens in him, is shaped, if not brought into being, by the eye of the Impressionist. With Cézanne, the question is: what does it mean to see? With the Impressionists, the question is: what does it mean to experience seeing? Regrettably, their radicalism has completely disappeared from our cultural consciousness, now all that remains are the fine colors and the flowers, a fate Proust avoided, his own fine colors and flowers existing in words, and he could certainly never be suspected of appropriating beauty by copying an appealing motif, which incidentally would be one possible definition of kitsch. The fact that art has become so cerebral that everything to do with feelings is left to the simpleminded, is perhaps the best argument there is against progress, for the very reason that such a standpoint, which it seems must take precedence over our human experience, is so stupid and unintelligent as to be truly simpleminded itself. When the imperative of craftsmanship in art was abolished, it was because the idea that art should be about reproducing the world as exactly as possible was deemed old fashioned and therefore no longer necessary. So it was abolished. But one doesn't have to think too hard in order to understand that this wasn't the reason that painters and sculptors spent all their time during their crucial formative years of youth copying others or mechanically reproducing models or objects. They weren't doing it so they could learn to copy reality, because the reproduction of reality has a cutoff point any reasonably talented student would achieve fairly quickly. They were doing it so as to learn how not to think. This is the most important thing of all in art and literature, and hardly anyone can do it, or even realizes it is the case, because it is no longer taught or conveyed. Now everyone thinks art is to do with reason and criticism, that it's all about ideas, and the art schools teach theory. Which is decay, not progress.

Geir drew his chair back in the gravel and stood up.

"Do you want some water?" he said.

"Yeah, I think I will," I said. "Can you get me a top-off as well?"

I picked up my coffee cup and handed it to him. It had stains all over it, mostly spots but streaks too, the way my coffee cups always did for some reason, I had no idea why. Other people's coffee cups tended to be shiny and untarnished on the outside. I supposed it was because I held my lips in a certain way that allowed coffee to dribble between them and the cup, but while I didn't understand how this could be the case, I was unable to do anything about it; no matter how hard I pressed the cup to my lower lip, there were stains all over it by the time I was finished.

"Where are you going, Daddy?" said Njaal, looking up.

"Just getting some water."

Njaal got to his feet and went after him, wriggling his hand into Geir's. I got my phone out of my pocket and called Linda. She answered right away.

"Hi, it's Karl Ove," I said. "Are you home?"

"Yes. I just got in the door. Where are you?"

"We're in Lund. Sitting in the botanical gardens."

"How nice."

"Yes, it's pleasant. But you're picking the kids up, right?"

"Yes. I'll go over in a bit."

"OK, I just needed to make sure. Anyway, we'll be getting back soon, so I'll see you later."

"Did you buy the wine and the prawns?"

"I'll get them when we get back."

"I can get them if its easier."

"No, it's OK. I'll do it. See you soon."

"OK. Bye."

"Bye," I said, then pressed the red key and put the phone back in my pocket just as Njaal and Geir emerged again from the little pavilion-like structure that housed the actual café. Njaal was holding a glass in both hands, taking small, cautious steps, it was an important job he'd been entrusted with, while Geir walked behind him with a cup of coffee in one hand and a glass of water in the other.

"Thanks," I said. "I'll pay for the water, seeing as you got lunch."

"Ha ha."

He sat down, took the glass Njaal had been carrying, and downed its contents in one. His face glistened slightly with perspiration.

"Is it time we were heading off soon?" he asked.

"Yes," I said. "I called Linda. She just got in."

He checked the time on his phone.

"Christina should be arriving soon as well. Drink your coffee and we'll get going."

"One more smoke," I said. "Then we'll go."

Njaal picked up his bike and got on. I took the last cigarette out of the pack and lit up, crumpled the empty pack in my hand and looked to see if there was a garbage can close by. There wasn't.

"You're not to bike in the park here," said Geir. "Wait until we leave."

"Why?" he said.

"People are eating! You wouldn't want people biking around in your lunch either, would you?"

"No," he said with a chuckle.

Geir looked at me.

"You've gone quiet," he said.

"That's what Arvid always used to say, I remember. In Bergen. You've gone quiet, have you shit your pants or something?"

"Here we go again."

"I know. I'm sorry."

"I was thinking about what we were talking about yesterday. About being a dad."

"Yeah?"

"My principle is whoever wants something the most should do it. And whoever that is decides everything. When Njaal was born, Christina could hardly sleep at nights in case she missed something. She had a superb job at the opera, but she quit that to spend as much time with Njaal as possible. Her doing all the practical stuff isn't because she's a woman, it's because it actually means something to her. If she'd been eager to do something else it all would have been different."

"Yes," I said.

"Not only does she put more into it than me, she also gets a lot more out of it. It's highly meaningful to her."

"I remember running through the streets to send off a roll of film for developing when Vanja was born, and then running all the way back. I didn't want to miss anything either."

"But you wouldn't want to stay home full-time for three years, would you?"

"No."

"It's so easy to get swallowed up in all the softness and warmth, so easy to think that's all there is. But we don't create anything in that space other than more softness and warmth. I see it as a weakness. That's why I have no respect for men who just wander into all that. Everyone hails them for doing it, but all they're actually doing is shirking a responsibility. A major responsibility, at that. I agree with Karen Blixen when she says you can't go chasing the Holy Grail with a baby carriage. You can't have both. There's only one kind of masculinity. You're either more of a man or less. That's fucking it. There's no such thing as masculinities in the plural. Oh, how I despise that word. It makes me want to throw up. There are certain words that absorb everything about an age that you don't like. That's one of them. I can't take it. The same goes for women too, of course. There's only one femininity. Mind you, if this were the sixties, when men went to work and women stayed at home, I could well imagine me staying at home with Njaal. It's the thought of a prevailing ideology, a consensus idea governing my life, that I can't stand."

"But if that's true, it's just a protest. I mean, if the point is just to do the opposite of everyone else, then you're just as trapped as all the others."

"You're right. I take it back. The point is just that it's totally absurd for other people to be telling me what I'm supposed to be like with my own son. You know, when I was in Iraq, during the war there, while the bombs were coming down, I was interviewed by a journalist from Aftonbladet. Do you know what he asked me?"

I shook my head.

"Who does the dishes at home? Can you believe that?"

"What did you tell him?"

"I refused to give him an answer. Anyway, we've got a dishwasher."

"You call that little tin can a dishwasher?"

"Don't underestimate it. We never argued over anything as much as we did over whose turn it was to do the dishes. As soon as we got a machine to do it, it was problem solved."

"Small machines for small problems."

"Why do you think he asked me that? I'll tell you. He wanted to know if I was a good person or a bad person. If I did the housework, I was a good person. If I didn't, I was a bad person."

"Mm," I said. "Shall we get going? I'm done now."

We got up and left the café area and walked back through the park. I stopped where a tree had been cut down and stood for a moment reading the sign that had been put up next to it. It said the tree had died from a disease that had hit almost every tree of its kind in Skåne.

Bloody hell.

I walked on and caught up with them at the entrance gate. We followed the fence for a bit before crossing the road and entering a picturesque little street of small, low houses with flowers growing up their walls. As we got closer to the car, and thereby the apartment in Malmö, I felt a rising sense of unease, back to the apartment meant back to the book. I smoked a cigarette, it was something to do, and doing something took attention away from my thoughts, if not much then a little bit at least, and that was better than not at all. I smoked, I stared at the things around me, trying to think about them instead, and checked my phone that no one ever called.

"When was Linda picking the children up?" Geir asked, the parking lot maybe fifty meters ahead of us.

"About now, I should think," I said. "Why?"

"So someone will be home when Christina gets there."

"She has a cell phone, doesn't she?"

"Yes, that's true."

"Is she getting the train from Båstad?"

"No, the way I understood it she was getting a lift with someone who was coming this way."

Christina had taken a course for school photographers and was going to be taking photos of school classes in the Stockholm area all autumn. She had done the same thing the year before, and the money she had earned during that period had kept them going all year. Geir no longer had his job at the university, and the unemployment benefit he had been getting for a while had stopped. The book he had sacrificed everything for, which wasn't yet finished, and which on my advice he had submitted to first one publisher, then another, so that they might be involved at the earliest possible stage of the process, had been turned down by both. I had no idea how they managed to get by, but he said it was just a matter of discipline. They did all their shopping at Willys, where they bulk-bought discount goods, and with anything else, such as books, CDs, and DVDs, he would spend hours looking for the cheapest price online. I had no idea what they did about clothes, but Christina was a trained designer, and my guess was that they bought secondhand and that she mended and adjusted.

Geir pressed the key, the car lights flashed with a beep. I opened the door and got in while he opened the trunk for Njaal's bike. I tipped my head back and closed my eyes. Outside, the sound of Geir rummaging in the trunk was neutral, a noise like any other, rising and spreading out into the air, but inside it was different, it was the sound of something going on in the car, in some way belonging to it. The difference was immense. What was going on outside seemed safe and unthreatening, whereas what was going on inside was something one was defenseless against.

Outside the car windows, Malmö began to materialize. The big housing blocks on the edge of the city, which in Malmö were of yellow brick, loomed up. Rows of windows, rows of balconies, and between them parking lots and lawns. The quiet residential areas of detached homes where the well-off lived were on the other side of the city, by the sea. That's what money bought, lots of space and distance from others. But not too much space and not too much distance. In the forests you could have as much space as you wanted and there could be miles to the nearest neighbor, but no one with money would ever dream of living there. Space and distance were valuable only if there were other people nearby who had a lot less space and lived a lot closer to each other.

We drove past supermarkets, car dealers, shopping centers, gas stations, rows of buildings gradually appearing on each side, the shops to begin with selling cheap and simple commodities, becoming increasingly expensive and more exclusive the closer we got to the city center. Here were people, milling along the sidewalks, striding past the windows, cars passing in the streets with windows of their own, traffic lights and pedestrian crossings, squares and sidewalk cafés, little parks, big parks, a canal, a railway station. Hotels with flags flapping at their entrances, sports shops, clothes shops, shoe shops, electrical dealers, furniture shops, lamp shops, carpet shops, eyewear shops, bookshops, computer shops, auction houses, kitchenware dealers. Picture-framing shops. Chinese restaurants, Thai restaurants, Vietnamese restaurants, Mexican, Iraqi, and Iranian restaurants, Turkish and Greek restaurants, French and Italian restaurants. McDonald's, Burger King, pizza joints. Cafés, cinemas, a concert hall. Theaters, an opera house, nursery schools, record shops, bus stations. Unemployment offices, linen shops, a hospital, an old people's home, doctors' offices. Opticians, ear specialists, heart and lung specialists. Dentists, orthopedists, psychologists, psychiatrists, pipe-fitting firms. Funeral parlors, DIY shops, home interior shops, photo shops, banks, yoga studios, pubs, flower shops, health shops, amusement arcades, tobacconists, camping and outdoor stores, children's clothes shops, baby shops, massage institutes, car rental firms, pet suppliers, toy shops, churches, mosques, schools, information points. Hair transplant institutes, law firms, advertising agencies. Hair salons, nail studios, pharmacists, clothes shops for fat people, surgical appliance shops, workwear dealers, garden stores, exchange bureaus. Musical instrument shops, computer game shops, bus card kiosks, radio, TV, and hi-fi dealers, sausage stands, falafel bars, suitcase and bag shops. The whole of this enormous world, teeming with detail, was divided into intricate, finely meshed systems that kept everything apart, at first by its very division into sectors, which meant that rubber tap washers, for instance, were to be found in a different place than nylon guitar strings, and a novel by Danielle Steel in a different place than a novel by Daniel Sjölin, which was a kind of rough, initial sorting, then by infusing the various goods or services with value, thereby grading them in ways no school could ever teach, and which therefore had to be learned ad hoc, outside any school or institution, and which furthermore were forever in a state of flux. This was the difference between a pair of McGordon jeans from Dressmann and a pair of Acne jeans, or a pair of Tommy Hilfiger jeans and a pair of Cheap Monday jeans, Ben Sherman or Levi's, Lee or J. Lindeberg, Tiger or Boss, Sand or Peak Performance, Pour or Fcuk. It was what sort of signals a novel by Anne Karin Elstad sent out compared to a novel by Kerstin Ekman, and how both of these related to a collection of poetry by Lars Mikael Raattamaa, for instance. The reason why reading Peter Englund was a bit more exclusive than reading Bill Bryson, albeit not by much. The reasons why one could no longer express fascination and enthusiasm about Salman Rushdie without seeming culturally adrift, left behind in the late eighties, while V. S. Naipaul was still accepted. The knowledge that meant I could go into a clothes shop and buy the jeans or suits that were now held to be superior, though not by all, select the books in the bookshop that gave me the greatest degree of cultural credibility, purchase the music in the record store that was deemed more than averagely sophisticated, even when it came to traditions and genres I didn't know much about, like jazz and classical, I'd picked up enough to get by, perhaps even in some lucky circumstance to pass for a true connoisseur. This was the way with almost everything. I knew perfectly well what kind of sofa sent out what kind of signals, and the same was true of electric kettles and toasters, running shoes and schoolbags. Even tents were something I would be able to appraise, at least to a certain extent, in terms of what kind of signals they sent out. This knowledge was not written down anywhere, and it was hardly accepted as knowledge at all, it was more an assurance regarding the way things stood, and it fluctuated according to the social strata in such a way that someone from the upper classes would be able to frown on my sofa preferences and the sofa knowledge I was thereby demonstrating, just as I in turn would be able to frown on the taste in sofas of people belonging to a lower status group than myself, not in any way denigrating them as human beings, because I wouldn't dream of doing such a thing, but their sofas. I might not say so out loud, for fear of seeming judgmental, but I would think, God, what an awful sofa. Such knowledge, which applied to nearly all brands and their practical and social significance, was immense, and, I occasionally thought to myself, not that different from the knowledge so-called primitive peoples once possessed, where they not only knew the name of every plant, tree, and bush in their surroundings but also what kind of properties they had and what use could be made of them, or the knowledge people of our own cultures possessed only a few generations ago, for instance in the eighteenth century, when most people also knew the names of all the plants and trees in their vicinity, and the names of all those who lived in the villages they lived in, both the living and several generations of the dead, just as they were familiar with and able to identify by name all localities, great and small, in their surrounding area. Naturally, they knew the names of the tools they used and the work they were appropriate to, and of all the animals, their various parts and organs. This knowledge wasn't something they considered, nor was it ever made a show of in any way, since basically they were unaware of its existence as such, so closely was it bound up with their own being. Such is the case too with the immense knowledge we ourselves possess, of the difference between strong and mild mustard, for instance, a grilled or a fried sausage, a sausage with cheese in it or one with bacon wrapped around it, a bread roll or the kind of potato pancakes we Norwegians call lomper, raw or roasted onions at the gas station's grill stand, or of the difference between the various kinds of mustard in our supermarkets, like the French Dijon mustard, or English Colman's, or the particular variety that belongs to Skåne, not to mention wines, which are so culturally expressive and so extremely saturated with social meanings. Like the people who went before us, we don't give a thought to the knowledge required for us to get through the day, we don't see it, it's a part of us, it's who we are. Our world is this: Blaupunkt over bluebell, Rammstein over rowan, Fiat over foxglove.

One of the three parking spaces at the top end of Brogatan, by the back entrance to our building, happened to be free as we drew up, this was hardly ever the case and I said to Geir we were in luck.

The sun, which when we left had been above the building housing the job center, was now above the bank, and its rays, slanting down toward us, were filtered through the foliage of the tree that grew in the nameless square meters of space between Brogatan and Föreningsgatan, causing the car roof and bodywork to flicker in the play of light and shade that manifested itself in iridescent nuances of red, from very bright and intensely lustrous to a darker dullness.

I got the key out of my pocket and crossed the area behind the building, which was in shadow most of the day, for which reason the temperature there was markedly lower than it was only a few meters away, tapped the orange key card against the panel, pulled the door toward me, and held it open until Geir and Njaal had gone in. I followed them down the stairs, they stopped at the door that led into the basement passage, which I opened in the same way. The air was cool and smelled of brick, fusty in the way of everything that was under the ground. Through the door at the other end, just as we entered, came the Polish woman who lived two floors below us, a blue IKEA bag in one hand, her grandchild in the other. I sent her a nod but she didn't see us, or pretended not to, and we went through to the stairs, where I pressed the button for the elevator, which was at the floor above us and came gliding down after only a few seconds.

"Now we'll see if Mommy's arrived," said Geir.

"And Vanja and Heidi," said Njaal.

John's stroller was parked outside the door, and as I went in I saw the little pile of shoes on the mat in the hall.

"Hello!" I called out.

"Hello," Linda called back from the kitchen. I stepped a bit farther inside so Geir and Njaal could come in. As I bent down to take off my shoes, first Linda then Christina appeared from the kitchen. Njaal bustled past me. Linda had all the radiance of when she was happiest, I noticed, a glow of sociability about her, particularly visible in the luster of her eyes, which was stronger than usual, but also in the skin of her cheeks, which had a slight blush to them. Her entire being smiled. I straightened up and we hugged each other.

"I missed you," she said softly.

"Good to have you back home," I said, my head lowered to her neck.

"Hi, Karl Ove," said Christina, and looked up. She was crouching in front of Njaal, asking what he'd been up to.

"Hi," I said. "Good to see you."

She got to her feet and we hugged fleetingly. Behind us, Linda and Geir did likewise. Njaal tugged at Christina's dress, wanting her to go into the living room with him. She smiled at me apologetically and went with him.

"Were they all right when you picked them up?" I asked.

Linda nodded and put her hand against my hip.

"So when did you get back?"

"About an hour ago, I suppose. I bought them each an ice cream."

"Good idea," I said. "I haven't got the prawns yet. I was thinking I'd pop out."

I went to the kitchen, took the coffeepot and the filter holder over to the sink, and tipped the used filter into the bin before emptying what was left from earlier into the sink, rinsed the pot a few times, and then filled it with fresh water, which seen through the unwashed glass didn't look fresh at all but took on a faint yellow tinge.

Linda sat down at the table and took an apple from the big, almost flat blue dish we'd once borrowed from her brother and never returned. It was ceramic and decorated with an Arabic-looking pattern in black that set off yellow apples and bananas especially well.

"Helena and Fredrik give you all their best," she said, biting into the apple.

"Thanks," I said. "Are they doing all right?"

She nodded as she munched.

Geir went through the hall, glancing at us as he passed, before going into the living room and by the sound of it sitting down on the sofa.

"It's nice to be home again though," she said. "I've never been away from the children that long before."

"That's positively sick," I said. "You were only away three days. That's nothing."

"It was enough for me," she said. "Anyway, I got talking to a man on the train. It turned out he was head of a school. He wants me to be a substitute teacher. I got his number. I've got a job!"

I poured the water into the coffeemaker, put a filter in the holder, measured out six heaped spoonfuls, then switched it on.

"Is that what you want?" I asked. "I thought you wanted to write, and make radio programs."

"But I never really get going with any of it. It's so incredibly taxing, making a radio program all on your own. I need something simple. Something more clearly defined. With this I'd go to the school, teach, and then go home again."

"What are you going to teach?"

She gave a shrug.

"Whatever they give me. As long as I can read through the syllabus beforehand, I should be all right."

"True," I said.

"You don't sound very convinced," she said.

"Yes, I am," I said. "It'd be fantastic if you had a steady job, of course it would."

I took an apple too, and sat down opposite her at the table.

"You can't think about much apart from those e-mails, can you?" she said.

"Not really," I said.

"You musn't worry."

"I can't help it. It won't go away. I know it's irrational. But it feels like someone died. The intensity of it, I mean. Something terrible that's there all the time. Even when I'm not thinking about it, it's there."

"You've got to shake it off. You can't write four books in a year and then let yourself be totally swallowed up by this as well."

"But I can't help it, that's what I'm saying."

"Do you want me to read what he's written? Maybe it would help, make it easier to talk about?"

"Yes, if you want."

I got to my feet and went to the bedroom, where the computer was still switched on, put the apple down on the desk, and opened the browser. Linda came in just as the first message appeared on the screen.

"This is the first one," I said, picking up the apple again. "You can scroll up to the others."

She nodded and sat down. I went into the living room, where Vanja and Heidi were playing with some Playmobil on the bed we used as a kind of divan up against the wall, with a blue-and-white-patterned throw to cover it, while Njaal stood with a plastic sword in his hand, making fencing moves in front of Christina, who turned her head toward me and smiled, a bit uneasily, I sensed.

"Have you seen John anywhere?" I said.

"I think he's asleep," she said. "He was before, anyway."

Njaal was directing all his attention to her, presumably in reaction to the complication of Vanja's and Heidi's presence. They had each other, he was on his own, and so he fenced with his mother instead.

"I think there's a pirate's eye patch in the toy box over there," I said. "And a hook for your hand. Is that right, Vanja?"

"I don't know," she said.

"Come and look then."

"But we're playing!"

"Njaal can find them," said Christina. "Can't you, Njaal?"

"Haa!" he said, lunging forward and striking her thigh with the flat of the sword. It wasn't made of plastic or wood, but of some other material a bit like foam rubber, only harder, and it had started coming apart all the way up the "blade."

I went into the other room, where Geir sat leafing through a book.

"Do you want some coffee?" I said.

"Yes, please," he said.

"It'll be ready in a minute," I said, and sat down in the chair across the table while munching what was left of my apple. Usually I ate them whole, core, stalk, the lot, and had done so ever since I was a boy, and there was something about that, to do with the slightly bitter taste of the stalk and the seeds, and the stringy consistency of the core, that for some reason always reminded me of childhood, as if the deviance of that action, for that was how I perceived it, as a rather deviant thing to do, opened up new spaces of experience compared to the norm, which was the taste of the white, succulent flesh of the fruit. These spaces were not large expanses, more like tiny stabs of the past prickling the consciousness, the feeling of fingers passing over the surface of a dark blue down jacket on the road outside the house in the dim light of morning, or the rain as it began to fall on a Sunday morning, patches of snow still left here and there at the roadside, bicycle wheels plowing through a sludge of gray mud on the gravel track.

"What are you reading?" I asked, placing my arms on the armrests and, since he wasn't looking at me, staring out the window at the small section of the balcony and the rooftops beyond it that was visible through the slats of the blinds.

"Daniel Defoe. About the Great Plague in London. Have you read it?"

He looked up, and I glanced toward him.

"What do you think?" I said. "The chances of your picking a book out here that I've actually read aren't that great."

"Here it is, Njaal," I heard Vanja say from the next room.

"Thank you," said Njaal.

The next minute Heidi was standing in the doorway. She was wearing a white summer dress with a red print on it.

"Can we watch a movie, Daddy?" she said.

"Not when we've got visitors. Play with Njaal. We'll have some nice dinner soon."

"What are we having?"

"Prawns."

"Prawns?"

"Yes."

"Are they nice?"

"I think so."

She gave me her skeptical look. I loved it when she did that.

"Njaal's playing with Vanja," she complained.

"Come on," I said. "Two minutes ago you were playing with Vanja. It can't have changed that much since then. Join in."

"What?"

"Go and play."

She turned her head and stared into the other room. I got up and went to the kitchen, where the coffee stood black in the pot. I closed off the filter so it wouldn't drip after I took the pot away, then poured the coffee into the thermos, the red Stelton we'd been given as a present by Axel and Linn, though what the occasion had been I could no longer remember.

Linda came through the hall.

"Do you want some coffee?" I said when she came in.

She nodded. Her face wasn't as lively as it had been only minutes before. Now she looked drained, paler.

"It's awful," she said. "How can he say such things? I'm afraid for you, Karl Ove. He wants to hurt you."

"Come on!" I said. "I pissed him off, that's all."

"No, he's lost it. He's lost control of himself. It feels dangerous. He's completely unstable."

"No, no. It's unpleasant, that's all. Everything's going to be fine. I promise. Did you want some coffee?"

She nodded, and then I remembered that she had already nodded in response to the same question. I got four cups out of the cupboard, they were brown on the outside, with a faint tinge of red and white on the inside, and the four saucers that belonged to them were also brown. They were meant to go with some kind of Italian coffee, as far as I remembered, but they were just as good for regular filter coffee, and if I was displaying my social incompetence in that respect it was only to Geir and Christina, whom I'd never suspected of laughing at us behind our backs after they'd been to see us, though of course you could never be certain.

No, I was pretty sure they hadn't.

I took the thermos and the cups with me into the other room, where Geir was sitting, put them out on the table, and sat down. Then I remembered Linda needed milk, so I got up again and went back into the kitchen to get it, got the carton out of the fridge and checked the expiration date, which said it was on its last day, so I opened the carton and smelled inside, just as I heard Geir ask Linda if she'd read Gunnar's messages, and since there seemed to be nothing wrong with it I took it back with me into the other room and put it down next to the thermos on the table, while Linda told him how awful she thought it all was.

"What if it goes to court?" she said. "You might have to stay in Norway all autumn. What am I supposed to do then? Imagine this place. Am I going to be left on my own with the kids? And how will you deal with the pressure?"

Geir gave her one of his most sardonic smiles and glanced at me as she went on. Linda noticed, of course, and I could see how a sudden rage welled up in her, which the presence of guests meant she had to keep inside, and her eyes clouded over. She flashed me the blackest look before getting to her feet and going out into the hall. I sent Geir a look of reproach, but it seemed like he misunderstood and thought it was Linda I was annoyed with; whatever the reason, he simply smiled again, or maybe he was just smiling at the whole thing.

"Help yourself to coffee," I said, and went after Linda, who was already in the bedroom by the time I got to her.

The spring Linda and I got together we went out a couple of times with Geir and Christina, it was when we were still obsessed with each other, kissing and touching, unable to keep our hands off each other, and even when I met Geir on my own, for instance in the place I had then, I was still immersed in the thought of her and just sat there blushing with joy, listening to whatever Geir was going on about without any of it actually seeping in, for I was no longer a person, or so it felt, I had become something else, a creature floating in the sky, high above the world and everything in it. I was the sky man, she was the sky woman, and together we were going to have a sky baby. But then we came back down. The sky life stopped and something else began.

Linda wrote about it in a short story, the two lovers lying in bed talking, she saying she had once seen a strange bird in her childhood, and describing it to him, never before had she seen such a bird, and never since, and it turned out that he had seen one exactly the same in his own childhood, for this is how it is to be a sky man and a sky woman, everything joins up, everything becomes meaningful. But in the story this was the conclusion of something, and she compared that conclusion with the last day spent in a summerhouse, when everything is packed away, the windows closed and the door locked. And this was how it was too. We had been somewhere together, a place filled with light, and now we were going somewhere else. She was afraid of that, it was a darker place. And because she was afraid of it she tried to keep me where I was. This was new to me, something I hadn't known before, and it made me afraid too. We started arguing, and the walls of her apartment, into which I had moved, closed in on me, its rooms became smaller and smaller. Our arguing turned her into my father, I was afraid of the loudness of her voice, her sudden fits of anger, and had no idea how to handle it, so I was cowed by her, and when it passed I would be on my guard, trying to act in ways that would placate her, wary of the slightest sign of displeasure, and it was that subjection, the fact that I was always trying to assuage and appease, that made our relationship increasingly difficult, because at the same time I was trying to get away from it, I needed to gain some measure of independence, to become my own person, find my own space, and I started getting just as angry with her whenever we argued, maybe even angrier, because I needed to come free of myself too, the bonds within. She went to college, I tried to write, on weekends we tried to be like before. One Sunday we ran into Geir and Christina in a restaurant, Linda and I were going somewhere else afterward, we invited them along, and they came with us, Linda hissed in my ear that Geir was doing it on purpose, hadn't I noticed he was doing it on purpose, he wanted to ruin things for us. I didn't understand what she meant, we spent nearly all our time together, wasn't that enough for her, couldn't we ever see anyone else?

One time, Geir came over to her apartment, we were going out, he walked around the place, shamelessly examining everything in it as if he wanted to tell her he could read her like an open book. I could see how angry it made her, it was a provocation, but I didn't know what to do, surely a person could have a friend as well as a partner without them wrecking things between them? Geir had grown up with a mother who suffered from anxiety, a woman who had lost her father when she was still a child, and for the rest of her life she clung to those closest to her, she was a master of the art, Geir said, shunning no means to get what she wanted, and making people feel guilty was the least of them. So the fact that I was suddenly less available than before, the fact that I suddenly needed to stay in all the time, was something he interpreted in the context of that same pattern. He had needed to break free, and now he despised everything to do with intimacy, everything that smacked of commitment and bonds. At the same time, he committed to Christina. And Christina was in many ways like me, someone who endured and stuck things out, a person who pleased others, at the same time, like me, being essentially solipsistic or solitary, she could have been the last person on earth and been quite happy with that. I could too. Inside me was this enormous distance from other people, at the same time as I was hugely impressionable and open to influence, and could allow myself to be tied to someone and remain incapable of freeing myself. A friendship never ties, because if it does it ceases to be a friendship. But a relationship ties, because its foundations are deeper, rooted in the emotions, in the very fulcrum of life, and a relationship is in every respect a common bond; if we are not bound to each other, then what we have is not a relationship but a friendship. Whenever I got an engagement somewhere, Linda would say what about me, have you thought about me, left on my own here, what am I supposed to do? Even when there had just been the two of us, I would turn things down and back out of things because she couldn't be on her own, and when the children came along it became ten times worse, and if I did go away regardless, I would have to carry the responsibility for her being on her own and having to cope with the children without me, I would be one of those men who ran out on his family, the kind who think only about themselves, their jobs and careers. I didn't want that, and so I would decline and stay at home. Even the shortest absence was a problem, like the two hours I spent playing football every Sunday; when Linda wasn't feeling good she would be angry at me before I left, it was unfair of me to leave her on her own with the children, I was leaving her with far too much of the burden, she worked her fingers to the bone, she was exhausted, it was touch and go whether she could manage anymore. I told her it was the only thing I did outside the house. I never went out at night, never went to the cinema, never met up with any friends, we were together twenty-four hours a day, and those two hours of football were something I looked forward to all week. But she never did anything on her own, she said, that was a luxury denied to her, to be able to just go out whenever she felt like it. It was a poor argument, I could come back at her and say there was nothing I wanted her to do more than that. Feel free, I would say. You can go away three days a week, if you want. I can look after the kids on my own. It's no problem. I can do that. To which she might then say it was easier for me to have the kids, that they demanded less of me than of her, that I could just sit there and read the paper while I was on my own with them, whereas if it was her they wouldn't leave her alone. That's true, I might say, but that's no argument. What you're saying is that even if we have the children an equal amount of time, even if we're completely democratic about that, your burden is always the heavier because you're together with them in a different way than I am. But then what do we do? Does that mean they should be with me 70 percent of the time and you 30 percent, so as to even things out? Well, that's fine with me. I can have the kids 100 percent of the time. I can have them all the time. It's fine. And you know that. Fine for you, maybe, she might say then, but not for them. And then she could change tack and say I was always playing football on the weekends when the kids weren't at the nursery, and that we ought to be doing things together. True enough, I would say in response, but I'm back by twelve o'clock, which gives us the rest of the day to do stuff. And anyway, we spent our whole time together, all of us, the entire rest of the week besides, apart from when they were at the nursery, so the two hours I was playing football couldn't possibly harm. But that was different, she would say, because that was ordinary weekdays full of obligations, over the weekend we had the chance to do something nice together, as a family. If we didn't, I understood, we weren't a family. And so it could go on. Sometimes I got so angry I consciously tried to punish her, to make her feel guilty and show her how miserable everything could be if all we had were obligations, but it would only rebound on the kids. Sometimes I went off and played anyway, of what she said, which meant I was a bad husband and father who ignored his responsibilities and left his family in the lurch, and when I got back it was usually to an apartment full of tantrums and chaos, and Linda would imply: look at this, this is what happens when you're selfish. One such

Sunday, after I'd been playing football for two hours in the pouring rain and I got on my bike to cycle back, already in low spirits at the prospect of going home, I was suddenly struck by the liberating realization that Linda wasn't there. Her mother was with us that weekend. And that fact, the relief I felt at being able to go home to her mother and not to her, was the same as admitting that we had come to the end of the road. No husband should ever dread coming home. I had to get out. I was in shreds, not when I was on my own, but with Linda, and why should my life have to be like that? I could put up with not feeling up to the mark, but this was worse, I was in a terrible state. I was taking care of pretty much everything at home for long periods, at the same time as I was trying to work, something she didn't have to worry about, and here she was saying things weren't equal, because her share of the burden was more demanding. But I've got a job besides! I could almost yell at her. I've got to earn money! She could have had a job too, but because she'd had three children she'd been away from the labor market so long it was almost impossible for her to get back in. This was a sensitive area, and I had to tread carefully. It was true she'd been at home the first six months with Vanja, but the next six months it had been me who had taken over. She'd stayed at home with both Heidi and John, but we had three children by then and she had to concentrate on the little one, meaning there was plenty for me to do too, and as luck would have it I worked from home and was always on hand, and besides, I confined myself to working only five hours a day, which she didn't have much respect for. I wasn't a pilot or a surgeon with regular working hours and clear obligations to fulfill, I was a writer who'd been writing the same thing for years without getting anywhere. Her referring to this as career building was an insult to careerists. And the idea that she was being kept out of the labor market, and denied any way into it ever again, kept out by a male society hostile to women, wasn't exactly true either, because for as long as I'd known her she'd never been anywhere near any labor market. She was a writer and a trained radio documentarist, and the fact that she hadn't made a documentary since leaving college wasn't just down to her having stayed at home with the kids, because now they were in the nursery and she still wasn't making documentaries. Life with the children drained the energy out of her, she couldn't manage having to work as well, yet we spent equal portions of time looking after the kids, and I somehow did manage to work. Was this a woman trap? Did she spend more time changing diapers or going to the playground than I did? She believed yes, and no matter how much I did, regardless of how far I went to accommodate her, it was never enough. My frustration at the way my life was being dominated, and the shame of that, was enormous, and I couldn't tell anyone I knew, because they wouldn't believe that I was in a relationship that didn't allow me the time to play football two hours a week and where even the minutes I spent sitting on the balcony with a cigarette were something Linda would deny me or use against me in her arguments to the effect that all I ever thought about was myself, since those few minutes of peace were not available to her, she had to be there all the time inside, whereas I could just sneak off on a break whenever I felt like it. That I should yield to that and allow myself to be boxed in by it felt demeaning and was certainly not a matter I would wish to air with anyone. Anyone, that is, apart from Geir. He listened to it all. I assumed Linda knew, and that she maybe even guessed Geir was advising me to get out, since the life he lived was exactly the opposite, elevated above day-to-day obligations, but it wasn't like that at all, because what he told me, and was constantly reminding me about, was that it was all anxiety talking, not Linda. Anxiety eats people up from the inside, it's bigger than them, monstrous even, impossible to appease, and it eats away at relationships because the only thing it wants is for everyone to be snuggled up close all the time.

"It's anxiety, it's not Linda," he said. "Linda's intelligent, capable, talented. She knows the score. My mom was proud of me when I finally broke loose. And she was proud when I went parachuting or went off somewhere and drank myself senseless. Because she could see why. That was a side of her too. But the anxiety was that much greater. She was terrified and did everything she could to make me stay with her. Those were emotions I couldn't take into consideration, cry as she might. I think it probably had an effect on my empathy. Fortunately, my dad doesn't suffer from anxiety at all. I don't even think he knows what it is. I've never seen him scared or anxious about anything. But they're still together. I wasn't married to my mom, and we didn't have children, so I could just leave, which was the right thing to do. It's different for you. You and Linda are married. When Linda's feeling on top of things you can do what you want. When she isn't, when the anxiety gets to her, she needs you there. It's tearing you apart. But you're still there."

That was basically what he would say. It helped me see things from the outside, and to see the difference between the roles we occupied and the people we were. She was always Linda, the woman I'd been more in love with than any other, with whom I had three wonderful children, and when she was on a high she never saw a problem in anything, she was generosity personified, of course, get yourself away, my gorgeous footballing man, we'll be fine, maybe we'll go over and see Jenny or Bodil, or someone else perhaps, or go for a walk in the park, why don't you give us a call when you're finished, we could all go somewhere and do something nice? Or maybe you'd like to do some work? When she was on a high she had no difficulty working either, she would write while the kids were at nursery, and I would read what she wrote, it was as buoyant and exuberant as she was herself, and had the same kind of unfathomable depth, which I no longer tended to see, since it vanished so easily in our everyday routines, but which, whenever I caught sight of it and the person she was, either in something she had written or in herself, when we were together, seemed to come back. But there was no balance between these two aspects, either in her life or in ours, for the frustration I felt with respect to the one grew increasingly in strength, I was living a life of compulsion, and whether it came from inside or out made no difference, it was compulsion all the same, obligation, and that wasn't how I wanted it, and this not wanting was sooner or later bound to become a not being able. I was approaching that limit, and I supposed I was merely waiting for some factor that would finally give me release. In our arguments I'd already begun to threaten her with leaving. It would mean our sharing everything equally, down the middle, she would have the children 50 percent of the time, I would have them the other 50 percent, and she would have to earn her own money, and I mine. When I said this she would fall apart and beg me not to. Don't go, please don't go. And I didn't because I knew it would destroy her life, how would she ever manage on her own? And then, when the argument was over, there would be hope. Always a promise of change.

Her reacting the way she did to the look Geir gave me on this particular day in August 2009 had to do with all of this. Geir's look said, I see what you mean, Karl Ove. She's relating Gunnar's threats to herself, what am I supposed to do, how am I going to cope, and, by extension, how could you do this to me? In that look, she recognized the way I saw things and felt herself left bare. Geir and I were ganging up on her. It wasn't like that at all, but she had been left bare, certainly, since I confided in him the way I did. It wasn't a betrayal because I had to be able to talk to someone outside our relationship, but it felt like a betrayal in the way it had been made visible all of a sudden. Another thing I sensed she was reacting to was that I allowed Geir to influence me to such an extent that his opinions became my opinions, that to a degree he was brainwashing me, and that the distance that had opened up between Linda and me, which was due to my frustration, was a part of that. Geir was whispering in my ear about my life and her role in it, and before long it would make me leave her. I didn't know if this really was what she was thinking, or whether it was my own paranoia that had led me to such ideas, but there was no way to find out because there was no way we could talk about it other than when our arguments were coming to a head, at such a point she once yelled at me that she couldn't understand why I didn't just move in with Geir seeing as how I spent the whole time on the phone with him, words that as soon as the argument was over and we'd made up again, she in tears, I with my anger stuck like a stone in my chest, she said she hadn't meant. She actually liked Geir. I believed her because now, finally, after seven years, I had begun to understand her. She liked him when she was feeling strong and had the energy in her to be relaxed and casual about things, including her feelings for me, whereas when she was down things looked different to her, because then she was afraid everything was going to be swallowed up and she was going to lose all that she had, and that feeling was so powerful it affected all her opinions, assessments, and perceptions. So there was nothing underived other than anxiety or joy, emotions so powerful inside her that they could turn good into bad and bad into good in the space of a moment. It had torn so much apart that I no longer cared, I'd used up so much energy to accommodate it, regardless of how unreasonable it could appear to me, that all of a sudden I could do so no longer: she could weep and be as despairing as a person could be, and all I could do was look at her and tell her I wasn't going to say anything until she stopped crying. She could scream at me, and I would say, Are you done yet? That I was no longer tangled up in the emotions, but detached, standing there looking at them, perhaps made her feel even more scared, and the fear she felt was justified, because I was reaching a point where I couldn't handle it anymore, I felt myself to be at the very limit of what I could endure, so removed from the life I wanted to live that I could hardly think about anything else.

Then the e-mails started coming in, the pressure from outside, and I no longer stood with my back to her and the family, looking out, I swiveled around, quickly, in the space of an hour, and was then standing with my back to the world, facing them, Linda and the children, for the first time in a very long time. She went off to visit Helena, I missed her because I needed her, I needed to feel her warmth. Only then it got torn apart by the look Geir sent me, all that was contained in it, and I despaired, all of a sudden it felt like it was too late, as if somehow the dynamics of destruction carried on without me after I stopped. I had stopped too late, swiveled around too late, and it had taken on its own momentum. This was the feeling I had when I followed Linda into the bedroom that afternoon in August 2009, but there was more, so much more than that: I had put all my frustration into the writing, it had filled an entire novel, it was about us, she and I, and although I suddenly needed her again, suddenly wanted her again, suddenly wanted to live my life there again, my past, my frustration, and my yearning to get away wedged itself in between us, because soon she would have to read that novel, soon it would be published.

She was at the computer when I entered the room, staring stiffly at the screen as if in deep concentration, but I recognized that look, it was a sign of the opposite, an inner turmoil she was trying to conceal.

"What's the matter?" I said, sitting down on the bed.

"Nothing," she said.

"Why did you come in here, then?"

"To check my e-mail."

I felt I should get up and put my hand on her shoulder, but I knew she would react as if it were something alien and just leave it there to show me how removed she was from me, and not, as she normally would have done, since such signs of affection had become so infrequent and would always come as a surprise to her, return the gesture.

It pained my heart. I had denied her the only thing she really needed from me.

"Was it that look Geir gave me?" I said.

She glanced at me, then turned her attention back to the screen in front of her.

"No, not at all," she said. "I didn't see any look."

"What is it then?"

She sighed.

"I got such a bad feeling from those e-mails. And I can see how much it's getting to you. I just started thinking about what the autumn's going to be like. If it goes to court. There won't be room for anything else. And there's you and Geir sitting there, and . . . well, wallowing in it, in a way."

"I wouldn't call it wallowing exactly," I said.

"You asked what the matter was. That was it. I don't want to discuss it."

"OK," I said, and got to my feet. "Are we friends?"

She nodded.

I put my hand on her shoulder. She didn't react.

"It'll pass," I said. "It's just right now, that's all. And I won't be able to cope without your help. I can't fight on two fronts. It'll do me in."

"I'll do my best," she said, looking up at me and putting her hand on mine.

"I'm glad," I said.

Njaal and Vanja came bombing in from the hall. Linda took her hand back.

"I'll go out and get those prawns, then," I said. "Is there anything else we need? Wine, bread, lemons, mayonnaise, prawns."

"We've got mayonnaise, I think, don't we? In the fridge?"

"It'll be ancient if we have. I'll buy some more. Is there anything you'd like?"

The children started bouncing on the bed.

"Maybe those yellow berries, that fruit or whatever it is they've got there, you know," said Linda. "In those small baskets. I can't remember what they're called. Do you know what I mean?"

I nodded. Somewhere Heidi was on her own and sad, I thought to myself.

"OK," I said. "I'll get some ice cream and strawberries as well, I think."

"Get some candy for the children, then."

"Will do," I said, and went through into the hall. I stopped in the doorway of the children's room; John was fast asleep on his belly, spread-eagled, his head resting on one arm, saliva dribbling from his mouth. I stood looking at him for a moment, then went back into the living room, where Heidi was sitting on the toy box, Christina must have put the lid back on, with a doll in one hand and a small blue plastic comb in the other.

"Do you want to come shopping with me, Heidi?" I asked.

She shook her head.

"Yes, come on," I said. "It'll be nice."

"No, I said."

"OK," I said, and smiled, then went into the other room, where Geir was sitting on the sofa reading, while Christina was sitting in the chair across the table, skimming through a photo book.

"Just popping out to get the prawns," I said.

"I'll come with you," said Geir, getting to his feet.

"No need," I said. "Just buying prawns, that's all."

I didn't want him to come, it would be too much the two of us, seen from where Linda was. But I couldn't say no to his face. He would have to grasp the intention.

"It'll be nice to get out," he said, looking at Christina. "Is there anything we need?"

"I don't think so," she said.

Linda came in from the hall. From the look on her face and her movements I could see she wasn't upset any more.

Maybe she and Christina could have a chat for a bit if we went out.

"I'll pop out for the shopping, then," I said.

"Can you take Heidi or Vanja with you?" she said.

"Heidi didn't want to go. I can ask her again, though."

I poked my head around the door.

"Put your shoes on. We're going shopping."

She looked up at me.

"Do I have to?" she said.

"Yes," I said.

"Why doesn't Vanja have to?"

"Because I want you to come. Come on."

She got to her feet and went past me, put her sandals on, and stood waiting by the door while I put my own shoes on, patted my back pocket to make sure I had my wallet with my cards in it, then my front pocket, feeling its lumpy nest of keys, grabbed my sunglasses off the hat shelf, and opened the door.

Heidi was shy with Geir being with us in the elevator, she looked down at the floor. She could be shy with me too; sometimes if I caught her eye and smiled, she could look away with a sheepish little grin on her face. She was hardly ever like that in social situations and had been confident right from the start, but often in what was almost the opposite situation, the more intimate context, when the attention of a single person was directed toward her. With Vanja the opposite was true, she liked attention from one person and would even go looking for it, whereas in new social situations she would be shy and withdraw.

Shyness is a protective mechanism, and the interesting thing was that they were protecting different aspects of themselves. Did those aspects need protecting because they were particularly fragile or because they were particularly precious?

It was interesting too that they should both protect themelves by lowering their gaze, bowing their heads, turning away. Shyness was directly linked with the eyes, it was always their eyes they hid from view. They could respond if someone asked them something, but with their eyes cast down. So what were they protecting themselves against, what was it about being seen by another person? It wasn't being seen as such, since there they were, in plain sight, their physical selves present in the space, rather it was being seen to be who they were, and that was contained in the eyes. They were protecting themselves against someone looking into their eyes and seeing who they were, what was inside them, and the eyes were the entrance to that, for which reason they had to be concealed. Animal young behaved differently; if, for instance, a person suddenly came into a room full of kittens, the kittens would scurry away and hide, but what they hid would be their physical selves, since they were vulnerable to attack and could be killed and eaten. Perhaps the children's instinctive reaction to such intrusion was the same, yet in some more cultivated version, translated from the physical to the social world, from the body to the soul, which trembled with the fear of being taken.

Down on the ground floor, Geir pressed the button to open the elevator doors and Heidi took my hand as we walked the few meters to the front door, which closed slowly behind us, the barely audible buzz it made before clicking shut gradually drowned out by the sounds from outside, cars rumbling through the traffic lights, the voices of the customers sitting outside the Chinese takeaway, each with their own little box of noodles or rice in front of them, the voices and footsteps of those passing by, on their way to and from the city center.

"It's that way," I said, pointing across the square. The air felt warm, the sun angling down from above the Hilton hotel, a bit fuller in color now, a richer yellow than earlier in the day.

"I like Malmö," said Geir. "I wouldn't mind living here."

"What's stopping you?" I said.

Heidi took a little skip at my side. I gave her hand a little squeeze, and then another, and smiled when she looked up at me.

"Moving costs money. And money's in short supply, as you know."

"Everything's a lot cheaper here," I said.

"True," he said. "But we'd have to do an apartment swap, rather than buying, so there's not much chance, I'm afraid."

"I can see that," I said.

We went down the steps and crossed the square in front of the fountain, following the sidewalk along the street where the buses and taxis passed, then taking the first left toward the shop we were going to. It was called Delikatessen and apart from prawns they also sold lobsters, oysters, mussels, fish and crabs, as well as meat from selected suppliers, poultry, game, and well-hung beef, and cheeses too, and just about everything else one might associate with good eating, such as exclusive olive oils, red and white wine vinegars, olives, herbs and spices, salt flakes from France, freshly baked French bread and baguettes. On Saturday mornings the place was always full of people, Malmö's upper echelons, or so I imagined, getting the shopping in for their social gatherings in the evening, but when we opened the door and stepped inside, the place was empty apart from two assistants in chef's hats and white aprons, busy clearing away before closing time, so it seemed.

"I want to sit there," said Heidi, pointing at the tall bar stools that surrounded two tables by the window.

I pulled one of them out and lifted her up onto it, nodding at the same time to one of the assistants who had stepped up behind the glass counter ready to serve us.

"We'd like some prawns," I said.

"Certainly," he said. "How many were you thinking of?"

"We're four adults and four children," I said. "The children won't eat much, so maybe two and a half, three kilos? Something like that?"

"I'd say two and a half ought to do it," he said, snatching a white bag from a pile behind the counter with one hand, picking up his scoop with the other.

"Let's make it just over two and a half, then," I said.

"Right you are," he said, and began scooping the prawns into the bag while I cast a glance at Heidi, who was sitting with both hands flat on the tabletop, watching the assistant. Geir stood with his hands behind his back at the counter, looking at the oysters.

I went over to Heidi, lifted her up, and carried her over to the counter just as the assistant put the bag down on the shiny scales. The pointer shot up to a kilo and a half and dithered there for a moment.

"Can you see the lobsters over there?" I said. "They live at the bottom of the sea."

"I know," she said.

"Aren't they splendid?" I said.

She nodded.

Hauled up from the depths of the ocean and placed on display here, with their black peppercorn eyes and long, bright red tentacles.

"What's that?" she said, indicating the red plastic nets full of mussels lying on their bed of crushed ice.

"Mussels," I said.

"What?" she said.

"Musslor," I said. "Blåmusslor."

"Are they alive?"

"Yes."

"But they don't have eyes!" she said.

"No," I said. "The shell is like their house. They live inside it."

The assistant put a second bag on the scales. It weighed in at 1.3 kilos. His powers of assessment were impressive, I thought to myself, putting Heidi down and stepping up to the till on the counter at the other end of the narrow room.

"Anything else?" he asked.

"Some bread, perhaps. One of those baguettes over there. And maybe one of those," I said, pointing at one of the large, stone-shaped loaves.

"Certainly," he said, dropping each into separate bags. I took my card out of my back pocket.

"Can you think of anything else we need?" I said to Geir.

"No," he said. "Unless you were thinking of a crème brûlée for dessert?"

I shook my head.

"Ice cream and fruit."

"As ever," he said.

"Are you getting tired of it?" I asked him, glancing at the assistant as he entered the amounts into the till.

"Tired, me? Not at all. I'm a traditionalist. As long as you've got those wafers you always buy to go with it, that'll do me."

"You can't get them in Malmö. They're a Stockholm thing."

"I might have known," he said.

The assistant told me the amount.

"OK," I said, and put my card into the reader. I entered my PIN, which was no longer 0000, but nearly as easy to remember, since it consisted of the four figures in the top right corner of the key pad, 2536, took the two bags he handed me across the counter, waited for the message to appear on the display telling me the transaction was accepted, pulled out my card, put it in its little wallet, and slid it into my back pocket again as the assistant tore off the receipt and handed it to me.

"Thanks, have a nice day," I said, and stuffed the piece of paper into my other back pocket, which was a kind of archive for all my receipts.

"Same to you," he said.

"Come on, Heidi," I said. She was still standing at the shellfish counter looking at the display, but turned and came running to put her hand in mine, and we went out onto the sidewalk, where the air between the four-story buildings was warm and still.

"Where to now?" said Geir.

"The liquor store. Then Hemköp after that," I said.

"No need to break the bank for our sake," he said.

"It doesn't matter," I said. "Besides, I like spending money. The more the merrier."

"Tell me about it," he said.

"What's a sausage at slaughtering time," I said. "That's what Mom used to say when we did the Christmas shopping and there was something I was pestering her for. She never had much money, but if there was ever anything I needed, clothes for instance when I was at the gymnas, or later, when I was in college, she always gave me the money for it. I never understood that. If she didn't have any money, how come she could suddenly afford to give me some? Now I've figured it out. Money's relative. It's an incredibly vague entity. Whenever I buy clothes for the kids I always buy a great big pile, because they can't go without. Then I'll grab a couple of CDs while I'm at it, because I need music when I'm working, and that's where the money comes from. Or I might blow a couple of thousand on a fantastic pair of shoes. What happens then is there's no more money left in the account, or very little. So I go through all our pockets, all the cupboards and drawers, and scrape together what I can find, maybe pick up the deposit on all our bottles or something, and then I buy some milk, bread, and spaghetti, and ignore all the bills. After a while, the reminders start coming in, and if I've got the money I pay them off, if I haven't I'll ignore them until the next step. It's not that long ago that someone came around with a statement of claim or whatever it's called, which I had to sign. Eventually, it'll come to enforcement and they can seize your property. But long before that happens I'll have money coming in again and be able to pay. I never connect the clothes for the kids or the CDs with suddenly having no money left, or someone coming to the door with a claim, that's something else entirely."

"We could never live like that," said Geir. "In our house everything's planned and by the book."

"That doesn't surprise me," I said. "But it does make things a whole lot easier. It takes it out of you, not being able to manage things properly."

We came onto the square and Heidi let go of my hand and ran up to the fountain. Geir and I followed her.

"I'm not sure you're right about that," he said. "I'd love to just let things go sometimes. But I can't."

Heidi had put an ice-cream wrapper in the water, it bobbed gently up and down on the ripples made by the fountain. I recognized the wrapper, it belonged to an ice cream called Strawberry something. Strawberry Delight? Strawberry Dream? Pink ice cream with a white chocolate coating.

"To will is to have to will, as Ibsen put it," said Geir.

"Now is the time to shut up! was something else he said. But there's a saying I believe in. Or not a saying, exactly, more a popular belief, to the effect that losing money is a good sign, meaning more will be coming your way. I totally believe that. The more you tighten your finances, the narrower the channels become that the money goes through. If everything's wide open, there's always going to be room for more."

"If you ever get the Nobel Prize, it won't be for economics," he said.

"It's not a bad theory, is it? I could actually be on to something! I could write about the emotions of economics, instead of the mathematics of economics."

"You're the most optimistic person I know," he said. "A depressed optimist. That's what you are."

"It's got nothing to do with optimism. It's all about accepting the way of things. This is how it is. Either you've got money, in which case you buy stuff, or else you haven't, in which case you don't."

"But you've just been talking about all the stuff you buy when you haven't got any money."

"But I have got money! If I'd saved it to pay the bills next week, I wouldn't have had any."

Heidi floated her ice-cream wrapper all the way around the fountain. When she appeared again she waved at us.

"Come on," I said. "We've got to get going."

"I'm all wet," she said.

"You'll dry in the sun," I said, taking her hand in mine and walking on just as a double-decker bus stopped outside the entrance to the Hilton.

"I still remember what a fantastic feeling it was to find an ATM in Bergen that wasn't connected to my own bank, so I could take out money I didn't have. It was like Christmas. Or when someone unexpectedly agreed to lend me a couple of hundred kroner."

"Or twenty thousand."

"You'll get it back as soon as my advance comes in. Don't worry."

I had borrowed twenty thousand Swedish kronor from him, which he had taken from a savings account of his that he never touched, money set aside for harder times. Linda had borrowed a similar amount from her friends, who also had money put away for the future. When Linda and I started a joint account together, we arranged for an amount to be transferred automatically into a savings account once a month, but either there wasn't enough money in the account for the transaction to go through, or else we spent the savings as soon as they went in.

Linda wanted so badly for us to have a savings account with money in it to support our future and our children's future. It had enormous symbolic value to her. It was what proper families did, and she wanted more than anything else that our family should be a proper family. Her romantic dreams were about ordinary life.

We stopped at the crossing. Over by the Hilton, retirees from the bus were shuffling off along the sidewalk. A classic American convertible with the top down came cruising along Södra Förstadsgatan, its engine purring. In Arendal in the seventies American cars were as cool as you could get. Here it just looked out of place, some clueless idiot out showing off.

"Linda's right too," I said. "Even if you don't think so. But if it's going to be hell for me, it's going to be hell for everyone else too."

"Why wouldn't I think so?"

I gave a shrug.

The light changed to green and we ambled over the road in a little throng of pedestrians.

"I saw the look you gave me when she started talking about how awful it's going to be for her," I said. "I suppose that's what I meant."

"What sort of look was that?"

"You know, kind of a telling look."

"You think I'd give you a telling look about something relating to Linda while she was there? I'd never dream of such a thing."

"Well, it looked like it to me, anyway," I said, letting go of Heidi's hand for a second while I wiped my palm dry against my trousers, then taking hold of it again. "She saw it too, I think. That's why she went off like that."

I pushed open the door of the Systembolaget, the state-run liquor store, gave it an extra shove so Geir could come through too, grabbed one of the gray baskets with the black handles, and went through the little automatic barrier, already scanning the signs above the aisles to see where the white wine was.

"I can understand it's not going to be much fun for her if everyone in Norway hates you all of a sudden and you're in the hot seat like some criminal. But she's not the one getting the worst of it, is she? So yes, that's the way I look at it."

"Daddy?" said Heidi.

"Yes?"

"Is this soda?"

She pointed to a display stand with various shelves that could be spun round. They were full of green bottles of Jever's nonalcoholic beer.

"No," I said. "It's beer. Do you want soda?"

She nodded.

"All right, we'll get some in Hemköp after we're done here. OK?"

She nodded again. We found the white wine section and stopped in front of the shelves. They were arranged according to price, the cheapest on the right, then more expensive the farther left you went. It suited me fine; I knew nothing about wines, so whenever we had guests for dinner I just went with one a bit left of center and hoped for the best.

I put three bottles of Chablis in the basket and looked at Geir.

"Will that be enough?"

"I should think so."

I looked around for the cognac, locating it in one of the intersecting aisles closer to the checkout. I went over and stood there for a moment looking at all the labels, unable to recall the system of quality grades, the O's and the X's, and the differences between them, and ended up putting a half-bottle of a brand I hadn't tasted before in the basket before joining the line behind a man of about fifty who gave off a blend of the characteristic sportiness a polo shirt and a pair of khaki shorts can lend to a tanned frame, and the alcoholism his fatigued features and lackluster eyes otherwise seemed to indicate. He bought two cartons of white wine.

"First came the volcanoes, then the dinosaurs," said Heidi.

"That's right!" I said.

"And then came the people."

"Yes."

"But the dinosaurs didn't know they were called dinosaurs."

I looked down at her. She was staring at a man in a wheelchair who had joined the other line, his basket resting in his lap. It sounded like something I could have said. But I couldn't remember having done so.

"Who told you that?" I asked her.

"What?"

"About the dinosaurs."

"No one. Why is he sitting in a wheelchair? Is he sick?"

When we had traveled home after spending last Christmas in Jølster, Heidi had suddenly fallen ill on the journey, and by the time we got to Flesland, Bergen's airport, she was so feeble we had to borrow a wheelchair for her. She still talked about it. It was one of the events that stood out in her life so far.

"I don't know," I said, and put the basket down on the little counter before the checkout as the man in front of me placed the divider bar behind the second of his cartons on the conveyor.

"I don't suppose prawns are anything special to you, are they, now that I come to think of it?" I said to Geir as he went past the till, presumably to bag the wine as it came down the conveyor. "It's probably all you eat when you're on Hisøya."

"You might have thought of that before," he said.

"Paying by card?" said the assistant.

"Yes," I said.

"Six hundred and twelve, then," he replied.

"Yeah, it was a bit stupid of me," I said, inserting my card into the reader. "You might have said so, though."

"We're here to spend time with you. We could have boiled onion and it wouldn't make any difference. For goodness' sake, man."

Two people in the other lane looked across at us.

I didn't care for this, and turned away so all they could see was my back.

We were speaking Norwegian, that must have been it. Unless they happened to think we were a pair of gay men out with our surrogate child. Or our niece. Weren't gay men often close to their nieces?

"Thank you," said the assistant.

Why on earth would they think that?

It was enough me looking like an idiot, with the beard and the long hair. I looked like a has-been heavy-metal musician rapidly heading for his fiftieth birthday. Oh, the fleshy face, the chubby cheeks, the deep furrows, and that wispy beard.

Heidi clung to my leg all of a sudden. I looked around. There was an old terrier sitting against the wall in the bagging area at the end of the checkout, its leash wrapped around the leg of a chair.

"It's all right, I'm sure he's friendly," I said. "Walk on the other side of me as we go out."

She did as I said. As soon as we were outside she changed sides again.

We strolled along the sidewalk, the flagstones cast into shade, the warm air seeming even warmer now after the air-conditioned environment of the liquor shop, then passed into sunlight as we crossed the side street, which was edged by leafy deciduous trees. They were invisible in the same way as all the parked cars were invisible, something one usually failed to notice, apart from at the end of April and the beginning of May when they blossomed white, as if dressed with snow, all the way down the street.

My anxiety suddenly intensified, it felt like it came streaming from every extremity to lump together in my abdomen, and I looked down at Heidi walking beside me, the small steps she took as she gazed toward the windows of the shopping center on the other side of the road. I was in pain, such terrible pain. It was like everything had come apart. And although I knew the reason, the book I had written and the reaction it had provoked, I had no idea why the emotions it sparked should be so powerful, it was as if they had been separated from their origin and were now running wild. This was the anatomy of guilt. Guilt was in everything, spreading vaporously through my organism, pervading my very fabric with its ruin and destruction. It was a guilt that could no longer simply be traced back and attributed to the terrible thing I had done, it was now rampant in its own right.

We passed between the sidewalk advertising on one side and the bike racks on the other, then went into the supermarket, where, to our right, the cell phone provider 3 had set up a stand that seemed to be mostly made of cardboard, manned by two young men of about twenty who stood there trying to grab the attention of passersby so they could ask them which provider they used. If they asked me, I invariably mumbled something vaguely dismissive, I wasn't at all comfortable, their energy was so incredibly cheerful and positive, mine so dismissive and negative. Who was that? Vanja always asked. What did they say? What did they want?

Now they were both engaged in discussion with a woman of about fifty, and we walked past without hindrance into the big store, with its checkouts on one side and the combined kiosk, gambling station, and post office on the other. I grabbed a basket, went through the barrier with Heidi, who looked up at the TV monitor that hung from the ceiling as we came toward the camera.

"Do you want a banana?" I said.

She nodded, let go of my hand, and stared up at the monitor's reaction as she put first one, then the other arm in the air. I picked up one of the ripe bananas whose skin was speckled brown, which they had put out for children to take in a small box next to the regular, hard, yellow-green bananas, peeled it, and handed it to her.

"We need lemons, mayonnaise, soda, and mineral water," I said.

"Don't forget the ice cream and the fruit," said Geir.

"You're right," I said.

"You don't look that well, are you OK?" he said.

"Does it show?"

He laughed.

"You look worried to death."

"I'll be all right," I said. "It's probably just that I'd much rather it all wasn't happening. I don't want to upset people. I don't want to offend anyone. I don't want to wreck anything for anyone."

I put five lemons in one of the smoky bags, which seemed immediately to yield to them, suppressing its faint transluscence in favor of the yellow of the fruit where it bulged against the plastic, bringing even the pores of the outer rind to the fore.

"I know," said Geir. "But it's done now."

"Yeah, and it hurts like hell," I said, looking away to see where Heidi was. "Come on, Heidi!"

She came running, curled her hand into mine, and walked at my side as we went down the aisles, past the fish counter and the ready-made meals, the cheese and charcuterie counter, with its cheeses the size of barbell weights, salami sausages like baseball bats, past the island displays of bread, the rows of cookies, to the slanting shelves of carbonated drinks, where I put two one-and-a-half-liter bottles of Loka mineral water, one with citrus, the other without, into the basket, followed by four glass bottles of Fanta.

"It makes no difference your telling me I've done nothing wrong," I said. "I can tell myself that. I've written about myself and my life with my father, what can be so terrible about that? That's what I tell myself. But it doesn't help in the slightest. It has no bearing on the matter. Arguments don't help. Legal arguments don't help. Literary arguments don't help. I've overstepped a mark, and it's got to me."

"If the sociologists could understand that, maybe the discipline would have a future," said Geir.

"Understand what?" I said, looking up from the tubes of mayonnaise, which reminded me of my childhood, and the jars of mayonnaise, which I considered somehow more sophisticated.

"Social boundaries, the things that regulate what we do and allow us to exist side by side with each other, aren't abstract. They're not thoughts. They're concrete, as you say. If you overstep the mark, it hurts. That's what you're sensing now."

"Sensing? But it hurts like I killed someone. Oh! And not just anyone, but someone close to me. That kind of feeling. Like something irreparable has happened."

I glanced around. Heidi was nowhere to be seen.

"Jar or tube?" I said. "Real or light? French or Swedish?"

"Take one of each," he said. A tube of Swedish light, and a jar of real French."

"You're a genius," I said. "I'd never have thought of that."

"Where's Heidi got to?" he said.

"She'll either be at the ice cream or down by the pet toys."

We set off toward the middle aisle. A child screamed somewhere, but it was a baby, six months old at most. As we got to the corner I looked up the aisle. There she was, with a pet toy in her hand, the kind that squeak when you press them, just as she was doing.

"Come on, Heidi," I said. "We've got to pay now."

She put it down and came running back to us.

"Can we have a rabbit?" she said.

"We already had a rabbit," I said. "It didn't really work out that well."

"Can't we have another one?" she said. "One that's nicer?"

I laughed.

"You were so afraid of it," I said.

"No, I wasn't."

"A little bit," I said.

"I wasn't."

"We'll have to see," I said.

The rabbit had come from one of the nursery staff. It was Linda's project. Cage and rabbit were transported home and put in the corner of the kitchen. The rabbit was frightened, and we were too. None of us dared take it out of its cage. John dropped all sorts of stuff in there. After two days we had to take it back. Hopefully, the episode had had no adverse affect on Vanja and Heidi. The arrangement had been that we could borrow it and see how it went, so it wasn't that big a failure, not like the aquarium, when all the fish had died one after another over the course of the spring.

It hurt to think about it. The things we did were their childhood.

I stopped at the ice cream, picked out a tub of Carte d'Or with real vanilla, which I supposed was what the little black specks in the yellowish ice cream were, shards of vanilla pod, and put it in the basket. I looked at Heidi.

"You can decide what kind of ice creams you want. Have a look in there," I said, indicating the other counter where they had popsicles too. "Look at the poster and see which ones you want."

She studied the various sorts.

"That one," she said, pointing to a Piggelin. "No, I mean that one," she said, and pointed at a Daim.

"That's the biggest one they've got," I said. "Are you sure?"

She nodded, and I put three Daim and an ice-cream sandwich in the basket.

"There we are," I said. "Now we can go up and pay."

"Fruit?" said Geir.

"I'll get some from the stall outside the apartment. It's cheaper there. And better too."

We got in line, there were about ten other people in front of us. I put the basket down on the floor.

"Wait a minute," I said. "I forgot the wafers."

I hurried over to the far side of the supermarket and stared at the rows of wafers, there had to be fifty different varieties, but none of the fluted kind I wanted, or at least I couldn't see any. Maybe they had some more on the other side? Then, suddenly, on a lower shelf I hadn't noticed before, at a right angle to the other shelves, and separated from them by a two-meter-wide passage, in their blue-and-white packaging, were the Belgian wafers I'd only ever seen before in Stockholm.

Perfect.

I grabbed two packs and hurried back to the checkout, where Geir and Heidi were now sixth in line.

"Your evening's just been saved," I said, putting the wafers in the basket. "Belgian waffle wafers."

"Now I'm a happy man," he said.

I picked up the basket and kept hold of it in my hand as step-by-step we progressed slowly toward the till; there was no way in the world I was going to end up the sort of person who shoved their basket over the floor with their foot while they flicked through a newspaper they had no intention of buying, putting it back in the rack as soon as it got to be his turn. I took four lightbulbs from the shelf next to the conveyor; the bulb in the hall by the kitchen had gone, I remembered, and the one above the toilet in the bathroom.

Heidi slipped off to the end of the conveyor as our turn approached, clambering up onto the counter that was intended for bagging your purchases, then looking up at me in case I shook my head. I didn't, so she stayed put, watching the first items bought by the man in front of us come sailing along on their black conveyor-belt river, gently sliding ashore onto the sedate metal, there to be buffeted by the items that followed, in patterns of movement not unlike those made by sticks and plastic detritus in the quiet pools that came after swift-flowing sections of water, only much slower.

He placed the divider bar on the conveyor, thereby signaling that it was our turn, and I lifted the basket up onto the ledge that was there for the purpose, putting the items one by one onto the conveyor, the big bottles of mineral water upright so they could be easily scanned, but the motion caused them first to wobble, then to fall, one against the other, like a pair of drunks. The assistant was the young man with the funny voice and the crutch, he glanced up at me and uttered his mechanical hej. I infused my own with a degree of enthusiasm, thinking vaguely it would add some touch of humanity to his plight, this conveyor-belt reality he occupied, but forgetting to take into account my otherwise dismissive and disinterested body language that completely invalidated any hint of warmth there might have been in my voice.

"Hej," I said, taking my Visa card out of my pocket.

"One hundred and sixty-five, ninety," he said.

"OK," I said, noticing the top edge of the Hemköp customer card I hadn't used for some days, pulling it out and swiping it through the reader, though I wasn't sure why, it verged on the compulsive, because although I'd spent vast amounts of money there over the past few years and saved up tons of bonus points, as the monthly statements I received in the mail informed me, I'd never cashed them in, and since they ran out after a certain time the action of swiping the card had become fairly meaningless. On the other hand, I thought I might as well start now.

I inserted my Visa card, entered my PIN, and accepted the amount.

"A bag might have been practical," Geir said.

"Damn, I forgot," I said, and tried to catch the assistant's attention, though he seemed not to notice.

"Can I have a bag as well, please?" I said.

Would he say it was OK and dismiss the extra cost with a wave of his hand, or would he enter the amount and make me get my card out again?

"That'll be two kronor," he said.

You little shit. Fuck you.

I did my shopping there every single day.

"OK," I said, inserting my card again, entering my PIN again, accepting the amount again. By the time it was done, Geir and Heidi had filled the bag with our items and we could go back out into the warm, late-summer afternoon.

We bought strawberries on the square, and Heidi carefully carried one of the overfilled cardboard cartons all the way to the elevator, Geir and I trudging along behind with our shopping bags. In the elevator I realized I'd forgotten to get flowers. A bunch of white roses would have been nice for the table, setting off the fiery red of the prawns and the yellow of the lemons. Never mind, we would have to do without. I couldn't be bothered to go out again, even if the florist's was only across the square.

The elevator came to a halt and I shoved the door open with my elbow, holding it there for Geir and Heidi, who still had the little box of strawberries in her hands, cautious as if she were holding a small animal. Geir opened the door and as soon as I was inside I dumped the bags next to the row of shoes and went off to the bathroom, the one farthest inside.

"Mommy, Mommy, I carried the strawberries," Heidi called out.

I felt a brief tingle of happiness in my chest, at the same time registering that Vanja and Njaal were still in the bedroom as I pressed the bathroom door handle down. I dropped my pants and sat down on the toilet seat. Next to me was an issue of the Swedish football magazine Offside. Argentina was due to play in the Andes, where the air was so thin it was by no means unusual for players to pass out, they even had oxygen tanks ready to go!

I could hear Vanja's voice next door, then Njaal's. I guessed that Vanja was showing him her computer game, the one she got for her birthday. It was about dogs, and the idea was to get them to do various things. Most of the functions were still too difficult for her, but some she managed, like making the dog jump on and off a log to snatch different objects as they came flying through the air. Heidi had been given the matching version with cats, but she was still too little to get anything out of it and was happy enough watching her older sister play.

A small silverfish had paused on one of the floor tiles, perhaps twenty centimeters in front of my feet. It looked like a trilobite or some other small fossilized creature from prehistory. Such a simple creation. There was something crude and matter-like about it, as if it were a tiny blob of clay or a catfish that had been given feet.

I leaned forward to squash it under my finger, but the moment I moved it darted away toward the wall and vanished through a gap under the baseboard.

There were probably quite a few under the laundry baskets. And most likely in all the dust that had collected under the window in the corner, too. A little colony of silverfish.

Footsteps sounded in the hall, and since Vanja and Njaal were still in the bedroom it had to be Heidi. The children hardly ever used this bathroom, so even though the door was unlocked there was no reason to fear they would come in. It did happen on occasion, because they were by no means entirely predictable, though only rarely. With Linda it was different, if I heard her coming I would grip the door handle and press it upward in case she tried to press it down and come in. The first time Yngve had come to see us here he had asked for a key, finding it unthinkable to go to the toilet without being able to lock the door. It had been just as unthinkable for me too, or at least deeply alien, and for the first few weeks I had felt exposed and vulnerable, but then I got used to it. Somehow I always knew where everyone was and if anyone approached I would hear them. That we didn't have a key was because of Vanja and Heidi, so they wouldn't lock themselves in. It was about the only safety measure we had when it came to the children; all the sockets were open, all the shelves and cupboards unsecured, and the stove too, and the sharp knives and scissors lay within easy reach in one of the bottom drawers. Nothing had happened so far, and nothing would, because parents have a keen sense of what their children might conceivably get up to, and one thing I was certain I would never see was Vanja or Heidi with a big kitchen knife in their hands, or John crawling about on the stove like a little monkey. Moreover, I always knew exactly where they were, and almost always what they were doing. Of course, all these assumptions could be invalidated in the space of a few horrible seconds, but I didn't believe that would ever happen, and I never felt less than comfortable about their safety at home.

Outside the door, Heidi passed by and went into the bedroom. I picked the magazine up again and carried on reading. Once, we caught a ling in the sea off Torungen, I suddenly remembered. It had been windy, but the air had been warm; it must have been sometime in the summer. We were in the boat Dad bought when I was eleven or twelve, a seventeen-foot Rana Fisk with a twenty-five-horsepower Yamaha outboard. Yngve was with us, his hair blown to the side, and of course Dad, that dark figure of which I was so watchful. Waves chopped and dashed against the yellow fiberglass hull. The line, running barely visible through the air, down into the blue water. The first glimpses of a fish, which instantly lent depth to all the blue, rather like the first stars in a sky still light in early evening. A dense green shape, now here, now there, whiter with Dad's every pull.

What was it?

A long, regular body, yellow-gray and white, with a hideous face and wide, bulging eyes.

"It's a deepwater fish," Dad said. "A ling, I think."

Inquisitive and filled with pity, I stared at it. Its stomach had burst, he said, and dropped it onto the floor of the boat, where it lay lifeless, before he cast his line out again, and then I remembered I was holding one too, and tugged it hard, gripping it tight between my fingers.

The feeling of floating on the surface of such enormous depths.

Dad.

What had I done to him?

A stab of distress and terror went through my chest. A moment later, when I turned on the tap and looked at myself in the mirror, I saw no sign of my inner turmoil. If I hadn't seen that same face, those same eyes, so many times before, and associated them so closely with who I was, they could just as easily have belonged to someone else.

My eyes looked sad, my features stark and, with the deep furrows that lined my cheeks and brow, mask-like.

I twisted the thin pole with the little knob on the end and opened the blind, looked across at the hotel, above which the evening sun angled down, there were people sitting on the steps of the square and on the half-meter-high wall my children always wanted to balance on whenever we went to the park just along the road, and at the same time I took the towel from the peg and dried my hands. There was no getting away from the guilt I felt, it had transplanted itself from the abstract reality of the mind, where it could be countered by abstract means, to the physical reality of the body, where it could not be countered at all because the body had no means of defense but itself, and could only run, walk, sit, sleep, and a few other such things. It felt as if I were a room, and inside that room with me there was something horrifying. It was no use running, because if I ran, the whole room ran with me. There was no escape, for the simple reason that it was there. It didn't matter if what I'd done was reasonable, if I was within my rights or not, because it was there, indisputable, inescapable, and all I could do was wait until it was something that was there no more.

The door behind me opened, and I spun round.

It was Heidi. There were tears in her eyes.

"What's the matter, lilla tjejen?" I said, hanging the towel back on the peg.

She came up and wrapped her arms around my legs. I lifted her up and kissed her cheek.

"Won't they play with you?" I asked.

She shook her head and stared stiffly into space.

"Come on, you can stay with me and we'll make some dinner."

"I don't want to," she said.

I went out with her on my arm.

"How about a film, then?" I said. "Or Bolibompa? It'll be on in a minute."

She nodded.

I went through the hall and into the living room, where I put her down on the sofa – I could hear Linda, Christina, and Geir talking in the other room – and looked around for the remote. Normally it was on the bookshelf where the children couldn't reach it. But it wasn't there.

Oh, for crying out loud.

John started wailing in the bedroom. I heard Linda get to her feet, and a second later I caught a fleeting glimpse of her as she passed the open doorway while I scanned the long windowsill that ran the length of the far wall. It wasn't there either.

Heidi looked up at me.

"I can't find the remote," I said.

She stared toward the table in front of her. There it was, halfhidden under the newspaper Linda must have been reading while we were out.

"There it is," I said. "Now, let's see!"

Linda came in with John on her arm. He was curled up like a little monkey, pressing his cheek to her chest.

"Put Bolibompa on," she said.

"That's what I'm doing," I said.

When the sound came on and the picture appeared, John turned his head to see. Linda put him down next to Heidi, and he accepted this without protest. TV was like a drug to them.

"What time do you think we should eat?" said Linda.

"I don't know," I said. "Around seven, maybe?"

"What about the children? I can't see them shelling prawns."

"That's a point," I said. "I didn't think of them when we were shopping. Do we have anything? I can have a look," I said.

Njaal and Vanja came charging through the hall.

"Is Bolibompa on?" Vanja called out.

"In a minute," I called back, went into the kitchen, and opened the fridge. There were some eggs. Carrots, potatoes, yellowing broccoli. Half a bag of fish cakes. The freezer next to it was mainly full of things Linda's mother had made for us, and various cuts of meat she'd bought, besides some peas, a few half-empty bags of chicken drumsticks, a couple of loaves of bread we'd frozen and forgotten about. But oh, thank goodness, there on the bottom shelf was a pizza! I looked up at Linda, who was standing behind me.

"They'll be more than happy with pizza, don't you think?"

She nodded.

"I'll make it for them now," I said. "They can eat in front of the TV."

I took the pizza box out and put it on the counter, switched the oven on, found the scissors in the drawer, tore off the long strip along the side of the box, tipped it so the pizza itself, round and surprisingly heavy, slid out into my hand, snipped open the see-through plastic it was wrapped in, which was stiff and had a kind of crinkly crispness about it, nothing like the see-through plastic of the bags we bought our fruit in, which were looser in some way, or the thin cling film for wrapping food up before putting it in the fridge. Nor was it anything like the slightly thicker, more durable plastic that covered the corn-on-the-cob we sometimes bought, or the six-packs of beer.

"In that case we might as well eat after they've gone to bed," said Linda.

"Sounds good to me," I said, taking the pizza out through the opening I had made in the wrapper and allowing it to rest in my palm, as if my hand were a serving plate, while with the other I pulled out the metal drawer underneath the stove and took out a mottled brown or, more accurately, blackened baking sheet on which I placed the pizza before sliding it into the oven, crumpling the wrapper and taking it to the bin under the sink, which was so full I had to press the garbage down with my fists in order to make room. Just as I had done so and was about to close the cupboard door, momentarily occupied by the thought of the garbage rising slowly up to the lid again, the phone rang.

I went warily into the hall. Someone had intruded into our home, he or she was here now, ringing their presence out into the room. I paused at the table under the mirror and picked up the phone. It was an 04 number, meaning it was from someone in Malmö.

"Yeah, hello?" I said.

"Hi, Stefan here."

"Hi, Stefan!"

"How's it going, all right?"

"Fine," I said, noticing the two bags of groceries I'd dumped next to the shoes and forgotten all about. "How about you?"

"Fine, too. We were thinking of going to the beach tomorrow. Would you like to come with us? We can just take Vanja along, if that's better for you."

"Sounds great," I said. "Only we've got visitors at the moment, so I think we're going to be spending the day with them, I'm afraid."

"Oh, I see. It's short notice, I know. Still, not to worry."

"Some other time."

"Definitely. Speak to you soon, then."

"Yeah. Take care."

"Thanks, same to you. Hej då."

"Hej då."

I hung up, took the two bags with me into the kitchen and put them down on the table, put the paper bags of prawns in the fridge and the two loaves on the big cutting board, bent down to the oven and looked at the pizza that lay inside, illuminated in its little compartment as if it were on TV, but of course it was nowhere near ready yet, I had only put it in a few minutes ago.

Bolibompa's signature tune came from the living room. I went and stood in the doorway. Christina was sitting in a chair with Njaal in her lap, Linda on the sofa with John in hers, and Heidi snuggled up to her, Vanja on a chair in the middle of the floor. All the blinds were down, but there was still so much sunlight in the room it was hard to see the picture on the screen.

I ought to have sat down with Vanja in my lap. But I couldn't let Geir sit on his own in the other room. I could see what it would look like from his point of view, each of us sitting there with a child in our lap, watching children's TV. It didn't look good.

I went up to the back of Vanja's chair, put one hand on her belly and kissed the top of her head. She didn't so much as look up at me, concentrating all her attention on the television, and so I stepped past the table and went into the other room, where Geir was standing at the bookshelf.

"Going out for a smoke?" he said as he turned around.

"Good guess," I said. "Are you coming with me?"

He nodded, poured himself a cup of coffee, and stepped outside. I filled my own cup with what was left and followed him out. He had taken my chair again, and again my inner being protested at the way everything was wrong with the angle at which I now had to sit. Maybe it was the fact I had my back to the door that made me so uncomfortable. I put my feet up on the railing and lit a smoke.

"Njaal and Vanja are getting along all right," I said.

"Yes," he said. "They're doing great together. Christina's happy too."

"Is she?"

"Yes, she likes being here. Plus it's a joy for her to see Njaal having such a good time."

"I don't understand that," I said. "About being here, I mean."

"I like it here too."

"It must be the mess of the place."

"Yeah, it's that as well. There's a nice, relaxed feel about things. It feels free."

"I'm glad you think so," I said. "Personally, I'm anything but relaxed."

"You're not stressed by us being here, are you?"

"No, not at all. It's all this business about Gunnar."

"There's nothing you can do about it. Just let it go. What happens happens."

"Yes," I said.

Our top-floor neighbors in the building farther along were sitting out on their balcony eating. They were perhaps twenty meters away, but up here among the rooftops it was close enough to be encroaching, and when I was on my own and they were sitting out I could hear everything they said if I concentrated and they didn't lower their voices the way they might if they knew I was there. On the other side, at the end of our own building, I could stare right into the kitchen of an elderly couple, they often sat there smoking, and after three years their habits were nearly as familiar to me as my own. I assumed they looked at me in the same way; at any rate, our eyes occasionally met and we always looked away. Such visual encounters were strange, our entering fleetingly into each other's minds in that way, they into mine, certainly, they meant we somehow knew each other, balancing continually between seeing and knowing on the one hand, and looking away and not wanting to know on the other. Opposite, in the apartments belonging to the same building as the balcony couple, I could likewise gaze in on the private lives of families, couples, and singles, usually without interest, merely noting what I saw, but every now and then something happened that insisted on occupying me for a moment, for instance the time one couple, the corner of whose kitchen was as much as I could see, suddenly were a family with a little baby. When the child was visible, half seated, half lying in its baby bouncer, it was as if it were presiding over them, because everything they did was in some way related to its wants and needs, which was a completely new thing.

"You've done nothing wrong," said Geir.

"But I have, obviously," I said. "I'm trying to live with it."

"Your dad's dead. Your grandma's dead."

"And your empathy's dead."

"Look who's talking."

"Imagine there's a life after this," I said. "If we take that thought seriously. Only the body dies. The soul lives on in the world to come, in whatever form. What if it's true? I mean, really true. It struck me the other day. What if there is life after death? It'd mean my dad's out there somewhere waiting for me. And he's going to be angry as hell."

Geir laughed.

"You can relax. He's dead as a dodo."

"Gunnar isn't, though."

"But what can he do? OK, he can sue you. But for what? Defaming your father's name? He wasn't exactly Jesus, was he?"

"Gunnar says I'm a Judas. In which case he must have been Jesus, since he's the one I'm betraying."

"If he was Jesus, that makes your grandmother the Virgin Mary. And your grandfather was Joseph, the carpenter. Besides, Jesus didn't have a son to betray him."

"I wonder if it was actually Brutus he meant. He was a kind of son. Brutus Juliussen. Et tu, Brute? No, I only ate one."

"You don't have to say everything that comes into your mind, you know. Kids do that. Adults can put their utterances through quality control first."

"I remember crying when I read about Julius Caesar. His death. I always did whenever I read biographies. Because of course they all die. Thomas Alva Edison. Henry Ford. Benjamin Franklin. Marie Curie. Florence Nightingale. Winston Churchill. Louis Armstrong. Theodore Roosevelt."

"You read Theodore Roosevelt's biography when you were a kid?"

"I did, yes. There was a series. About twenty of them, I suppose. One on each. Most were about Americans. A lot of presidents. Walt Disney, I remember him. Robert Oppenheimer. No, I'm joking. But Abraham Lincoln, at any rate. And when they died, no matter how, I always cried. But in a good way."

"Because it wasn't you!"

"No, no, it wasn't that. It was more that they'd overcome all this injustice in their lives and eventually succeeded in what they wanted to do. It would have been a lot sadder if they had died before achieving what they were meant to. Like Scott. Scott was bad, I was out of it for days."

"He probably wasn't happy about it either."

"Whereas Amundsen's death was a bit more ambivalent. He did what he set out to. And then there was something decent about him vanishing while trying to save someone else."

I stubbed out my cigarette and got up.

"But what about Nansen, what did he actually do? I mean, what did he achieve? Were there any discoveries? Did he reach somewhere first? I never actually got what it was about him."

"You may as well ask," he said, getting to his feet. "He crossed Greenland on skis, and was frozen in by the ice on board the Fram."

I opened the door and went inside.

"I think I got frozen in one winter," I said over my shoulder. "The house was like a fridge."

"Then there was all that stuff about his refugee passports," Geir went on behind me. "And Quisling, of course."

"There we go again. Gunnar called me a quisling too."

"Who's Nansen then?"

"I suppose he is," I said, and sat down again. "It can't be my dad, anyway. He was useless on skis."

When Bolibompa was finished, I moved the IKEA camp bed that Njaal had slept on the night before into the children's room so we could sit in the living room in the evening and not have to worry about waking him up. After that I got started on the dinner while Linda and Christina put them all to bed and Geir sat on a chair in the kitchen so we could keep on gabbing. I put the prawns in a big green bowl, sliced the lemons, and laid them out on a green dish, cut the bread and arranged it in a basket, took four plates and four wineglasses out of the cupboard, got the butter and mayonnaise from the fridge, carried it all out onto the front balcony, where the sun was still shining in that hazily unreal way it does on a summer evening when the shadows grow long and the day draws to an end, yet the air is still warm. When people finish their jobs and turn toward home with the sun still blazing, yet slowly sinking in a great blue sky.

The children's voices drifted through the half-open window of their room and out onto the balcony. They were loud and giggling, as boisterous as they were only at bedtime. I set the table, then stood for a moment with my hands curled around the metal railing, looking down on the square below. The shadows of the buildings opposite almost covered the entire area. But the wall beneath me was lit up, the windows sparkling in the sun.

In the kitchen I rinsed the strawberries and put them in a white bowl, and got the wine and mineral water out of the fridge.

"That's about it," I said. "A glass of wine while we're waiting?"

Geir nodded and followed me out. As I opened the door and stepped out onto the balcony, a great big seagull took off from the table, twisting its body away as it flapped its wings, and the next second it was airborne and gone. In its beak was a prawn, and a few others lay scattered next to the bowl and on the wooden decking.

"Did you see that?" I exclaimed.

"How could I miss it?"

"The cheeky bastard."

"What do you expect? A bowl of prawns left out on a deserted sixth-floor balcony. It's an open invitation, isn't it?"

I sat down, pressed the corkscrew into the cork and twisted it a few times before pulling it toward me until it released from the neck of the bottle with a gentle thwop. The dark green glass misted. It was such a fine color. Cool green, bottle green, fjord green. And then the pale yellow of the wine in the shiny glass.

"Skål," said Geir.

"Skål," I said, taking a sip and lighting a cigarette. The taste that assailed my palate as I bent my head to the unmoving flame of the lighter reminded me of summer nights in Kristiansand when I was still a teenager and filled me with the urge to drink until I dropped.

"Nice wine," I said.

"Lovely," he said.

That was one of the things Gunnar had accused me of, drinking and smoking dope when I was still at gymnas in Kristiansand. Partly, I supposed, he believed it to be a sign of poor character, meaning I was unreliable and possibly also deranged, certainly not a decent human being, and partly it was meant to explain why I apparently hated Grandma enough to write six books about her to tarnish her name. I understood what he'd written, it was all somehow within the bounds of a logic I knew, but he hadn't written to me, he'd written to the publisher. Did he think they would pull the novel because its author had drunk beer in his youth, and maybe even smoked dope, and for that reason was surely a despicable person? It didn't matter, I still felt that was what I was, a despicable person, but it was my emotions that hadn't changed since I was sixteen, not my reasoning. My reasoning saw things differently. I knew who I was and what I was worth. I knew, too, that being human meant being inadequate, to be human was to err and never quite be good enough. When I looked around me, that was what I saw. Weakness everywhere, shortcomings and flaws, often congealed within a character in the form of self-righteousness, smugness, and conceit. Humility, a word so often bandied about in public contexts, was something hardly anyone knew the meaning of anymore. Only those who had every reason to be conceited, those of real caliber, showed no trace of conceit, only they were humble. Conceit and self-righteousness were part of a defense mechanism without which a person would be crushed under the weight of their own weaknesses, shortcomings, and flaws, and that fact underlay almost every discussion I witnessed, verbal as well as written, in newspapers and on television, but also in my immediate surroundings, in the private sphere. Such weakness could not be admitted, since so much would be lost, and the form of those discussions and the power of the media resolved it by endowing it with their strength. That was why opinions were so important in society, through opinions we appropriated a strength and supremacy we did not possess. That was the function of form here, to obscure the weakness of the individual. Any joining together, around a set of morals, a bureaucracy, an ideology, obscured the weakness of the individual. I knew this because it was what I saw, but when I encountered such things myself, that knowledge was preempted by my emotions, which mechanically fell in with them, slinging me off into the nightmare of feeling myself guilty or inferior. In my dealings with the tax authorities, the bank or credit companies, I was consumed with guilt. Sneaking around the subdivision gardens I was consumed with guilt. Dropping off and collecting the kids from nursery I was consumed with guilt. I knew that I was not inferior to anyone I met there, my weaknesses and shortcomings were no greater than theirs, but they weren't representatives of themselves, they were representatives of a system in which there were rules, and those rules were very simple: if you followed them you were a good person, if you didn't you were a bad person. I tried to follow them, but because I was undisciplined I often found myself breaking them. I knew the reason, it wasn't because I was bad, sloppy, or lackadaisical, but knowing why could in no way make up for what the eyes of the system saw, which was someone who didn't follow the rules, and this I incorporated into the person I was. Whenever I saw a real work of art or read real literature, all this was brutally shoved aside, for there was another dimension to being human, something quite different, of a different quality, dignity, and significance, it was what had inspired medieval man to build such enormous cathedrals against whose magnificence they became what they actually were: lowly, insignificant, and inconsiderable beings. Tiny little farts of life, one could say. Yet they had built them! They were creators of astonishing, otherworldly beauty, but they were farts too. This was the truth of being human. It was important and unimportant at the same time. Weakness was important, and greatness was important. But not what lay in between. The kind of weakness that hid away in the crowd and believed itself to be strength, that saw neither weakness nor greatness, was what I, driven from counter to counter, allowed myself to be intimidated by and to which I submitted. The yearning to drink until I dropped was the yearning to remove myself from it all, if only for a few hours, and the yearning to write something fantastic, something truly splendid and otherworldly, was part of the same thing. It wasn't an escape from trivial everyday things, because life itself is trivial, but an escape from trivial life's invasion of my self, which forced on me the idea that I wasn't a good and decent person but a fool, conceited and inadequate, and which had been forcing that same idea on me ever since I was sixteen and started drinking in Kristiansand, under my uncle's ever-watchful eye, or so it felt. What I yearned for and had been oblivious to at that time, but which twenty years later I had managed to identify and which was totally unrealizable, was what Hölderlin had expressed when he penned that simple plea: "Come out into the open, my friend."

What was "the open"?

It was freedom, it was utopia.

But what did it mean?

Certainly not that we should talk about everything, account for everything, abolish the borders between ourselves, others, and the world, because that would only be to set up new borders somewhere else and to let the human prevail, and what would happen then, and happen soon, was that reality would be gone.

What Hölderlin meant no one can know for sure anymore. Like all the other Romantics, Hölderlin was a child of the French Revolution, of liberty, equality, and fraternity, and that radical transformation of the old societal order must to them have seemed like a sudden opening through which a whole new potential was revealed. The prevailing order, society's order or the world order, makes all other ways by which life might be organized seem threatening, dangerous, or corrosive, for which reason such possibilities are not real alternatives, until its own inconsistencies bring it toppling down, to be replaced by a new order, which then becomes the prevailing order that for all the world must not be tampered with. But reading Hölderlin it is difficult to understand "the open" as a political category, concerned with class, relations of production, or material conditions of life. No, the open as Hölderlin sees it was, I imagined, an existential category. Hölderlin was a poet, and what was utopian to a poet was a world without language. Poetry tried to enter into the space between language and the world so as to stand before the world just as it was in itself, but conveying that insight, which perhaps was the oldest of all insights, or committing it to paper, could only be done by the intervention of language, and what had been won was then Orpheus-like and instantly lost. In the world outside language, one could only ever be alone.

But what kind of world was that?

A world without language was a world without categories, where every single thing, no matter how modest, stood out in its own right. It was a world without history, in which only the moment existed. A pine tree in that world was not a "pine," nor was it a "tree," but a nameless phenomenon, something growing up out of the ground, which moved when the wind blew. Indeed, if one stood on top of a hill one could see how these living organisms swayed this way and that as the wind passed over the flat ground, and one could hear the rushing sound they made. This sight, and this sound, could not be conveyed. As such, it would be as if they didn't exist. But they did, and do. All it takes is one step and the world is transformed. One step and you enter the world of no names. It is blind, and you see the blindness. It is chaotic, and you see the chaos. It is beautiful, and you see the beauty. It is open, this is the open, and it is meaningless, this is the meaningless. It is also divine, indeed this is the divine. The little blue box with its red sun and the coarsened black surface of its sides, inside, the white matchsticks with their red, bead-like heads of phosphorus rest as if in a bed, is divine as it lies there motionless on the kitchen shelf with its thin covering of dust, faintly illuminated by the light of day outside the window, which slowly darkens as a black blanket of cloud drifts in over the city, and the first electrical charges snap through it at hurtling speed, following their unpredictable paths, thunder rumbling heavily in the sky. The wind as it picks up, and the rain that begins to fall, this is the divine. The hand that grasps the box, pushing the tiny bed out with the tip of an index finger to extract a matchstick, is a divine hand, and the fiery flame that flares up as the hand strikes the red phosphorus bead against the coarse surface, becoming, in the space of a second, a steady, much gentler flame, is the flame of the divine. Yet it burns in the shelter of our language, it burns in the shelter of our categories, it burns in the shelter of all the relations and connections those categories establish. The thought that a state of human innocence once existed, an uncomplicated nearness to the world, in what mythology calls the Garden of Eden, the place from which we come and to which we long to return because there we were at one with our surroundings and with God in a kind of original state of nature, is treacherous in that it implies time, a before and a now, whereas in reality only the now exists, in reality there is but one time for everything: the flame of the divine is burning now, the Garden of Eden exists now, all it takes is one step and you are there. But that step is impossible for us to take, for we are humans, and it is a step that can lead us only into the inhuman.

To be human is to be several. To be social. The social world is a community. The boundaries of the community are the boundaries of the language. When Hölderlin finally stepped into the open he vanished into madness. In his poems he is not mad, but nor are they in the open, they stand within the social world, looking in at the open. This is what religion has always done. Olav Nygaard called his collection of poetry Ved vedbande, which is to say at the boundary of the divine. Not within the divine, but at its edge. When religion is dismissed as superstition, and poetry becomes marginalized and no longer believes in its own significance, the open vanishes from the sphere of the human, which closes in on itself, since nothing outside it any longer exists.

Is that a loss? As long as what is outside the human sphere remains impossible to reach, as long as the world in its essence can never manifest itself to us, but merely reveal itself in our language and categories, in other words as something within the human sphere, and the world without language, outside the sphere of the human, is a utopia in the actual sense of the world, a nonplace, why should we strive toward it? Why not simply turn away?

The reason is that it is where we are from, and where we are destined to return. It is because the heart is a bird that flutters in the chest, it is because the lungs are two seals through which our air smoothly passes, it is because the hand is a crab and the hair a haystack, the arteries rivers, the nerves lightning. It is because the teeth are a stone wall and the eyes apples, the ears mussels, and the ribs a gate. It is because it is always dark inside the brain, and still. It is because we are earth. It is because we are blood. It is because we must die.

Death, that great restorer of stillness, is outside the sphere of the human too and cannot manifest itself to us, for as it comes to us we cease to exist, much as language ceases to exist as it comes to that which is without language. Death is what the human sphere borders, the absence of language is what our human world borders, and it is against its darkness that we and the world shine. Death and the material world are the absolute, unattainable to us, for as we become them we cease to be ourselves. Our world, shining against the darkness of the it, is however not absolute, but relative and inconstant. Natural science is relative, morality is relative, social science, philosophy, and religion are relative, everything within the sphere of the human is relative. The distinction between discovery and invention is not great, and when it comes to their consequences is nonexistent. Did red and white blood cells exist in the seventeenth century? Yes, they did, but not to the human mind. They were in other words a part of the world but not of our reality. That reality is our world, and for that reason the world of the seventeenth century was different from the world of today, though the sky and the earth and the twinkling stars are of the same nature and material now as then. Darwin wrote a book, and whereas biological nature before Darwin existed spatially, after Darwin it existed temporally. The world was the same, reality changed. To describe the world is to establish reality. This is the same thought Harold Bloom expresses when he writes that Shakespeare invented man. When Shakespeare's characters step forward on the stage and reason with themselves, as if aside from the action yet still a part of it, haunted by doubt or stricken by love, at odds with themselves or astonished at themselves, man is then no longer merely a creature of action, a seat of emotions, but also a locus in which these emotions are confronted by a reflective self. It is the appearance of this self that arises from Shakespeare, in Bloom's opinion, prompting him with some justification to claim that Shakespeare invented humanity, since only when something becomes visible to others besides the single individual does it become real. Reality, our human reality, consists of all that is visible and may be perceived within and between us. Whenever that changes, reality changes too. This is why Greek Antiquity has been such a point of reference in Western civilization for more than two thousand years, and continues to be; so many of our conceptions about the world and about humanity were founded in that culture. History, philosophy, politics, natural science; everything comes from there. The only aspects of our own culture that don't come from there are religion, which is Jewish, and the machine, which is our own. That a culture as supreme as the Greek, with all its theoretical advances, looked on religion with such mild disdain is not surprising, though their dismissive attitude toward technology most certainly is, not least given their increasingly skilled craftsmanship. Yet if we accept Arendt's idea that the ancient Greeks sought freedom in the public domain and found the essence of humanity to be there, in what could be laid out in front of everyone, whereas in everything concerning day-to-day subsistence, the material needs of human beings, they saw constraint and necessity, their lack of interest in mechanics and technology, in practical knowledge, becomes easier to understand. The Greeks invented democracy but were unable to conceive of the water closet. Quite as extraordinary is the fact that these people who invented history were unfamiliar with the diary. Still, it surely was not the case that everything to do with the home lay in shadow, a kind of unarticulated zone of reality, with only what went on in public having actual existence by virtue of being formulated there for all, because the private sphere too enjoyed its own stage in Ancient Greece, in drama, more precisely the comedies, which dealt with the less elevated stuff of life and were founded on recognition. The freedom that lies in laughter is quite different from that which lies in the expression of virtues, which is perhaps why Arendt doesn't mention it, since it strives toward nothing, establishes nothing, changes nothing, distinguishes nothing, but exists simply for the moment, having no other purpose than to make it tolerable.

What do we laugh at in comedy? The answer is everything we deem to be base and normally conceal: the life of the body, excrement, copulation, bodily noises, and all human properties that pretend to be something they are not, impossible for a person to admit to: envy, conceit, avarice, self-righteousness, self-effacement, unscrupulousness, ambition, demanding esteem when none is appropriate. The striving to be something other than what one is, is the theme of comedy. Comedy exposes, and the humor lies in the gap revealed between the world as it wants to be and the world as it is. In that exposure lies an insight to the effect that the social world is a game that proceeds according to certain rules, some things are hidden, some are shown, and that in a way we live an illusion. The game depends on everyone taking part, the illusion that everyone believes in it. Comedy breaks that contract and as such it is the truest and most realistic of all genres. It is liberating in the sense that what it says is: this is what it really means to be human, and all of us are human. Yet it also constrains, a hindrance to anyone who wishes for something else and who believes it possible to elevate himself above this lowly world of excrement, copulation, envy, conceit, and constant misunderstandings, in other words anyone who insists on ought and should instead of is. Laughter is in this respect a powerful social force, one of the strongest corrective mechanisms of all; few things are more humiliating than being laughed at in public, and in order to avoid it a person must keep his head down and stay with everyone else. In this way, laughter on the one hand exposes the social game, and on the other keeps it going. Laughter is counterrevolutionary and anti-utopian: he who laughs at everything laughs also at the dictatorship of the proletariat, and if everyone laughs at the revolutionary there will be no revolution. If everyone had laughed at Semmelweis, mothers and newborn infants would still be dying of childbed fever. If the Germans had laughed at Hitler, he and his ideas would have been rendered harmless. But they did not laugh, they were earnest, they wanted something, the supreme, and in the supreme tragedy prevails, and tragedy is no laughing matter.

But if comedy is the truest and most realistic of all genres, drawing all things and all people into the real world, the body and its illusionless reality, how are we then to understand tragedy? Tragedy concerns the same thing as comedy: the rise and the fall. So why is the fall comical in the comedy and tragic in the tragedy? How come we don't laugh at Oedipus? He thinks he's something other than what he is. How come we don't laugh at Hamlet? He doesn't know who he is or what to do; ignorance and restlessness are his plight. How come we don't laugh at little Hedvig who shoots herself? Hasn't she misunderstood everything?

In that which is at one with itself there is no distance, and since distance is laughter's and comedy's point of departure, nonidentity its prerequisite, the only thing comedy and laughter cannot disturb is identity. That which does not pretend, which is not something else, that which is what it is. Dostoevsky's masterpiece The Idiot is about just that. The novel was born as a comic genre with Cervantes's Don Quixote, in which the author allowed the idea of the great, cultured world to be played out in the small, mundane world, which is to say the world as it was, with windmills, sheep, decrepit steeds, donkeys, and drunken bandits, through which rode a thin and ailing old man and his fat little companion. With Madame Bovary, Flaubert pursued that novel's demystifying, reality-oriented aspect; in this case it is the idea of romantic love that collides with the world as it actually is, and which drives the main character to her death. Both Don Quixote and Madame Bovary are cynical novels insofar as they do not believe, yet scorn those who do. That what Don Quixote and Madame Bovary believe in is made so clearly illusory, thereby positioning the novels on the side of truth, and that both are lovingly portrayed, recognizing the universally human nature of their weaknesses and flights from reality, does nothing to alter this. The Idiot is the opposite of Don Quixote and Madame Bovary. The Idiot is an anti-comedy. It turns the logic of comedy on its head, exposing the cynical world, scorning those who laugh at the emptiness of life, doing so by means of its confrontation with the unaffected human. Oh, what is it about the unaffected as a human quality that causes everyone in its vicinity to despair, unease to swell, chaos to loom, for no other reason than its mere existence? Prince Lev Nikolaevich Myshkin believes that what he sees, what is shown to him, is what it is, and that whatever is said is meant sincerely. He is oblivious to the ulterior motive, he does not understand irony, he is blind to the roles people play. He has no idea that the social world is a game. He is at one with himself, and assumes everyone else is too. But they are not, and his ignorance of this is sufficient on its own for the game to disintegrate, in that he gives them a vantage point from which to view it from the outside, a place outside the social world from where it becomes visible to them, thereby exposing its arbitrary nature. Roles are meaningful within the framework of the game, but as soon as the game is revealed to be just that, a game, they become meaningless. Who do you then become? The person you are? What does that mean? Myshkin is himself, the person he is. He is genuine. He is indivisible, no one's twin, no doppelgänger. For that very reason he is doomed to remain outside humanity. A society comprising genuine individuals taking everything at face value is a society in which nothing can be concealed, nothing kept secret, no real variation established. In other words, the genuine is the opposite of the social. The social world classifies and groups, excludes, suppresses, elevates. The social world is a system of differences, a world in which everything and everyone is graded and differentiated. The idiot nullifies all differences, in his realm everyone is equal. It is not his goodness that causes the social world such problems, but his authenticity. From a revolutionary perspective in which the complexity of the literary character is seen to develop from Odysseus's simple, archaic smartness to explode, as it were, in Hamlet's wild and contradictory Renaissance self, heralding the modern individual we know, Dostoevsky's Mishkyn represents a regression, something deeply reactionary and unmodern, if not directly archaic, a kind of pre-Homerian man, on whom both Odysseus's ingenuity in fooling the Cyclops with his clever name game and Plato's cave allegory would be lost. Indeed, is Myshkin not somewhat reminiscent of that Cyclops, the one-eyed enemy imprisoned by his literal understanding of language, unable to comprehend that Odysseus is not being straight with him when he tells him his name is Nobody? Dostoevsky was a deeply reactionary author, firstly in the fact that he was searching for meaning, in all seriousness and with eyes open, secondly in the fact that he was searching for it not in politics or ideology, in science or philosophy, but in religion, and that he found it there, in simplicity. The great threat in all of Dostoevsky's novels is nihilism, the spinning, flashing tombola of the social world on the fairground of meaninglessness, in the black night of emptiness, and what he defends himself so fiercely with, time and again, is the holy and the simplicity of the holy. Dostoevsky cherishes simplicity. His novels are hugely complex and chaotic, a tumult of characters and voices, not a quiet moment in one of them, quite without the slow and sleepily hypnotic passages, the lazy days of summer in which little or nothing happens, that occur in Proust, for instance; Dostoevsky is all pace, a series of highly intense, near-hysterical scenes on the brink of madness, but in all his depictions of a violent and uncontrolledly spiraling world, in his best books there is always, sooner or later, a light, and surrounding the light is silence. Dostoevsky's light is not dim and soft like an oil lamp, nor bright and dissecting like our modern strip lighting, but white and almost all-obliterating, like flaming magnesium, one might imagine, which burns away details and nuances and gives one the feeling that it is not what is illuminated that is important, but the light itself. That difference, between the light and what is illuminated, is the difference between premodern reality and modern reality, and where the former is singular and simple, the latter is plural and grotesquely complex. Dostoevsky turned toward that light, he wanted to believe in it, but the will of that wanting, which only a person living in the complexity of the illuminated knows, made it impossible, it being the very opposite of belief. Wanting to believe is impossible, a contradiction in terms. Had he believed, he would not have written. But he could feel it.

What was it he felt he wanted? What is the light in Dostoevsky's novels? It is grace. And grace is the undifferentiated, that which is without difference. It cannot be grasped by language because language is in its very nature differentiating. In that way, Dostoevsky's grace resembles Hölderlin's concept of "the open," but whereas Hölderlin's open pertains to the material world of rivers and clouds, Dostoevsky's grace pertains to the social world. In that world grace nullifies all distinctions, in grace all are equal. The radicalism of this is huge and almost unthinkable. Yet it is this, and nothing else, that Christianity is about. There is no difference between anyone. The most despicable person is as worthy as the best. Jesus said, whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. He is a man, as you are a man; he is you. Strike him not. Such a thought is inhuman in that it comes from outside the social world. Indeed, it is a divine thought. Adolf Hitler is as worthy as the Jews he gassed to death. In this our identity dissolves, being established by our very differences, and this is what makes Christianity unfeasible, we cannot think ourselves into oblivion, it would be too much to lose, since it is all we have. Nor can we remain the same without losing everyone else. The undifferentiated is not a category, it is a place in which all meaning vanishes; regardless of what you possess and how inalienable it is to you, it has no value there. This is what none of us grasps. And no matter Dostoevsky's intentions when he wrote his masterpiece, what Myshkin brings with him none of us wants, it is almost a nightmare vision. The idiot is he who gapes and laughs with those who laugh at him, his face a question mark. The idiot is the cynic's antipode. Between them lies the choice. The cynic asks, But who will forgive? The idiot replies, I will.

The sun that shone directly down on the balcony where we sat was so warm that beads of sweat trickled from my hairline, though it was well into evening, and so bright I wondered whether to go in and get my sunglasses. I wondered too if I should pinch a couple of prawns, their faint salty smell and the sight of the pink, armored creatures in itself awoke in me an urge to taste their fresh oceanic flesh. But I decided not to. Wearing sunglasses during a meal was bad form, and digging in before everyone had come to the table was even worse.

Geir sighed.

"What are you moaning about?" I said.

"Who's moaning? That's your department."

I lit a cigarette and leaned forward in my chair, resting my forearms against my thighs.

"All right, so I'm moaning. Can I make amends with a joke?"

"Jokes and moaning, it's all the same in your case."

"What did Stevie Wonder say when he walked past a prawn trawler on the quayside?"

"I don't know, what did he say?"

"Hi, girls!"

Geir grinned and put his feet up on the balcony. I leaned back in my chair and swept the perspiration into my hair with my middle and ring fingers, making sure the burning cigarette between my index and middle fingers didn't make contact.

The sounds from the children's room had died down; most likely they were listening to a story. I took a sip of the wine. I'd never told anyone that I preferred a soft drink. Nor that I favored drinking tea with prawns, even in the summer, the way I'd done when I was growing up, ever since then I'd always felt the two things went together.

A prawn's eye had separated from its head and lay on its own on the side of the bowl. It looked like a peppercorn. Their tentacles, strewn about their chubby bodies, resembled whiskers. That live prawns were pale and sleet-colored, bordering on the transparent, much like dirty windows, hardly seemed credible when you saw them cooked, their color being such a strong and splendid characteristic you could hardly imagine that nature should squander it on something dead. The lobster, on the other hand, in its somber, steely armor not unlike certain suits of armor in the Italian Renaissance, black and articulated, was certainly finer living than when the boiling water so swiftly extinguished its life and the red-orange color seeped into the shell. To be sure it was a delicate thing to behold, and more elegant, but compared to the beauty of the black and all its associations with power and strength, the refinement of red was nothing. How different in the case of the prawns. Alive they looked almost like office workers of the ocean, in death like a company of ballet dancers.

Below us a bus stopped with a sigh at a red light. The traffic that streamed along the street, which continued out to the grassy coastline and the beach, slowed to a halt on the other side of the lights. Now it was the turn of those coming from the north, but the street on that side was deserted. The pedestrian crossing, ticking with the appearance of its green man, or green person as I supposed it was called now, was deserted too. A sliver of the feeling that could come over me at night, when the lights changed in the empty streets without anyone there to see them, implanted itself in my mind like a note slipped under a door. The image it conjured, which I could so vividly entertain, was of a world without people. All the houses empty, all the streets deserted, no cars, no buses, just the lights changing back and forth at the crossing down below, and at other crossings throughout the city. There would be movement, vegetation creeping forth everywhere, albeit at its own inimitably slow pace, pushing up through the concrete and the asphalt, gradually subsuming everything around it, and there would be animals in the streets. But none would heed the lights and their ticking men. They would belong to an empty system. The beings that once inhabited that system, which had created these lights in order to regulate their own movements, existed no more and would never return.

I leaned forward and stubbed my cigarette out against the upright of the railing in front of me, dropping the end at my feet for want of an ashtray, the discreetest thing I could think of to do with it. It lay there like a man under a tree, I thought to myself, and downed the rest of my wine, putting the empty glass on the table next to my plate, then looked up: at the other end of the balcony, some ten meters away, the door had opened. It was Christina. She smiled and raised her hand halfway in the air, as if we wouldn't be able to understand she was there if all we saw was her body, and she needed a gesture to convince us.

She closed the door behind her with one hand, sweeping her long hair to the side with the other, and came toward us.

"How nice," she said. "And such a lovely evening for sitting out!"

"Is he asleep?" asked Geir.

She shook her head and sat down on the chair up against the wall, blinking at the sun.

"But he's in bed at least. It's such an adventure for him to sleep with the other three."

"Do you want some wine?" I said, holding up the bottle toward her.

"No, thanks," she said. "I'd like some Ramlösa, though."

I put the wine down, picked up the bottle of mineral water, and poured. The glassy, bubbly liquid, fizzing faintly, settled itself in the transparent receptacle. Some of the bubbles released from the surface leaping four, five centimeters in the air, visible in the light of the sun which made them sparkle.

She put the glass to her lips and drank.

"Are mine in bed too?" I asked.

She nodded and swallowed, lowering the glass, though without putting it down on the table, holding it in one hand, her elbow resting against her thigh.

"Yes," she said. "But John's standing up in his crib and wants to join the others."

Christina had a reserved quality about her, not in the substance of what she said or talked about, more in the way she spoke; it was as if she didn't want to let go of her gestures, I sometimes thought. The same was true of her facial expressions, which she always seemed like she wanted to keep under control; not that they were forced in any way or false, because they weren't, it was more like she was wary of giving too much away, as if that would be dangerous, and was always holding some part of herself back, something she kept inside. In many ways she was Geir's complete opposite, he was much more casual about himself, his body language, and his expressions; his need to control had the external world as its object, which he organized meticulously, the material aspects, where nothing was left to chance, as well as the immaterial, the realm of ideas, where he was unable to write anything at all without accounting for its origin in a footnote.

Christina was always well-dressed, not in a showy way but classy and elegant. It wasn't surprising, seeing as she was a trained fashion designer. I always studied what she was wearing when we met, it filled me with a kind of satisfaction, perhaps it was the sureness of her choices that did it, the way everything complemented each other without calling attention to itself, because that would have been an unnecessary demonstration, the way the little details, like a scarf or a belt, brought out the maximum in all the other elements, raising them and presenting them, as it were, at the same time as they were foregrounded, by the chunkiness of a buckle, for instance, and yet backgrounded in that the buckle also served to set off something else. Color, cut, material, pattern; all were measured against each other with a sureness that could only be intuitive. This was something she was good at, something she didn't need to make an effort to achieve. In that respect she managed what few people can, which was to erase the discrepancies between what was new and what was old, between what was expensive and what was cheap, by looking away from those properties and looking instead at the inherent properties of each item, each accessory. Labels didn't exist for her; brand didn't come into it when I thought about her clothes. Of those I'd seen, I was especially fond of a light brown leather jacket she sometimes wore, there was something extremely appealing about it, though I had no idea what exactly. What was the source of that feeling? It was something I vaguely associated with the seventies, even if it wasn't especially seventies-looking in itself. Perhaps it was more the wamth of its tone, and the cut, but at the same time it possessed an almost aggressive quality, as leather jackets often do, and that combination might have been what I found so appealing. Big buttons. Feminine, in an unfrilly kind of way. Elegant. Yes, that was the word. The jacket was elegant.

She dressed Njaal in the same way. Nearly all other kids were H&M kids, or KappAhl kids, their clothes followed the seasons and the tastes dictated by those stores, ours too. If Njaal wore anything from H&M, it never stood out as H&M but was absorbed by other, independently selected and subtly coordinated items. He was elegant too, though quite unlike any Little Lord Fauntleroy, on the contrary, he looked like a child of our time but in his very own way, just as Christina was a woman of our time but in her very own way. Twenty years from now, if we looked at photographs from today, she and he, mother and son, would clearly belong to the first years of the new millenium, the same way as everyone else, none of us would be able to escape that, but in a purer, more stylish way, much like John F. Kennedy and Jacqueline Kennedy are so obviously fifties and sixties, but with a completely different air of significance and elegance about them from our parents, uncles, and aunts from the same era, despite their being contemporaries.

The sureness of Christina's dress sense didn't correspond well to the way she came across as a person, in the sense that she wasn't nearly as sure of herself, or as superior, as she was in her choice of clothes. I didn't know her that well, and naturally we'd never talked about what went on in her mind, or about her appearance, but from what I'd seen I imagined the relationship between her inner and outer selves to be less than harmonious, I had the feeling her inner life was much greater and more expansive than her outer self suggested. She was cautious about how much of herself she revealed, not necessarily consciously so, most likely not, but her unwavering reticence seemed to indicate this was the case; she didn't want her inner self to be made visible to others, brought forward where it could be exploited by other people's attentions and thoughts. Why not? Was she hiding something? Was there something she felt ashamed of? Or was she just a very private person?

I recognized the same characteristic in myself. I had no way of knowing if that sense of recognition was relevant, for all I knew she might feel and think quite differently, but if it really was like I thought, then I knew exactly how she felt. If that was so, she had grown up in a family from whom part of the person she was had to be hidden. If that was so, her childhood had been all about freeing herself from that, enabling her to exist and act in her own right, to accept that part of her that was hidden and allow it to come out into the open, but so powerful is that dynamic, so deeply integrated in the singular identity of the self, that it's as good as impossible to eradicate: it is you. Because what happens, or at least what happened in my own case, is that the part of you that cannot be expressed, which has to be hidden, leads its own life inside, and this inner life, to which you grow accustomed, becomes a way of living, something good, you become more than sufficient in yourself and have no need for others. What ought to unfold, folds inward. For Geir, to whom she was married, there was no such imbalance between what he thought and what he said, between what he did and what he felt. He was a social being through and through, he lived his life with others, even when he was on his own. For that reason Geir needed Christina a lot more than she needed him. She could live a whole life alone if she had to, that was my assumption. He, however, could not; without the constant emotional exchange that went on between his self and the social world, he would perish. He needed the outer world, she did not; she had all she needed inside herself. She was a person who felt a strong sense of duty, she did what was asked of her; he was not, he did what he wanted. I too felt a strong sense of duty, that was what the outer world basically was for me, obligation, whereas my inner world to a much greater extent was freedom. Only during the past few years had I begun to understand that retreating into the self was perilous, something that removed me from life. And only during the past few years had I begun to understand that it was something I shared with my father. He was a fundamentally lonely person when I was growing up, in the way he kept to himself in the house, shutting himself away in his own little studio in the basement, and in the fact that he had no friends. The social world was a game he mastered but took no part in; perhaps he found nothing of value in it, nor, I suspect, in anything else. The things that make a difference, those that are replete with meaning and significance, were, I think, wholly absent from his life. He bore the mark of remoteness in everything he did, and the only thing which countered that were the upsurges of rage and resentment that would come over him, which so agonizingly brought him close to me, physically and mentally, and which, one could imagine, to him had the very purpose of keeping everything at bay, maintaining remoteness.

In a diary we found among his things after he died, he wrote about "the solitary individual." He wrote that he could tell the solitary individual apart from others, and it would seem he counted himself as one. He wrote too about conventions in more southern cultures, which were more inclusive and social than the Scandinavian, and it was impossible to read this as an indication of anything other than that he longed for such a life. The fact that he started drinking must have had something to do with that. Freedom, independence, community. The most radical difference in his lifestyle before and after he left our family, besides his alcohol consumption, was social contact, all the new people who suddenly came into his life. It was a new beginning, one last try, but the alcohol was not only a blessing, a bestower of grace, because soon he felt the desire for it when he got out of bed, or rather not desire, it was a need, he was compelled by it. On weekends he drank from the time he got up until he went to bed, during the week he managed to keep more of a grip to begin with, refraining from alcohol in the mornings, popping home at the lunch break to drink a bit, then drinking all evening, gradually it became harder and harder to resist, and eventually he gave in to it completely and no longer cared. But it started down there in his studio, the urge he felt to be alone, to keep the nearness of the world at bay, so impossible to reconcile with his longing for the social world, which could not be admitted or even acknowledged, not until the very end, when everything was already gone. He was trapped, increasingly confined, and he lost everything, due also to an outwardly directed aggression and destructiveness, as I understand it, which eventually he turned inward, and that was his decline, totally removed from society, back in the house where it all began, alone with his mother, in a steady flow of alcohol. The priest who held the funeral service said something I'll always remember. One must fasten one's gaze, he said. One must fasten one's gaze.

One must fasten one's gaze.

He could have said the little things are important; but he didn't. He could have said that loving thy neighbor is most important of all; but he didn't. Nor did he say what that gaze must be fastened upon. All he said was that it must be fastened.

It made sense to me then, as we sat in the chapel and wept that morning, his body lying there in its coffin a few meters away, and it makes sense to me today, as I sit here writing these words. I know what it means to see something without fastening one's gaze. Everything is there, the houses, the trees, the cars, the people, the sky, the earth, and yet something is missing because their being there means nothing. It could just as well be something else that was there or nothing at all. This is what the meaningless world looks like. And we can inhabit the meaningless world quite adequately, it being a simple matter of endurance, and indeed we do so if we must. It can be beautiful, though we may wonder in relation to what, it being all that we have, without such a thought making any difference, without it really bothering us. We have not fastened our gaze, we have not connected ourselves with the world, and could just as well, taking things to their logical conclusion, depart from it. The connections that hold us back, which cause us to thrash in our chains, as it were, have to do with expectations and obligation, with what the world asks of us, and sooner or later we come to a point where we realize the imbalance of our honoring the world's demands while the world fails to honor ours. At that point we become free, we can do as we please, but what has made us free, the meaninglessness of the world, also deprives that freedom of its meaning.

But if the world is meaningless, what good does it do to fasten our gaze on it? What kind of foolish middle-class delusion is that?

The question is how we define meaning. If we take the challenge of fastening our gaze seriously, it must be the case that it is not the object itself that is important, nor the person, in fact it can be any object or any person, in any place, at any time. The important thing is the eye, not what it sees: the link between the person seeing and what they see, regardless of what that might be. This is so because nothing means anything on its own. Only when an object is seen does it become. All meaning comes from the eye seeing. Meaning is not a property of the world, but something we attach to the world. The eye internalizes the extrinsic, but since the extrinsic remains so to the eye, something outside the self, it often believes that the meaning it sees belongs to the object or the phenomenon, which it then denounces, elevates, or remains indifferent to without understanding that what it denounces, elevates, or remains indifferent to is something within itself. It is by way of this internalization of the world that meaning becomes possible. All significance arises in the eye that sees, all meaning in the heart. Attaching meaning to the world is peculiar only to man, we are the givers of meaning, and this is not only our own responsibility but also our obligation. My father failed to live up to his obligation and he fell. It was not a punishment, but a consequence. That's pretty much how I look at it today, thirteen years after he died. I believe the priest was right, it really is all about fastening one's gaze, but I believe too that such a plea is related to the similar plea that calls on us to be good. No one disagrees about this, though for many it remains unattainable, related to the equally utopian though more popular call underlying so much in our society that tells us we must be rich. Certainly. It's easy to be rich if you've got lots of money, and being good is easy enough for those who are whole, but for those who are not whole, good isn't even within their horizon; indeed, perhaps no horizon exists for such people, no up, no down, no good, no bad, only anger or pain or loathing, because something inside them is broken, truly fucked up, and they are so deeply entangled in all sorts of unmanageable emotions, struggling for life with their backs to the wall, unless they've resigned themselves and given up completely. So many struggle for life, so many give up, and the rest, who know nothing of such pain or anger, watch TV in the cozy warmth of their own goodness. When I think about that, about what we have made of the world, a single great living room in which we sit and stare at what other people are doing, I think of what Dad once said, spitting sarcasm, as we sat outside at the barbecue, he, Mom, and me, the very incarnation of family happiness and hygge: "Now we're living the life, aren't we, eh!" And when I think about that, I think to myself that he did the right thing. To hell with meaning, to hell with everything, I'm going to drink until I drop. Drink myself into a stupor, drink myself into darkness, drink myself into the empty void, for desperate diseases need desperate remedies. I drink and I fall, I fall and I drink. Everything stinks, everything is shit, people are morons, to hell with them, I'll drink myself stupid, stupider than them. People are small, but I'll drink myself smaller. Because when I drink, as I shrink and become smaller and smaller, my shadow on the wall gets bigger and bigger, until the moment I die, slumped there in the chair with my nose broken and blood on my face and shirt, and from then on I will be nobody and my shadow will be everything.

My father failed to fasten his gaze, and he was not a good man. But he was his own person, and if he'd wanted to, wanted to fasten his gaze and be good, I think he could have done so. Something inside him was broken right from the start. To me it doesn't matter: he was the way he was. I've never been able to see my father as a person in his own right, the way I see myself, he exists only by virtue of his relationship to me, as my father, and his actions are mysterious to me and yet sovereign. Whether he suffered or not isn't something I wonder about. My father was a king without a country, and who cares for a king to suffer? That he died a clown, his nose reddened by blood, in his mother's armchair, changes nothing. To me, he will be king until the day I die. He comes to me still in dreams, in all his former splendor, the terrible ruler of the basement, for insights are worthless to the subconscious; it's like one of those boxes filled with crushed ice in which they transport living hearts, kidneys, lungs, livers, from the hospital where the donor died to the one where the living body waits. In this box, from which dreams rise in the night, dead emotions live on outside the body in which they once grew, and there among them my father still reigns.

The relationship between parents and children is a bit like that between customs officers and airline passengers; the customs officers watch the passengers through a window as they come through arrivals and can study everything they do, while the passengers, glancing at the same window from the other side, see only themselves. A child can learn nothing from his parents; the best he can hope for is not to repeat their mistakes. Dad wrote in his diary that he had been beaten as a child, and now he was a father who beat his own children. More than any other, such a statement stands as an argument against the idea that humans are rational beings. He experienced the pain and humiliation of being beaten at home, so why did he pass that pain and humiliation on? Perhaps the very ability to empathize, the ability to recognize that others feel the same as oneself and that those feelings can be just as important and may be taken as seriously as one's own, gets beaten away. To begin with we are near the world, I believe, but if our trust is broken we seek refuge deep within ourselves, cut off from what goes on outside, and the remoteness thereby established is then so very, very difficult to surmount. But a connection of that nature, between abuse in childhood and remoteness from the world in the later personality, only seems obvious in a system in which the rules of reasoning alone are valid, not in reality, which is quite differently open and oblivious to logic. My own aversion to intimacy and all outbursts of emotion, and the fact that all the relationships I've been involved in have sooner or later seen me occupy the middle ground of detachment and levelheadedness, has little to do with that aversion being in any way metaphorical, a symptom of a relationship to a father or a mother having broken down. No, my aversion to intimacy and outbursts of emotion is due to my actually being averse to intimacy and outbursts of emotion, I can't stand them, don't want to be anywhere near them, and the remoteness I crave in such instances is a blessing, occasionally even the highest conceivable blessing. Sexual desire is the only thing that displaces that need for boundaries and distance, only in that desire am I able to surmount my fear of intimacy and need for remoteness and thereby be close to another person. At the same time, and this seems fairly obvious, that fear of intimacy rears up again, doubly potent, in that the person this sexual desire is meant to overcome my remoteness to is the person to whom I am nearest, with whom I share my life, since then there is no longer any remoteness and sex then becomes infused with resistance. Socially I can overcome my remoteness to others when drunk, then it goes away, but in no other circumstances. A hug is anathema to me, a pat on the shoulder or back a threat. But in such cases it is not remoteness that is the problem, and lack of empathy is not a defect, the problem is the intimacy; I genuinely cannot deal with it, and the same goes for people's empathy. Why can't they just stay away and leave me alone, I think to myself. Is that too much to ask? The loneliness Dad wrote about is not something I know. As such, I am more broken than he, in that I entertain no expectations of interpersonal closeness and empathy, this not being something I crave, which, I suppose, makes it easier for me than it was for him, and less likely that I will end up following in his footsteps and drinking myself into the grave. Why on earth would I drink if I had all my time to myself?

Swallows flitted back and forth high up in the sky. I knew it was a sign about the weather, but that was all. Either it would be fine when the swallows flew high, or else it would rain. That much I could work out. I knew too that they were flying that high because that was where the insects were. But had the insects sought such heights because there was an area of low pressure or an area of high pressure on its way? And what did they actually do up there?

"How's the novel coming along, Karl Ove?" Christina asked. "Or maybe it's finished?"

"Pretty much," I said. "I just need to change some names."

"And then write four more," said Geir.

"Some minor complications have come up," I said, looking across at her. "I don't know if Geir said anything?"

"He has mentioned something about a relative not wanting it published. Is that it?"

"Yes. He keeps sending e-mails to the publisher, threatening to go to court and the newspapers. He's got the idea my mother's behind it all and made me write the book to get back at my father's family for him having left her."

She smiled gently and put her glass down on the table, shoving a plate aside to make room for its foot, which partially vanished from sight beneath the slightly elevated rim of the plate, whereas the slender stem that connected it to the bowl of the glass was a thin column of light in the sun.

"They can't be taking it seriously then?"

"No, not that. That's just a kind of background theory, it's not the main issue. The main issue is he finds the novel libelous. He says it's a pack of lies, that none of it's true."

"He's pissed off," said Geir.

"Yes, he is," I said.

At the other end the door opened again. Linda came out and, after closing the door behind her, stood for a second, shielding her eyes with her hand as she peered toward us. She was wearing a blue-and-white-striped sweater and dark blue shorts; with the wooden decking and her saluting gesture it made her seem quite nautical. I smiled.

"Is there a chance he can actually stop the book?" Christina asked.

"I don't think so," I said. "He might give it a try, I don't know."

Linda stood beside us.

"This is looking nice," she said, and pulled out a chair at the opposite side of the table from me.

"Why don't we get started?" she said. "Just dig in."

"Thanks," said Christina. "It looks delicious."

"Come on," I said. "It's prawns."

"I haven't had prawns all summer," said Christina. "We usually do." She laughed and looked up at Geir. "We have them at your dad's."

"We do," said Geir. "They like their prawns down there."

"Up," I said. "You're in the south now, remember."

"Were you talking about your book?" asked Linda.

Christina grabbed a couple of prawns and put them on her plate. The shells were so slippery and frictionless they slid on the smooth surface, and one of them ended up with its curling tail hanging over the opposite side from where she'd put it. Geir took a piece of bread, glanced around for the butter, located it, and picked it up. I lifted the bottle of wine and poured some into Linda's glass, nodding in reply.

"It's awful, really," I said.

"Thanks," she said.

"Weren't you expecting it?" Christina asked.

I shook my head, dropped a piece of bread onto my plate, and took a sip of wine while I waited for Geir and the butter.

"No," I said. "Nothing even close. I thought maybe he might be a bit peeved, but I hadn't anticipated anything like this. I've been really naïve, as it turns out. I thought I was writing about stuff that happened, and I hadn't imagined people could object. I realized it might annoy a few people, I was prepared for that, and maybe they'd want their name taken out, but I never envisaged anyone would want to stop it. Or get so ridiculously worked up."

"I've read the e-mails," said Linda to Christina. "He comes across like a madman. He scares the life out of me, anyway."

"He's not dangerous," said Geir. "If he was dangerous he'd have tossed an axe in the trunk and driven down here long before now."

"Don't say things like that!" said Linda.

"The worst thing, though, is that he's saying what I've written isn't true. That things didn't happen the way I describe them. Not just that it's innacurate or whatever, but that I'm lying. He says he can prove it."

Geir took a handful of prawns and dropped them onto his plate. I picked up the butter dish and put it down in front of me, drawing the knife toward me across the dark yellow surface which by now had been softened by the sun, then spreading the small curl that had gathered on the flat of its blade over the bread. The crusts were brown, verging on black, quite smooth on top, with a powdering of flour here and there, though porous in the cross section, tightly enclosing the soft white substance of the bread itself. I picked up the slice so as to find a better angle with the knife, whose remaining deposits of butter I wanted to spread onto the bread, just as one of the hotel's three external elevators began to glide upward through its transparent tube taking it to the very top of the building. Christina sat leaning forward, as if absorbed in some piece of sewing, shelling her prawns. I knew the feeling of tiny, delicate prawn eggs on one's fingers, they had their own very particular consistency, not unlike wet sand, and quite as hard to brush away, only a bit stickier. Linda, who as yet didn't seem to be ready to concentrate on the meal, as if she'd decided to rest for a moment on its outskirts, perhaps still with the rumpus of headstrong children whirling about inside her, raised her glass.

"Skål, and welcome!" she said.

"Skål," said Geir.

"Thanks for having us," said Christina.

We clinked our glasses and drank. I put my glass down and made sure to make eye contact with the others, as I had learned was customary only after arriving in Sweden seven years previously, an insight that was accompanied by the realization that, in all the years before that, people had sought eye contact with each other during every toast, apart from me, who had sat there completely oblivious, my ignorance exposed on every occasion without my even knowing.

"I don't want to spoil the evening going on about my uncle," I said, and noticed that the elevator had now stopped, the doors then slid aside, and a fat man and a slightly thinner woman got in at the same moment as one of the other elevators began to ascend. "But just to finish up what I was saying, about him claiming he can prove I'm lying."

I took a fistful of prawns and dropped them next to the bread, then picked one up between my fingers, pinching my thumb and index finger together at the seam of the head and body, and removed the head.

"It was as if suddenly I no longer knew what was true and what wasn't. It was really unpleasant – is really unpleasant. We're talking about things I've lived through. All of a sudden I start wondering if I'm just making them up. Do you know what I mean?"

She nodded. I pinched the shell that covered the belly of the prawn, bulging with its roe, most of which I managed to squeeze onto the edge of my plate before gripping the top of the shell and removing it with a swift upward movement, the way you might lift up a visor and put it to one side.

"The only thing I'm completely sure of is that my dad drank himself to death. If I'd written it like that, it wouldn't have mattered. As a simple fact, I mean. But I've gone into detail in describing the place where it happened. That was his childhood home. I've written about my grandmother, right down to the smallest detail, and she was his mother. He grew up in those rooms. Of course it's an infringement, because it's a private space. His space. And there I am, turning up for a few days, then writing an entire novel about it. A novel that might even be lies. Or a distorted truth. I can't trust myself. I don't know what's true and what isn't. And now I'm doing this to his brother. I've always looked up to him, he's always been an important person in my life, a representative of something."

I passed my thumb over the underside of the little grub-like scrap of prawn meat to remove the few remaining specks of roe, then placed it on my bread, at the very corner, before beginning the same process all over again with a new prawn.

"That's what makes it all so agonizing. Because everything he says resonates against something I carry inside me. It's already there. And when it comes from outside, it just consumes me."

"What's happening in purely practical terms, then?" Linda asked. "You're changing all the names, of course. But is there anything else you have to do?"

"No."

"I don't even think you should change the names," said Geir. "Why should you?"

"You'd understand if you thought about it," I said. "It's his name. I've no right to exploit it for my own purposes."

"OK, so maybe in his case," Geir replied. "Though basically I think you should keep them all. But what about your dad's name? And your grandmother's? That's not OK."

"That's as far as I can go," I said, placing the second prawn next to the first. The transformation from living creature to waste was remarkable, the little pile of shells, heads, roe, and the antenna-like tentacles that lay next to the fine and delicious shellfish.

"Let's say it goes to court, then," said Geir. "Where's the case against you? That you wrote about your dad? Why should he be protected? Why should his name be kept untarnished? What if an incest victim wrote a book about his dad, would the court be supposed to stop them publishing because the dad's brother doesn't want his name dragged through the mud? As if it wasn't already sullied by what he did?"

"But that's a criminal matter," I said. "That's different."

"True. But he still did what he did to you. Are you supposed to keep quiet just because it can rub off on your uncle, because they were related? That's absurd. What's worse, the action or the description of the action? Is the description of the action an offense but not the action itself?"

"I don't think that's what Karl Ove means," said Christina. "I think it's the description of the space it took place in that's causing the offense. The fact that your door's being opened and everyone can look in."

"That can't explain why he's so angry," said Linda. "There must be something else besides."

"Why does he think your mother is behind it all?" Christina asked. Her bread was almost covered by pale fleshy prawns with their streaks of red. They lay there on the thin layer of butter, like people on a beach seen from a plane preparing to land, I thought to myself.

"I've no idea," I said. "But he was still a child when Mom and Dad got together. Ten years old, something like that. His big brother got married and moved away. That must be quite an upheaval for a boy that age. Who was she to him? Presumably the same person she was to his parents. My guess is they didn't want Dad to marry her, that they didn't think she was good enough, or right for him. At any rate, they didn't go to their wedding. That's a statement. I remember Dad making an issue of it when he married for the second time and they still didn't go. It was obviously something that had affected him. It meant a lot. Gunnar must still carry all that with him, their rejection, and the reason for it. Maybe not in the form of arguments or thoughts as such, but emotionally, and thereby as a kind of truth: that's how she was. Then after they got married and had children they must have been able to tell that Dad wasn't happy. That's certainly something I can see now, looking back. And because he was theirs and came from them, the obvious thing for them to think must have been that it was her fault."

"So he lost a brother?" said Linda.

"Yes," I said, placing another prawn on my bread, which would soon be covered. My mouth was watering and I removed the shell as quickly as I could. "And then he lost him again when he started drinking."

"And a third time with you writing about him."

"I hadn't thought about it like that," I said. "But you're right. I've taken him away from him, and now I'm saying he was mine, that he was like this and like that."

"Did they get along at all, your mom and your dad's parents?" Christina asked. She lifted her bread to her mouth and took a bite, and her movements were so small that for a moment there was something squirrel-like about her, but then, perhaps because I was looking at her, or perhaps because she felt some sudden twinge of happiness, she smiled and everything that was small dissolved.

I smiled too.

"Can I just ask you something?" Linda intervened.

Christina nodded.

"How come you're not having any wine?"

Christina laughed and put her hand in front of her mouth. Geir grinned, the biggest smile he had. And Linda smiled too.

"We're expecting," said Christina.

"I knew you were!" said Linda.

"Seriously?" I said, looking across at Geir. "You never said!"

"We're saying it now."

"I can tell too," said Linda. "There's a bulge."

Christina looked down at her tummy and placed her hand on it. When she looked up again, her eyes were full of joy.

"When's it due?" asked Linda.

"Late December," Christina replied.

"That's fantastic," said Linda.

"Congratulations," I said, raising my glass.

"We were inspired by you two," said Geir. "When we were here New Year's Eve and saw John. The thought of having another little one like him. He was such a little bundle of happiness, reaching his hands out to us."

"It'll be good for Njaal," said Linda.

"Yes," said Christina. "It'll be great for him being a big brother."

"Have you told him yet?" said Linda.

Christina shook her head.

"We've told my parents. And Geir's dad."

"Have they found out if it's a boy or a girl yet?" Linda asked.

"No," said Christina. "We don't want to know either."

"We're keeping the excitement," said Geir.

"I can't get over you being here two days already and not saying a word," I said. "Or maybe I can, come to think of it. Do you remember me telling you we were having Heidi?"

Geir nodded.

"You were expecting Njaal, but you still didn't let on. Not for another two months, in fact."

"And?"

"That's far too disciplined for me. We could never keep anything like that secret. How long did it take before we told everyone we knew?" I said, looking across at Linda.

"Two days, maybe," she said.

"It's the Strays looking at the Hamsuns," said Geir.

"And you're the Strays, I take it?" I said.

"Of course," said Geir. "We look on everything you do with wide eyes. We're the ones with our house in order."

"I'm so pleased for you both!" said Linda, looking at Christina.

As I looked at her, the radiance inside her now visible in her eyes, everything fell into place; of course, that was it! She had been withdrawn, but not like she had turned herself away from the world, from something in it she didn't want, more as if there was something good there inside her.

"We've even got the names ready," said Geir, his eyes looking into Christina's.

"Are you sure you're ready to divulge, after six months?" I said.

"If it's a girl, she's going to be called Frøydis," said Geir. "And if it's a boy, he'll be called Gisle."

As we sat there, on our narrow ledge above the city, eating and drinking, the sun gradually sank in the sky, redder and redder, the darkness rising and enclosing us imperceptibly from the streets, where the air seemed to become grainier, the colors of everything there, the cars, the people, the buildings, fading slowly into gray. We talked about the baby they were expecting, we talked about the children we had, we talked about what were now already the old days, the time we lived in Stockholm, and we talked about Gunnar and his e-mails. I was hesitant about the latter, but the unease I felt about the whole situation had to be calmed, and the only way I knew of doing that was by talking about it. After the wine had been drunk and the food eaten up, Linda and I cleared the table and took the things into the kitchen. I put the coffee on and got the ice cream out of the freezer.

"What a lovely evening," said Linda.

"Yes," I said.

"Are you all right?" she asked.

"Yes, fine," I said. "Well, sort of. But it's nice to have company."

I put my arms around her. We stood there for a moment, then she went to get the lantern she had once given me as a birthday present, an old-fashioned kind made of metal and with little windows of glass, inside which a fat candle can burn, or in this case, because we'd run out of candles, an array of tea lights.

I stood in the living room and watched her go past with the lantern glowing in her hand in the dim light. Then I carried the ice cream out, and the fruit, the wafers, and the coffee, all on a tray, together with the cups, plates, and spoons.

The darkness in August is the finest darkness of all. It lacks the luminous transparency of June's, the sheer ripeness of its potentialities, yet is quite unlike the impenetrable depths of autumn's or winter's darkness. What was with us before and now is gone, spring and summer, lingers on in August's darkness, whereas what is to come, autumn and winter, are a time into which we can only peer, a time of which we are not yet a part.

The light of the lantern flickered on the table, shimmering in our faces and eyes. The darkness swelled, and the streets below were quiet. The elevators went up and down, the traffic lights continued to change, and now and then people came walking from the pedestrian street, ambling families or young people on their way out, perhaps to a park where they would sit and drink, or to some outdoor café. There was a force field of excitement about them, or perhaps it was me, because what they were doing was so familiar to me, and I could still feel the pull, to be out on the town with the feeling that tonight anything at all could happen.

But that feeling also belonged to the darkness of August, I thought to myself. In that darkness too there was promise and expectation. Something closes, something else opens. Life is there for the living. Through autumn and winter, spring and summer, fuller with every turn. Wasn't that what was happening? Never had the darkness of August felt more replete than now.

Replete with what?

The beauty of time passing.

After we finished dessert and I had fetched the cognac and drunk a glass of it, I went inside to piss. On the way, I poked my head around the door of the children's room where they lay sighing like little animals in their own little worlds. The voices of the others drifted in from the balcony, I heard Linda's voice, and her laughter too, and I thought about what it must be like to be a child and fall asleep to the sounds made by one's parents. The sounds of life outside themselves. I pissed, and it felt good. I looked at myself in the mirror as I washed my hands. The deep furrows in my brow, the lines that ran down my cheeks, the wrinkles around my eyes, none had been there when Vanja was born. But I felt the way I had always felt, the same now as when I was twenty, and perhaps that was the reason that what I saw in the mirror was not a forty-year-old man, though my age was clear and conspicuous, but myself, Karl Ove.

I dried my hands on the towel, went into the bedroom, and opened my e-mails, as always with my heart pounding and gripped by an intense feeling of dread.

There was a message from Amazon, and one from Tonje.

I opened Tonje's.

Dear Karl Ove,

I'm sorry I haven't sent word before now. Your assumptions are quite right. I had a pounding headache and a nerve in my eyelid twitched for three days while I read your novel. Since then I've tried to figure out where that reaction came from. To begin with it was the fear of being held up in full view. Gradually, the reading itself became a burden. All the little stories I'd forgotten about suddenly came to life again, as you did too, the person you once were to me.

After having read it I found I could relax a bit more. Tore is right, I am a princess, if only in the book. But I'd like to try to see it in terms of principle, if I can. After all, I've no idea what you're saying about me in Book 5. And I can't just say everything's fine as long as you stick to writing nicely about me. So I've decided not to intervene in any way. It's your project. Use my full name by all means, all or nothing. I don't feel I can give you any viewpoints on the book, I'm sure you understand that. But it touched my heart to read it. Dearest, dearest Karl Ove.

All my best,
Tonje

My relief as I read her message was so immense, and the last line so unexpectedly warm and loving, that tears welled in my eyes. I closed the message and sat for a moment in front of the computer. I wanted the emotions to subside a bit before going back out to the others. The mere fact that I'd received an e-mail from Tonje felt like I was deceiving Linda. As if I had a secret life outside the family. But I did too, I'd had a life before them, and though I wasn't in the habit of thinking about it, I certainly had while I'd been writing the first book. I had resurrected the life I once led, I had resurrected all the people I knew and was connected to back then, resurrected them in my mind, and with the past come to life in that way, I had gone about among them, my family, without saying a word about it, without letting on in the slightest, and yet there it was in their midst.

After maybe ten minutes I got to my feet and went back. I would have to send Tonje's e-mail to the publishers, partly because they needed to be sure of everyone's response now that the fuss concerning the manuscript had spiraled the way it had, and partly because I wanted them to see that I wasn't totally unreliable, because although Gunnar's letters were out of control I couldn't help but assume that the publishers were thinking there was never smoke without fire and that there was most likely at least a grain of truth in Gunnar's accusations. I was a writer, I made a living out of making things up, and most likely, so I imagined them thinking, Gunnar's reaction to my description of those real-life circumstances was tainted by my novelist's temperament, which tended toward exaggeration, perhaps even strongly so. I especially suspected Geir Berdahl of such thoughts. The accountant's veracity versus the writer's unreliability. That Tonje had reacted the way she had, and had sufficient faith in me to give me free rein as to how she and our relationship would be described in the books that followed, was no proof of anything, but it was at least a different take.

Still, it would have to wait until tomorrow. Now I was going to sit out in the dark with Linda, Christina, and Geir, illuminated by the light of the lantern, drinking cognac and talking about whatever subject happened to crop up.

When I returned to them Linda was telling a story. It was about the first summer after we moved here. The apartment, the balcony, the city, all had been new to us. Nearly every evening we sat out here after the children had been put to bed. The summer had no end; well into September we were still sitting outside in the evenings. We'd bought a baby alarm, the transmitter was in the children's room, the receiver on the table between us. Whenever they stirred, whenever they made a sound, the receiver came on and we could hear it. One evening it crackled with the sound of a child crying. I went into their room, but whoever it was, Vanja or Heidi, must have settled again right away, because when I came in they were fast asleep. I went back outside, only for it to start again. This time Linda went in. The same thing happened: they were asleep. It was creepy, the sound of a child crying, coming to us through the hiss and crackle of the receiver, a small, distant voice. I found myself thinking it was like a dead child crying from the afterlife, its sound waves picked up by the transmitter. I didn't mention the thought, Linda was already beside herself, she bustled back to the children again, this time with receiver in hand so she could see with her own eyes that the crying she was hearing wasn't from one of her own. While she was away I tried to figure out what was going on. We were in the middle of a city, with hundreds of people in our immediate vicinity, and somebody among them clearly had the same make of baby alarm as us.

I told Linda when she got back. It calmed her down. But then a moment later she looked at me and said, But there's no one taking care of that child.

As she told the story, the creepiness we had both felt at the time was gone. It had become a story. But Linda had just written a short story about that very incident. In it the creepiness was intact, perhaps even more intensely. That was how she was, it was her talent, she could distill life down to points of extreme intensity and densely concentrated meaning. I often felt tears come to my eyes when I read the things she wrote, and this particular story was no exception because the person she was so immediately became apparent to me.

"We bought that baby alarm before we went to Gotland," I said. "Do you remember? Our trip there?"

"Yes," she said. "I remember you used to run to the shop with your backpack on to get breakfast in the mornings."

"Run?" said Geir. "How far?"

"Ten kilometers," I said. "For a few months there I was in superb shape. Only I didn't realize. Everything's relative. You manage one thing, but there's always something else you can't. So I focused on that."

"Vacationing with kids and no car, it's a genre on its own," said Linda.

"A sonnet of life with small children," I said. "It doesn't get much harder than that."

"It was lovely, though," she said. "I was pregnant with Heidi. And Vanja was so little! To us she was a big girl. But she was just a tiny tot!"

"She was," I said. "It's horrendous how time flies! It feels like such a long time ago, back in my boyhood almost."

We spent two weeks there in a rented house on the edge of the woods, and in the middle of those woods, which reminded me in every respect of the woods at Hove, pine trees that went all the way down to the shore, in the middle of those woods were these peculiar white rock formations they call raukar. Oh, what an exhilarating sight they were! Every afternoon, while Linda and Vanja were at the house, I would run there to look at them. Like statues they stood, tall as a man, white among the straight, upright pine trees. There was something totem-like about them, and the associations they had for me were of indigenous peoples and a world without cars, without asphalt, without concrete, without glass, without machines. A world consisting only of what grew and people living among it. I ran there and it filled me with emotions, and then I ran back to my little family.

Now it was no longer something that had just happened, but something that had happened a long time ago, the same way as this, this evening on the balcony, years from now will be something I looked back on, removed from the life I will be living then. A memory is a ledge on the mountainside of the mind; there we are, drinking and chatting, and on the ledge below us my dad sits in his chair, dead, his face smeared with blood. And on a ledge below him we are sitting in a rest stop somewhere in the Agder region, Mom, Dad, Yngve, and I, we've been picking berries all morning, now we're eating our picnic, and next to us is a river, its waters green and white and icy cold, descended from the high fells to our rear, and on the other side, at the edge of the road, coated with dust, stands our red Opel Kadett.

But as yet it was not a memory, not some constituent of the past, but still simply the point to which we had come, an evening that was now drawing to an end.

"You must be tired," said Linda to Christina, who nodded, yes, she was, and with those words it was over, for we were all tired and the children would be waking up at five o'clock in the worst case, half past five at best, so the time had come to clear the table, load the dishwasher, turn off the lights, brush our teeth, and go to bed.

I lay on my back under the covers, waiting for Linda to come in from the bathroom. When she did, and lowered herself into the bed, as if into water it seemed to me, I put my arms around her and held her tight, feeling her body against mine, her warmth, sensing her smell.

"I love you," I said. And for some strange reason I cried as I spoke the words. But I did so silently, my eyes simply filling with tears, and she knew nothing of it.

The next day we went to the beach. Linda made meatballs and buttered some bread, I made an omelette and filled a thermos with coffee and another with squash, we put it all in a cooler, packed a big blanket, towels, and bathing suits, and the girls' inflatable armbands that were so very important, helped them into their summer dresses and sandals, gave them each a cap to put on, rubbed their sunscreen in, put John in the stroller, and set off. Until that summer Ribersborg had been synonymous with the beach for us, but there was no shade there anywhere, and Linda – who was sensitive to the sun and hid herself under wide-brimmed hats and behind sunglasses all summer, as well as always choosing the shady side of the street and always sitting under the parasols if we were out at a café, unlike me who couldn't get enough of the sun – had taken us all to the beach at Sibbarp instead one day when the summer began, because although it was quite a bit farther there were trees there that grew right down to the beach, and pools of deepest shadow under their leafy crowns, and since then we'd always gone there whenever we wanted to swim. Sibbarp was too far to walk, we had to take the bus from Bergsgatan by the Konserthuset; it took just under half an hour to get there. Njaal, Heidi, and Vanja went first, then came Linda with the cooler bag slung over her shoulder, Christina with a backpack on her back, and Geir carrying a tote bag in his hand, while I brought up the rear, pushing John in his stroller with a big bag full of clutter. It was hot and there was no shade at the bus stop, so it was a relief when the bus came after ten minutes. It was almost full. Geir and Christina found seats at the front, Christina sat with Njaal on her knee, while Vanja and Heidi found two next to each other farther back after the open area in the middle of the bus, and Linda and I sat behind them, Linda with John on her lap. We passed through the city, skirting the hospital and the concourse area on the other side of the Pildammsparken, where the old and particularly striking sports stadium was, shaped like an elongated bowl or a flat-bottomed boat, built in the days of functionalism, unfortunately rather unsuited to football because of its running track and the insufficient incline of its stands, which was why a new stadium had been built next to it. In the same area was the Baltiska Hallen, as well as another big indoor arena with artificial turf. I'd been there a lot the first winter we lived in Malmö, there were some journalists who met a couple of afternoons a week to kick a ball around there and they'd let me join in.

I wiped the sweat from my forehead and realized we were crossing Bellevuevägen. I was so unfamiliar with the city I didn't even know yet how the various districts were connected. We must be near the subdivision garden, I thought to myself. The very thought of the place plunged me into darkness. I looked at Linda and John. His face was sweaty, his eyes kept opening and shutting like the mouths of a pair of expiring fish. In a few seconds he would no longer be able to resist the compelling onslaught of sleep, so overpowering at that age.

Vanja twisted around and found my gaze and asked when we'd be there. A few minutes yet, I said. How long is a minute, she wanted to know. Sixty seconds, I said. How long is a second, she wanted to know. From now until now, I said. That wasn't long, she said. Don't start counting, I said. She looked at me. Why not? she asked. I shrugged. You can if you want, I said. She began to count. When she got to thirty-eleven I corrected her. We came through the center of Limhamn, the main street was full of cars, the sidewalks on both sides filled with milling people. What comes after thirty-nine, Daddy? said Vanja. Forty, I said, turning my head to Linda. Is he asleep? I asked. She nodded. We carried on along the shoreline and soon wide-open areas of green appeared, dotted here and there with clusters of darker deciduous trees, and a moment later the bus swung into its terminus. Linda carried John to his stroller, he woke up and started wailing, I lifted the stroller out, she tried to get him into it, he kicked and struggled, I took over, and he calmed down after twenty seconds or so and I managed to get his legs into the stroller and was able to pick up the bag and follow the others while he laid his head back and immediately fell asleep again. I broke into a trot and caught up with Linda. Vanja, Heidi, and Njaal walked in front of us, scurrying along like three little dogs. The harbor was packed with small boats, and there were lots of people on and around the jetty. The grass we crossed was popular too, people were strolling, some were playing games, I heard the buzz of a radio-controlled plane, others were sitting around on blankets. The air was teeming with ladybugs, a couple landed on my white T-shirt and I flicked them away. We crossed the open lawns, passed the kiosk, and followed the gravel path that led off along the inside of the beach to the northern end where the trees were. We went past a woman in a bathing suit, she walked in that cautious way you do when you're not used to having bare legs, and three young men, perhaps twenty years old, visibly wearing underpants under their low-slung bathing shorts. Linda was walking beside Christina now, the children were already way up ahead, running to see who would get there first. Geir stopped and I came up to him.

"Did you see her?" he said.

"Who?" I said.

"That woman in the bathing suit. It was all wet around her breasts. Soaking wet. But dry everywhere else. So she hadn't been swimming. It was milk. Breast milk."

"I didn't notice," I said.

Something kept crunching under my feet and I stopped to see what it was. Ladybugs. They were all over the ground. Dead ladybugs on the path and on the grass. The air was alive with them. I walked over to the trees, spread the blanket out in the shade, and started helping Heidi with her bathing suit and her water wings while Linda got Vanja changed. John was fast asleep in the stroller, chin against his chest and hat over his eyes. Three ladybugs had settled on his T-shirt, one on the brim of his hat. I felt them crawling in my hair and shook my head.

"Do you want to go out and swim with them while I get things organized?" I said to Linda. She nodded and got changed while I turned to the picnic. The blanket was already covered in ladybugs. I looked up. Great swarms filled the air. I looked down at my chest, four more had landed there. I flicked them away, picked up the blanket and gave it a shake before spreading it out again and setting out the containers with the sandwiches, meatballs, salad, omelette, and olives.

"I've never seen so many ladybugs," I said.

Geir batted at the air. Christina walked to the shore holding Njaal's hand. Now that I knew, I could see she was pregnant. She flapped her free hand. Njaal copied her. Linda shook her hair. Heidi and Vanja stood hand in hand at the water's edge and stared out at the sea. The blanket was crawling with ladybugs again.

"We can't eat here," I said. "They're everywhere. Look at them," I said, indicating the swarms that seemed to be swirling all around.

"Maybe it's better over there," Geir said. "It's more exposed, so there'll be more wind."

We went over to where the grass came to an end, only to find the air just as thick and the ground covered with them.

"We might as well stay put," I said. "They're harmless enough."

Back in the shade I tried to ignore them as best I could. I lit a cigarette and poured myself a cup of coffee. Seconds later, a ladybug was floating in it. I picked it out, inhaled and blew a cloud of smoke out in front of me, wondering if ladybugs like mosquitoes would be repelled by cigarette smoke. Geir had gone down to the shore, now all five of them were there. Linda stepped cautiously out into the water with Heidi and Vanja on each side of her. They reached up to her hips. Her skin was white as marble. The air was alive with flitting black dots. They were settling on the containers, and on the blanket again. They crawled on my shoes, shorts, and T-shirt. It was creepy. Ladybugs were among the most appealing of insects. So delicate and flowerlike in their beauty, they were the very antithesis of the monstrous. Mosquitoes could occur in huge swarms and be everywhere, there was nothing unnatural about that, but with ladybugs there was something ominous about it, as if something had gone wrong, as if something that ought to have been closed had been opened, and as I looked out over the sound, where the gigantic structure of the Öresund Bridge rose up disconcertingly near us to the south and the contours of the Barsebäck nuclear power plant were visible to the north, the blue sky above the glittering blue sea teeming with tiny black dots I knew to be ladybugs, I thought to myself: this is how the world ends.

The Name and the Number

Some months ago I received an anonymous threatening letter in the mail, it was written to my brother, so what I got was a copy, though my brother wasn't mentioned by his actual name but by our mother's maiden name. Yngve Hatløy, it said. The sender no longer considered him worthy of the name Knausgaard and had given him another name instead. I myself had been deprived of a name entirely, being mentioned throughout by my profession only, albeit sarcastically. "The storyteller," that was me.

The writer of this letter stated the following:

> How bitter the thought that an abortion in 1964 could have given so many people a simpler life in 2010. We would have been spared the Hatløys. And your father would have been alive today.

Yngve was born in 1964. The contention that everything would have been better if Yngve had been aborted then, and that Dad would have still been alive if that had happened, was not only conveyed to Yngve. The writer also wrote to Yngve's daughter, a child. The book I have written is the reason we are no longer worthy of the Knausgaard name. I am not, my brother is not, our children are not.

Great is the power of the name.

The strange thing is that names have always been an issue in our family. When my father was young he experimented with different spellings of his name, writing his first name with an i or a y, an å or an aa. I've seen this in books and papers he left behind. Later, he took another surname and was known by it for the last ten years of his life. My mother took my father's surname when she married but subsequently reverted to her maiden name. So when I was eighteen both my mother and my father had different surnames to the one my brother and I shared.

When I began writing this novel I did so with the intention of writing about Dad, and since the nature of fiction is to make what applies to one person apply to all, in the sense that a certain dad becomes "Dad," a certain brother becomes "brother," and a certain mom "Mom," I used his own name. At first his original family name, then his assumed family name. After a time I sent the manuscript to those concerned. My father's family, represented by my father's brother, threatened to take me to court and stop the novel coming out if the names weren't changed. I did as they wanted, changing the names of my uncle, his family, and everyone else on my father's side. But I couldn't change the name of my father. If I called him, say, "Georg Martinsen," then it would no longer be my father I was writing about, the way he was to me, a body of flesh and blood that was also my own flesh and blood, because the name is the only element of reality that can exist unchanged in the novel, everything else is a reference to something, a house or a tree, not in themselves a house or a tree; only the proper name can be the same in the novel as in reality. I could change the names of everyone else, but not his. It was also because I was writing about myself and my own identity:

who would I become if my father was someone called Georg Martinsen? What effect would that have on my own name and identity? So I refused. On the day of the publishing house's annual press conference I had met with the publishing director, Geir Berdahl; he had written a letter to my uncle and itemized all the changes we had made in the novel on his insistence. The final point stated that my father's name would not be used. The evening before, the culture editor at the Bergens Tidende had called Berdahl, apparently they knew each other from some earlier time, he had got wind of the issue and my uncle threatening to take the matter to court. I had been incautious and mentioned it in an e-mail to a person I knew well who was employed by that newspaper, who had then passed it on. This was the situation when Berdahl read his letter to me. Until then I had refused to give up my father's name. But at that point I felt I could stand firm no longer; on the other side of the door of the office in which we sat, the room was filling up with journalists, and I was so scared of the consequences of what I had written that it seemed to me the only possibility I had was to say OK, you can send the letter, I'll change my father's name.

But I could not change it. I could not call him by any other name. So I solved the problem by not using his name at all. Neither his first name nor his surname appears in the novel. In the novel he is a man without a name.

When I see the names of those I grew up with, they bring back to life not only the entire landscape there, and all the days and evenings we spent running around in it, filled with autumn's heavy darkness or spring's gossamer light, but also the individuals they were. Geir Prestbakmo, Karl Martin Fredriksen, Dag Lothar Kanestrøm, Marianne Christensen, and, later, Per Sigurd Løyning, Arne Jørgen Strandli, Jan Vidar Josephsen, Hanne Arntsen. In each case the names represent them and the time in which I knew them, and is a kind of capsule in the mind in which all sorts of things, important and unimportant, are stored. But that is what their names are to me. To those people themselves the same names are perhaps something else entirely. Whenever they speak or write their names they are referring to themselves. This "self" is something apart from what everyone else sees when they present themselves, it is the inside of the seen, full of thoughts and emotions to which no one else has access, the inner life as it unfolds from birth until death.

A name is intimately connected with this secret and particular self; so entwined are the name and the individual's sense of identity, in fact, that one thinks of the name as belonging to the self, even if it was not given with that purpose in mind, there being no need for a person to refer to themselves by name in order to know who they are, but in order to represent what they are to others. Instead of saying "that little crybaby with the buck teeth" they said "Karl Ove." And since the proper name points both inward and outward at the same time, it is an exceptionally sensitive thing. There is a remnant of magical thought in the fact that the word is what it refers to, or may awaken it. I am my name, my name is me. If anyone abuses it, they abuse me. The most basic form of teasing among children is for the teasers to twist the name of their victim, knowing full well that doing so strikes at the very core of who they are. One of the biggest social blunders a person can commit is to admit to not knowing the name of the person they are talking to, for although one might be perfectly aware of who they are, and recognize their face, their dialect, their gestures and expressions, and can recall any number of situations one might have experienced together, it doesn't help; if you can't remember the name, you can't remember her, since without a name she is no one.

The vast majority of the people we see are nameless, all those sitting behind us on the bus or the subway train, those who pass us on the street or stand in line in front of us at the supermarket checkout. We know each has a name, because everyone has, we just don't know what it is. In the event that one of them becomes our friend, he or she is then moved from the nameless masses into the sphere of the named, by whom we are all most closely surrounded. Yet there is another sphere outside that one, comprising names known by everybody: the famous. We say of any member of this group that he or she is a name. Such a name cannot merely be taken, but is something bestowed, which can only happen by virtue of a person becoming particularly prominent in some way. Anyone who runs, cycles, or skis fast enough may thus be bestowed with a name, anyone who sings beautifully enough, or who is sufficiently good at playing the guitar, anyone excelling in their field, the history of ideas, for instance, and anyone graduating to any important position in society. Such a name does not primarily represent the person themselves, but rather their achievements or role. Yet as soon as a person's name has become public because of some achievement, curiosity is at once aroused as to what else that name represents: the private self. It is a characteristic of our time that public selves have increasingly come forward to present to us their private selves, which thereby have become public too. This is not to say that we are witness to a degeneration of the public sphere, as is often suggested, but rather to a wholly necessary regulatory mechanism in any media society.

Apart from material necessities, the most important need of any human being is to be seen. Anyone who is not seen is no one. The worst punishment in old Nordic culture was to be proclaimed fredløs, which is to say cast out from society, forbidden to associate with others. If such an outcast ever showed themselves in public they would be shunned, perhaps even killed; the outcast was a nobody, and it meant nothing whether they lived or died; but why kill a person as long as they could merely be shunned? We strive to be seen. Yet to be seen can involve a number of things; in a peasant society, being seen would be something else entirely compared to a media society. Whoever is seen in a media society is seen by all. And when being seen means being seen by all, it gives rise to an impossible craving, since being seen by all is the preserve of the few. When the few display not only what makes them prominent and which is unreachable for the vast majority of us, in other words their public personalities, but also their private personalities, which are not unreachable but by contrast are an embodiment of the ordinary, the sphere in which all of us live, the public personality is then no longer unreachable, no longer merely an object of admiration and desire, but a person with whom we can identify, and the gap between ordinary private life, in which the name denotes the individual and nothing else, and public life, dissolves almost completely: essentially, they are just like us. We see ourselves in them, and this is another way of being seen. In this there is security, for while the desire to be seen is great in all of us, it is countered by an equal force pulling in the opposite direction, which is the desire to be like everyone else. To be like everyone else is to be one among the crowd, and to be one among the crowd is to be safe. As humans have experienced throughout their existence, in any flock facing danger the important thing is not to be seen, not to attract attention. To be seen is vital, but not to be seen is vital, too. Nothing feels more perilous to us than to be exposed to the attention and gaze of others. By opening up the private side of their name, the ordinariness shared by us all, a person becomes both a part of the community and one of the select few seen by all.

The notion that to be seen is to be seen by many, in the media, as a name with a particular aura, has become so prevalent that almost everyone I know has begun to treat their name as something that not only denotes who they are, replete with meaning beyond their control, but also as an advertisement of their own idea of who they are, setting up profiles on Facebook and furnishing their name with a certain air by inserting it in certain contexts, not unlike the way in which a brand is built up or a pop star constructed. To be surrounded by media doesn't just mean that we look at images of other people in other places and in that way keep ourselves abreast of what is going on in the world, it also has an effect on the way we see ourselves and seeps imperceptibly into our identities, which gradually recalibrate toward the expectation of an observing "everyone" or "all," eclipsing the particular gaze in the particular situation, where everything is tangible, with all the consequences that implies with respect to the image we hold of ourselves.

While the expectation of being seen by some specific other – the neighbors, for instance, or what Tor Jonsson called "the village beast" – may be shut out physically by lowering the blinds, or dealt with by going away, the expectation of the abstract other, the all of society, is impossible to eliminate, since it lives inside us and is something to which we continually relate even in our innermost dwelling spaces, which we furnish to satisfy that expectation, the kitchen, formerly a place in which to prepare and eat food, now being done up at huge expense to look like a showroom despite hardly ever being seen by others. This inner all, whose flame is kept alive by the presence of TV screens in every room and which ensures that we are always seen and are somehow held under our own surveillance, means also that we begin to resemble each other more, it being the same god to which we submit and to whose requirements we adapt ourselves in a system of social control far subtler than that imagined by Orwell in his famous dystopia.

The name has always occupied a space between the concrete and the abstract, the individual and the social, but when it begins to be shaped and charged with meaning in places removed from the physical world, in that way entering the world of fiction, albeit unseen by the majority, at the same time as this fictional world is expanding and taking up an ever greater part of our lives – the TV screens are now not only in our own rooms, but also on the walls of our trains and under the luggage bins of our planes, in the waiting rooms of our doctors' offices and the halls of our banks, even in the supermarkets, quite apart from our carrying them around in the form of laptop computers and cell phones, in such a way that we inhabit two realities, one abstract and image-based, in which all kinds of people and places present themselves before us with nothing in common but being somewhere other than where we are, and one concrete, physical, which is the one we move around in and are more palpably a part of – when we arrive at a point where everything is either fiction or seen as fiction, the job of the novelist can no longer be to write more fictions. That was the feeling I had: the world was vanishing because it was always somewhere else, and my life was vanishing because it too was always somewhere else. If I was to write a novel it would have to be about the real world the way it was, seen from the point of view of someone who was trapped inside it with his body, though not with his mind, which was trapped in something else, the powerful urge to rise out of such fusty triviality into the clear, piercing air of something immeasurably greater. Ascent was art, fiction, abstraction, ideology; confinement was in the world of things and bodies, the material soon-to-be-rotting universe all of us comprise. That was the idea, or the urge: reality. And the sign of such reality, its only transferrable component, was the name. Not as dream or image, but as the sign of the individual human. I was of course aware that the novel, being composed of signs, could not be reality itself, but merely invoke reality, and that the reality it invoked would be just as abstract as the one from which I was trying to escape; and at the same time I knew too that what the novel can do, and which perhaps is its most important property, is to penetrate our veils of habit and familiarity simply by describing things in a slightly different way, for example by being insistent with respect to some particular state of affairs, let's say describing a child's pacifier over a whole page, whereby the real child's pacifier would subsequently present itself differently, in that its pacifying – that aspect of it that makes us see only its function and not its form, which is quite sensuous in its combination of soft, droplet-shaped rubber with the hard plastic of the grip, this blend of nipple imitation and toy, created to satisfy the cravings of the child, who likes both to suck and to chew, and to look at and grasp objects with bright and simple colors and rounded forms – would thereby be modified, or by juxtaposing things not normally juxtaposed, since it was not reality that had vanished, but my attention toward it. I could not relinquish my grip on it, this was my intuition, or my explanation of the fundamental lack of meaning I felt in my life, and it may well have been just another explanation, another theory, in itself abstract, but it did not feel that way, and if there's something I've learned to trust over the course of the forty-two years I have lived, it is my feelings. In the novel I began to write, the authentic names were therefore the key. I was aware that a number of people could not be named, since they would not wish to be associated with the events I was going to describe, my uncle being one, and I had no problem at all giving up those names, although for a short time I resisted when one of them didn't want to be in the book in any way at all, not even under another name, because at that point I had no idea how the novel was going to be received, viewing it simply as an experiment in realism that would reach only a very small number of interested readers and be hurled against the wall out of sheer boredom and frustration by anyone else who might venture into its pages. I was, however, totally against changing the names of those in the next most immediate sphere, those I played with as a child, for instance, or went to gymnas with. The whole point of the novel was to depict reality as it was. A growing-up shaped by the boy who lived here and did this, the girl who lived there and did that, the boy I heard about at that particular time, the girl I kissed that Friday night, not shrouded in literature's pall, not ingeniously illuminated in prose's darkened studio, but described in full daylight, swathed in reality. I wanted to get to what was raw and arbitrary about that reality, and to that end the name was essential. Obviously, reality would be altered into something else in the process of being depicted, but my hope was that what was fantastic about the phenomenon itself, the fact of existing alongside a certain collection of people where everyone knew each other or had heard of each other, in a certain period of time in a certain geographical area, and where basically anything at all could happen, but where things eventually turned out according to reality's own exactness and precision, that some of this, the starry luster of growing up, familiar to us all, would shine through the literary form. Every name that went from being real to being fictional weakened that feeling and pulled the novel into the shimmer of enfeebled reality it had been written to engage against. Geir G. said it didn't matter to the reader, he or she wasn't going to connect the names with anyone anyway and wouldn't know if it was authentic or not. But the authentic is a timbre, impossible to imitate.

In a novel the name works like a face: on the first encounter it's new and unfamiliar, but spending even a short time in its presence you start associating certain characteristics with it, then gradually, if it remains near to you over time, a history, eventually an entire life, in that the faces with which you're familiar absorb all that you know about them without you necessarily being aware of the fact; in the case of an old friend walking toward you, that knowledge is patent, melted into the face, each and every aspect that to you comprises "him" or "her." In the best instances the name of a character in a novel is so precise as to summon something essential to the epoch, and in exceptional cases may even become an emblem of the universally human. The inauthentic life of Emma Bovary, the ruthless ambition of Lucien Sorel, the loss of meaning felt by Hamlet, the ideological unyieldingness of Brand. The Austrian writer Ingeborg Bachmann points out in an essay how the literature of our own time strikingly comprises no such names.

Don DeLillo is one of the best novelists of our time, yet how many recall even a single name among his many characters? Bachmann writes that Thomas Mann was the last great conjurer of names: Hans Castorp, Adrian Leverkühn, Tonio Kröger, Serenus Zeitblom. These are names that sponge up characteristics and meanings that belong not merely to the individuals they denote, but also to the culture of which they are a part. Thomas Mann was the last great bourgeois novelist; together with Marcel Proust he marks the end point of an entire epoch, perhaps also, and certainly in the case of Proust, its consummation. In no other work of the bourgeois period does the name play so great a part as in Proust's In Search of Lost Time. Here the name is no longer an instrument by which to achieve some particular effect, and no mere furnishing of the novel's interior; rather it is a major theme, and thereby it loses its innocence. However, this loss of innocence occurred not only in Proust's novel; while Proust was working on In Search of Lost Time, in Paris, Kafka was writing his novels and stories in Prague, and in them the name has changed radically; he called his main character Josef K, or more simply K. The abbreviation of the name removes everything that the name usually brings with it, the individual and the local, which thereby become plain in its absence. The individual and the local are what we can identify with, a name inspires first and foremost a form of intimacy, and when the intimacy of the name is gone, our intimacy with the character is gone too and the character is left surrounded by uncertainty and mystery: the name in Kafka is an antiname. At the same time, the character bearing the name leaves a very clear and definite impression, he is a "someone" rather than a "no one." The reduction is by no means arbitrary, the particular things that vanish with the name, everything that binds the character to others and itself, and to places, represent his history. If history is gone, only the moment remains, and what is a human being in the moment? What is a character without its history? What is this something we sense, this impression of another human, when it is unattached to action or origin? The question is not entirely adequate in light of what goes on in Kafka's prose; this we see if we compare it to that of another, slightly earlier author, Knut Hamsun, who in his first novel also writes about a person without history or home, who exists in an environment to which he is fundamentally unattached. Hamsun's character is nameless, but this does not mean that he is an antiperson, merely that his name is not given. The difference between Hamsun's unnamed and Kafka's antinamed character is palpable and determines how the two novels are read. Hamsun's urge toward individuality was great, occasionally immense, and what he opposed most of all in his first phase was literature's reduction of the individual, the unique never being allowed to be simply unique, but always a sign of something general and universal, and that the two were connected by means of formulas and schemata. "A man who deals in horses, for example," he wrote in his manifesto From the Unconscious Life of the Mind, "A man who deals in horses is nothing else but a horse dealer. He is a horse dealer in every word. He cannot read a folktale or speak of flowers or take an interest in cleanliness; no, he must always brag, always pat his wallet, curse like a barbarian, and smell of the stables." Literature as Hamsun saw it was simple, schematic, structural, cohesive, harmonious, explained, whereas the life he saw around him was complex, unsystematic, incohesive, arbitrary, unharmonious, unexplained. How could the writer transport the language out of the system into life as it was lived? This was the question Hamsun posed in Lillesand in the autumn of 1890. It was a confrontation with realism or an attempt toward a new, truer realism, and what he did to that end was to remove all categories he found establishing particular connections and which in themselves steered the reader's understanding of the character: so no childhood, no parents, no native soil, no friends, no environment, no history – and no name. He was striving for the unique, and sought therefore to move toward the now, the world prior to meaning, prior to interpretation, which is to say toward the forever as yet unexplained. If the name is the character's face in the novel, then the character in Hamsun's novel ought to be faceless, yet he is not; his "I" is so strong, so willful, and brings together so much in its being that it becomes like a name itself, with which the reader quickly becomes intimate, though without at any point becoming ensnared in the emblematism Hamsun so despised. He wanted the character not to be representative of time or epoch, but of itself, and if there was any semblance of representation in that it was of the unique human. Kafka's design in removing origin, history, and environment from his character was almost the exact opposite; what he endeavored to demonstrate was not the individual's uniqueness, its development and individuality, but the forces by which it was constrained and governed, not in terms of the near, the personal, and the intimate, but of the common and the general, in which they appear quite as faceless as his main character. The K is like a blindfold. Josef K, we say, and think not of a certain person's character, the way we do when we say Othello or Odysseus, but of a certain state, dim and obscure, labyrinthine, unfathomable, faceless.

The main character in Hamsun's next novel was just as removed from his history as the I of Hunger, and quite as alien to his surroundings, but did possess in contrast a name. Yet the name, Nagel, signified no particular place of belonging, neither in terms of class nor geography, and was perhaps first and foremost an anagram – certainly it would seem reasonable to take it to be a play on the Norwegian galen, mad. Whereas Emma Bovary's fate consists of her confusing the romantic and the real, Nagel's is that he sees through the romantic, sees through art, sees through the circus of small-town life and the drama of the wider world: everything is pretense, this is his insight. Including death, into which it all propels him; it too has an element of performance about it, not in the form of tragedy, more like a farce. The notion that nothing can be taken seriously is an infrequent starting point for a novel, which presumably on some level has to take itself seriously in order to be written. Mysteries is perhaps not the most successful of novels, yet it does contain some quite unrivaled passages in which Hamsun ventures still further into the now and describe the almost completely unattached stirrings of a human mind at any given moment. Of all that goes on in Nagel's mind, little may be traced back to a particular self, or rather it would seem hard to say what this self in actual fact consists of, not least because so much of what runs through it comes from outside, in the first instance by the fact of being language, which is the same for everyone, and in the second by being made up of fragments of general culture, and what reveals itself then, perhaps for the first time, for never before have I seen a stream of consciousness so rendered with all it contains of high and low, important and unimportant, is how the world flows through the individual to such a remarkable extent that one has to wonder if anything like individuality even exists, and, if it does, in what ways it might manifest itself. And if it does not exist, what does a name then represent?

"Names! What's in a name?" Joyce asks in the ninth chapter of his Ulysses, the part that takes place in the national library in Dublin, where Stephen Dedalus, the young man with the rather less than realistic-sounding name, discusses Hamlet and Shakespeare with some intellectual acquaintances. This question of the name was originally posed by Shakespeare. Shakespeare, says Stephen, was not Hamlet, but Hamlet's father, the dead king who appeared as a ghost before his son. Hamlet's mother, Queen Gertrude, was then Anne Hathaway, Shakespeare's wife, who according to Stephen was unfaithful, while Hamlet himself was Hamnet Shakespeare, dead son of William Shakespeare and Anne Hathaway. Underlying this discussion is the fact that the novel opens by describing a conversation between two young men in a tower, one being Stephen, who has just lost his mother. The other, Buck Mulligan, says to him, "The aunt thinks you killed your mother," to which Stephen replies, "Someone killed her." The tower is the castle at Elsinore, Dublin Bay the strait between Denmark and Sweden, and Stephen is Hamlet. But Stephen is also Telemachus journeying in search of his father, Odysseus, which is to say Leopold Bloom, the Jew. And Leopold Bloom is besides Odysseus also Virgil when in the night he walks side by side with Stephen, which is to say Dante, through the streets of Dublin, which is to say Hell, and he is the writer Henry Flowers, who sends audacious letters on the sly to a woman whose acquaintance he has made by way of an advertisement. But he is moreover the father of a son who died, which in this universe makes him Shakespeare, father of Hamnet. And his wife is not only Penelope, who is besieged by men in Odysseus's absence, but also Anne Hathaway, which is to say Queen Gertrude, since just after four o'clock that day she is in bed with her impresario, making a cuckold of Bloom. Ulysses is a novel about change, but also a novel about everything always being the same, and the dimension with which it is most concerned, the mystery it grapples with so unrelentingly, is time. The action takes place during the course of a single day in Dublin, and the now is a kind of gateway standing open to the past, which rises and falls imperceptibly in everything, and to the future, which is slung through it. "Hold on to the now," Stephen tells himself in the library, "the here, through which all future plunges to the past," words that contain at once a philosophy of life and a poetics. In the discussion of Plato and Aristotle there, Stephen suggests that Aristotle would have considered Hamlet's musings on death, this "improbable, insignificant, and undramatic monologue," to be quite as shallow as Plato's. The apotheosis of ideas, the heaven of shapeless spirit, is anathema to Stephen; what he believes in is the material world in all its abundance, and what Joyce does in Ulysses is to investigate how ideas and the immaterial manifest themselves in the material, proceeding from the idea that they are found only there, in the now, in the bodies and objects that exist here at this moment. If life is a journey forward through time, the past is its phantom. "What is a ghost?" Stephen asks. "One who has faded into impalpability, through death, through absence, through change of manners." That such a transition occurs through death is the normal understanding, through absence a logical extension, but in the last phrase, "through change of manners," we leave the individual death and enter the collective: a ghost is that which time has abandoned. This is Joyce's overarching theme, treated first in the small and, compared to Ulysses, relatively intimate format of the short story "The Dead," toward the very end of which he uses the same expression as he would later have Stephen think: "His own identity was fading out into a gray impalpable world." The gray impalpable world into which his own self vanished was that of the dead. The palpable world the dead had once built up and inhabited, dissolved and disappeared. In Ulysses that thought is launched into the world, we might say, transplanted from the framed confines of the closet drama into teeming, ordinary life, on an ordinary day in an ordinary city, in which it is active on all levels and in every context, though without dominating any, since with the action taking place during the course of a day, and the text unyieldingly in the moment, nothing is overriding and everything is dissolved in the now. This is true of history, it is true of mythology, true of the dead, true of philosophy, true of religion, and especially, perhaps primarily, true of identity. None of these categories is splintered or dissolved, but simply viewed through the prism of the moment, which can only handle little bits at a time. A glimpse of the dead mother here, the smell of the room in which she lay, a thought from Thomas Aquinas there, a sparkle of sun on a pane, the rush of the waves, a brewery horse on its way down the street, a sentence in a newspaper, a snippet of an aria, a fawning librarian, the books on the shelves thought of as coffins. This is what it is to exist in the world. To understand it or think about it, you have to step back from it. So too with Ulysses. All the little bits, all the structures dissolved in the now, come together in bigger bits, which is Joyce's answer to the question: What does it mean to be human? The novel has three main characters: Stephen Dedalus, the young man on his way up; all his energy is spent on wrenching himself free of what holds him down, his father, a drunken charmer, his mother, whose death weighs on his mind and racks him with guilt, his friends, against whom he competes, and his education, which is familiarity with the thoughts of others – his adventurous suggestion of Hamlet's mediocrity is a way of elevating himself in what we refer to, with some measure of resignation, as youthful arrogance, in actual fact but a necessary vigor; Leopold Bloom, the middle-aged man (who in our day would be considered relatively young, would wear sneakers and regularly shave his head; he is thirty-eight years old), in the middle of life, an advertising agent with no upward trajectory, an ordinary man doing the best he can; and Molly Bloom, singer, some years younger than her husband, spending most of her time in bed and merely referred to, until concluding the novel in her own voice, a long inner monologue completely unlike everything that has gone before. Leopold Bloom is in many respects Stephen Dedalus's opposite; whereas the younger man is introduced at the top of a tower, high above the world, hooked up with Hamlet, Ancient Greece, and Christianity, the reader meets Bloom right in the middle of his everyday life, in a kitchen, associated closely from the start with the mortal world and bodily pleasures; first the faint smell of urine from fried kidneys, then the pleasing waft of his excrement after moving his bowels. When later in the day he visits a museum and looks at the statues there, it is Aphrodite that captures his attention, for reasons quite apart from the noble and artistic. Leopold Bloom's mind too is filled with fragments of immaterial reality, though in its lowest form, as it appears in newspapers and advertisements, signs and leaflets, he misconstrues and is often naïve, but in contrast to Stephen he is a whole human being, a complete human being, a true human being, so when finally they meet and go through the city together at night he is indeed Virgil to Stephen Dedalus's Dante. That Molly Bloom should be lying above them with her head full of thoughts as they seat themselves in the kitchen is something of which both are unaware, just as they are oblivious to her superiority over them, in the sense that she sees her husband so much more clearly than he sees her, and sees Stephen as a diligent schoolboy, the son of his father.

Few characters in the history of literature are depicted with as much complexity as these three. Yet the novel could not have carried any of their names as its title; it could not have been called Leopold Bloom, as Flaubert's novel was called Madame Bovary or Shakespeare's play was called Hamlet, Prince of Denmark, for the novel is greater than them, which is to say that the characters are not the principal focus of its theme. Everyone knows Madame Bovary's conflict, Hamlet's conflict, Don Quixote's conflict, it is what we think about when we hear the names, but who knows Stephen Dedalus's conflict? He is more intelligent than Hamlet, finds Hamlet's ruminations about death shallow, and his field of reference is broader, he too has lost one of his parents and feels guilty about it, yet the fact remains that as a literary character he is not in Hamlet's league. Is that because Elizabethan England had a different view of greatness from that of Dublin at the beginning of the twentieth century? Joyce strives to portray the lives of quite ordinary people, and the contrast to the greatness from Odysseus and Hamlet is a continual point; if the same thing happens in Ulysses, it happens on a smaller scale. Prometheus's impressive and wild transformations are represented in Dublin by a dog and Stephen's imagination, as Olof Lagercrantz observed. The modest life, meaning the ordinary and down to earth, is the foundation of Ulysses, and through such life the novel's great characters and themes wander ghostlike. Of course, it is far from unusual for an ordinary person, one deemed by others to be insignificant, to make a great character in a novel; Emma Bovary is no princess or duchess but the jilted wife of a country doctor. The difference is that Madame Bovary, Don Quixote, and Hamlet reside in history, whereas in the case of Leopold Bloom, Molly Bloom, and Stephen Dedalus the opposite holds and history resides in them. The new in Joyce and modernist literature is in the weakening of the boundary between the self and the outside world, so radical that the relationship becomes near osmotic. People get bigger in a way, embracing both history and the stream of events of contemporary existence, but they also get smaller insofar as what is unique and unexampled about them, collected in the name, the person they are, becomes dissolved in it.

Yet while Joyce achieved these insights, and they were achieved simultaneously in many other fields of culture, they have never been for everyone, the way the Odyssey, for instance, once was for everyone, as one must assume it was, something children and adults alike, women and men, poor and rich listened to. Ulysses has only ever been read by the few, a fate it shares with many other trailblazing works of modernism, not just in literature but also in philosophy and psychology, the work of Husserl and Freud to mention but two, because although many of their ideas have spread and been accorded universal validity, the exactness on which they depend and which only direct reading can provide, has been lost along the way. Ulysses has become the myth of the difficult book, eight hundred pages about a single day, Freud is associated with the subconscious, with stretching out on a couch and talking about your childhood, and with jokes about cigars and trains going through tunnels, Husserl is Heidegger's forerunner, Heidegger himself a Nazi. The fact that Joyce writes about this, the way culture's every expression is broken down to live among us only barely understood, as misconstruals, assumptions, half-truths, myths and surmisals, bits of this and fragments of that, as if to show that culture is this, the human and living is that, God but a shout in the street, is perhaps ironic in view of he himself becoming the very epitome of literary elitism and obliviousness to the world, though quite understandable given the fact that in order to get there, in order to penetrate into this, he had to shun that same quotidian culture's ways of communicating.

What they actually comprise becomes clear in the way the American writer William Faulkner exploits the name. In his novel The Sound and the Fury names are presented without accompanying information as to those they denote, who are taken for granted, hardly a characteristic or note of origin to go with them; Faulkner's names leave us utterly in the dark.

In her essay on the name in literature Ingeborg Bachmann writes about Faulkner, and her examples are telling: one minute we're reading about someone calling for Caddie, the next about someone called Caddy, no information is given, one is associated with the verb "hit," perhaps we're dealing with a golfer calling his caddie, but something else is triggered by this too; later the name Caddy appears, the time is another, the connection unclear. Then a character named Quentin is introduced, and one minute the name refers to a woman, the next to a man. In a way, Faulkner goes further than Joyce in his approach to reality, attempting to describe the world the way it appears to his characters and making no effort at all to describe the characters to us, their gazes are as such unconveyed, and in that lies the realism. Reading The Sound and the Fury is like going into the house of a family you don't know, where everyone's talking about their relations and paying you not even the slightest attention; all you get is a number of names connected to various events and occurrences everyone knows about except you, which is why they are never related in their entirety but merely alluded to. Or rather, no, it's like going inside the mind of one of those sitting there and being party to the way he or she experiences the conversation, the allusions and references being even more oblique; no one explains to themselves what they already know. The names are closed to us, but not in the same way as in Kafka, where they are relieved of their surroundings and history; on the contrary, in The Sound and the Fury the names are woven into the surroundings and history, and since both are closed to us, the names too are closed. The lack of openness points directly inward toward the core of the novel, the fulcrum around which it revolves: something happened once, something no one can talk about, not even think about, but which nevertheless is present in the various streams of consciousness. It cannot be conveyed, it cannot be confronted, it must be concealed. The word incest appears, apparently it has to do with that. Incest is one of the oldest of all taboos, and the whole novel, the mood it creates, does indeed have something archaic about it. In Faulkner the past is like a void and unclear, differing radically from Joyce's past, which above all is the past of culture, that which is devised and created, Odysseus and Circe, Dante, and Shakespeare, a past to which one relates through the intellect, whereas the past in Faulkner's work is nameless and without language, and may only be sensed or felt. The difference is reflected too in the titles. Both are intertextual, Joyce finding his in Homer, Faulkner in Shakespeare, but while Joyce uses a name, Ulysses, and brings a culture to life, Faulkner uses a phenomenon of the world, sound/noise/commotion, and another from the domain of the human, fury/rage/anger, both timeless. The name does not address the archaic, but the social. The distance between the archaic and the social is brought about by Faulkner through the unfamiliarity that is infused into the name, the rejection of familiarity. Thus, an existential depth is invoked, which neither Joyce nor Kafka are anywhere near. This is not about the presence or absence of the contemporary, and the idea of "existential depth" is perhaps misleading, since the archaic is not behind anything, and not inside anything, the difference being not a matter of rungs, but of the eye, and through the eye the experience, which is unreachable by language and therefore must be evoked. While the secret is not in itself unreachable in The Sound and the Fury, it cannot, for social and psychological reasons, be named, much as in Ibsen's plays, the only difference being that there it rises to the surface to be perceived and recognized in a kind of culmination alien to Faulkner's own characters. Faulkner's, Joyce's, Flaubert's, Proust's, and Kafka's books inhabit the social domain, the novel is its literary form, concerned with interpersonal relationships and how the reality we make up and by which we are surrounded is communicated. This is the case even in Dostoevsky; the fulcrum of his novels is never the spiritual or the religious in itself, but the reactions to it of the surrounding world. This is the novel's basic constraint, chained as it is to life in the social domain, the way people are to each other, and the minute the novel departs from that human world and ventures into the nonhuman or the beyond-human of the divine, it dies. As long as Dante is writing about an inferno populated by people, his epic poem lives; as soon as he proceeds upward to heaven to depict the divine, it withers away in his hands. Music can express it, and painting too, since their forms are wordless, their language another and nameless, as removed from the I that employs it and the I that perceives it as figures in a mathematical formula. Reading a novel after having listened to Bach's cello suites is like leaving a sunset to descend into a cellar. The novel is the form of the small life, and when it's not it is because it's being deceitful and is no true novel at all, since no I exists that isn't small too. The only literary form that can exceed it is the poem. The poem is akin to the song and exists somewhere between music and the word, which is to say that it is capable of reaching beyond the word and thus to break out of the social, which is another term for the world as we know it. This means poetry is related also to religion, which has always been rooted in the human domain, staring out at the nonhuman, in whose icy winds we are unknown and strangers to all, not just to each other, but also to ourselves.

A poem of Rilke's begins like this:

They had, for a while, grown used to him. But after they lit the kitchen lamp and in the dark
it began to burn, restlessly, the stranger
was altogether strange.

The situation is the washing of a corpse, and the poem concludes thus:

And one without a name
lay clean and naked there, and gave commands.

The name is what joins the body to our social life, the name collects all judgments and assumptions as to a particular personality, and what happens when a person dies is that the name is no longer connected to the body, which decomposes and disappears, whereas the name lives on in the social world.

Can we imagine a person without a name?

It would certainly say something quite different about being human. Without a name the human would be a locus for the beating of a heart, the wheeze of lungs, the tumult of thought, its identity residing in the unique moment, which is to say akin to animal.

But we are that, too.

Rilke's corpse had always been strange, in the sense of unknown, but only when dead and nameless could it be seen as such. And the commands it gave were commands to life outside the social world, commands of flesh, earth, water.

That perspective is ever present in Rilke's poems, not without reason was he a pupil of Hölderlin's, the poet of the divine perspective, for whom the social world does not exist; in Hölderlin everything is existential, and the fact that at the end he abandoned the social context completely in his life, vanishing into madness, beyond the grip of the self, is hard not to understand as a consequence of the worldview expressed in his poems. Rilke is closer to the social, his poems wash in and out of the two different worlds, and the fact that he wrote so often about angels must be seen in that light, angels being the very connecting figures between the divine and the human. In one of his Duino Elegies he writes:

For it seems that everything hides us. Look: trees do exist; the houses that we live in still stand. We alone fly past all things, as fugitive as the wind.
And all things conspire to keep silent about us, half out of shame perhaps, half as unutterable hope.

The poem moves between what is, the silent, nameless world, and we who see it. That the silent world tries to hide us means that it knows us; and it does so because we issue from it, which in turn is to say we have left it, yet at the same time we continue to belong to it, our hearts beating without word, and I believe it is that very movement he is describing, inward toward our being, outward away from it again. Religion strives inward toward being, and art strives toward that same place. Religion and art combine in the angel. "Every angel is terrifying," Rilke also writes. Why is the angel terrifying? Because its presence renders the human figurative in the same way as death. Yes, the angel looks at us with the eyes of death. Rilke's angels have nothing to do with Christianity. In Christ man was made God, and what he opened up to us he opened up in the social world: your neighbor is you, turn the other cheek, everyone is of equal worth. The social world is about establishing and maintaining differences. In one swoop he annulled them. Forgiveness is the uniformity of the divine implanted in the human. It is as if the gaze is turned from the stars to the eyes.

But as hard as it is for us to exist in the uniformity of the divine, it is quite as hard to do so in that of forgiveness. We are too small, we creep and crawl in and out of our houses and through our streets, terrified for a moment by the vacuum of death yet shaking off our fears to keep on crawling, in and out of our houses, up and down our streets, with a vitality we cannot hope to make shine in the way of the all-obliterating light of the good, no matter that this is what we wish, for our vitality hits a wall, is thrown against a ceiling, hurled toward a floor, it steers us this way and that, in the small and intermittent dislocations that characterize not only the human body, but also its soul and mind.

We lose ourselves, and we lose ourselves in each other.

When I read Rilke's poem it was Dad I thought about, the time I saw him lying dead on a table in the chapel in Kristiansand, in the summer of 1998.

They had, for a while, grown used to him. But after they lit the kitchen lamp and in the dark
it began to burn, restlessly, the stranger
was altogether strange.

That was what I saw. Not that he was a stranger, but that he had always been a stranger. If I had spoken his name then he would not have reacted, it would have glanced off him, for it was no longer his. He was a corpse and as such outside the name. His body had slid out of its name and lay there without, nameless. For the remainder of that week I saw in short glimpses everything else around me in the same way, outside the name. It was a secret world I saw, and if I did not understand it then, I understand it now, the kinship of death and art, and their function in life, which is to prevent reality, our conception of the world, from conflating with the world.

So much of Dad was collected in his name. He spelled it differently when he was young, and changed it sometime in his forties, and as he lay there dead and nameless, the name the mason chiseled into his headstone was spelled incorrectly. The stone is still there, in the cemetery in Kristiansand, with its misspelled name, on top of the interred urn containing the ashes of his body. And when, ten years later, I began to write about him I was prohibited from referring to him by name. Before that I had never given a thought to what a name was and what it meant. But I did so now, accentuated by the events that followed in the wake of the first book, and I began to write this chapter, first about the name itself, then about various names of literature and their function there, starting out with a piece of thinking I found in the writing of Ingeborg Bachmann concerning the decline of the name in literature, contained in a short essay in a book published a few years ago by Pax. The essay on the name began on a right-hand page. On the left-hand page were some lines of a poem my eyes absently scanned when at some point during the spring I sat down with the book in front of me, intending to see if anything of what I had written had been unwittingly drawn from Bachmann's essay.

So there are temples yet. A star
probably still has light.
Nothing,
nothing is lost.

These were the words I read. I guessed they were from a poem of Paul Celan, knowing that Paul Celan and Ingeborg Bachmann had been friends and furthermore enjoyed a certain literary kinship. This is the kind of thing one knows without it necessarily having any bearing on anything, a relationship of some sort that is simply there. That Paul Celan knew and corresponded with Nelly Sachs, for instance, and that Nelly Sachs fled to Stockholm during the war and remained there for the rest of her life. Both were Jewish, and both wrote poetry that had to do with the extermination of the Jews. Both lived in exile, Celan in Paris, Sachs in Stockholm. I had never read any of their poems, apart from Paul Celan's "Death Fugue," which I found astonishingly beautiful when I was introduced to it as a nineteen-year-old student in the writers' academy in Hordaland. "Svart morgonmjølk me drikk ho um kvelden," as Hauge's Norwegian translation went, "Black milk of daybreak we drink it at sundown," and "døden er ein meister frå Tyskland," "death is a master from Germany." It was a poem I would later feel shame at having found such beauty in, since its theme was not the exquisite and the sublime, but the exquisite and the sublime's antithesis, the extermination of the Jews.

I skimmed back a few pages in Bachmann's book. Indeed it was Paul Celan. The six lines cited at the end of the essay were from a poem called "Engführung," or "The Straitening" as it is called in one celebrated English translation. I had not heard of it before, but I did have a collection of Paul Celan's poetry in Øyvind Berg's Norwegian translations, it had remained unread on my bookshelf since sometime in the midnineties and I found it immediately. Something in those six lines had appealed to me. Perhaps it was the sequence "Nothing/nothing is lost" that seemed so positive at first sight, only then to turn itself almost inside out and become the opposite; "nothing is lost" can mean that everything goes on as before, if one reads the words in their most immediate sense, meaning that nothing has been lost, but if they are read in the sense of "nothing" being what is lost, the poem then opens out toward something else entirely, since "nothing" is not simply nothing, it is also the end point of all mysticism – the Kabbalists wrote that God resides in the depths of his nothingness. The idea that God is nothing belongs to negative mysticism; by saying what God is not, the divine may be approached without reduction. I had no idea if Paul Celan's poem had anything at all to do with such things, but in the preceding lines temples were mentioned, the houses of religion, and a star, which is only there in darkness. "A/star/probably still has light," it said. Why "probably," why "still"? The existence of the temples too was qualified by a "yet." Did it have something to do with Rilke's poem? He too used the word in a sense that seemed to deviate from the expected, when he wrote "the houses/that we live in still stand." All this made the poem potentially very interesting, but the most important reason for me picking it out and skimming through it was because I was looking for something I could use in my essay about the name. I found it.

The place where they lay, it has a name – it has none.

I read.

Something had a name, but what this name might be wasn't mentioned, and then the fact of it having a name was taken back.

With that in mind I noted there wasn't a single name in the entire poem. Not of a person, not of a place, and not of any time.

Why would that be?

Whatever the reason, I found myself drawn in by it, for this was not a world in which the reason for the name not being mentioned could be that it wasn't important, which is to say not the nameless essence of reality, the world beyond language, true and authentic; this seemed rather to be a world in which the name more simply could not be mentioned. It was as if the very foundation of the name was broken.

What was the foundation of the name?

In what way was it broken?

I read the poem, understanding nothing, it was closed to me, almost completely mute. This was no infrequent experience of mine. I couldn't read poetry, and had never been able to. At the same time I had always, from when I was nineteen and had been introduced to the leading modernist poets at the writers' academy, considered poetry to be the pinnacle. What poetry was in touch with was something I was not in touch with, and my respect for poetry was boundless. This is no exaggeration. I have written about it earlier too, in this novel, the way the poem, which I took to be the highest form of expression, refused to open itself to me. When I grew older I became familiar with all the names of the poets and knew enough about them to be able to mention them in what I was writing or talking about, as with the example of Paul Celan above; he was from Romania, his parents died in a German concentration camp, he lived in Paris, wrote in German, and committed suicide sometime in the sixties by drowning himself in the Seine. His poems were mysterious, belonging in a way to the same tradition as Hölderlin and Rilke, but at the end of it, because with Celan the language came apart.

I knew who they were, but not what they had written.

Could it really be the case that poets and readers of poetry comprised some esoteric sect? Surely not only the initiated could read poems?

For some reason that was exactly how I had perceived it. The sense of others possessing insights I have no idea about, of everyone else being able and knowledgeable, has pursued me all through my adult life, in almost every respect. And, I think to myself now as I sit here at the age of nearly forty-three, most likely with justification. I suspect there are vast areas of human erotic life about which I know nothing and which I associate with darkness and fervency, an almost limitless sophistication into which other people, though by no means all, are initiated. When I meet people I often think this to myself, that to them I must come across as naïve and innocuous, a bit like a child. The same applies to poetry. Poetry expresses the innermost secrets of life and the world, some people relate to it with the greatest of ease, others are excluded. That I got nothing out of the poetry I read merely confirmed this to be true. It was as if poems were written in code. I felt excluded by many other languages too, that of mathematics, for instance, yet the language of mathematics did not possess the aura for me of leading to the grail, was not shrouded in such dim mists, with half-turned faces, derisive sneers, scornful eyes. This feeling, of being outside what was important, was degrading, since it made me simple and my life shallow. The way I tackled it was to ignore it and pretend it didn't bother me. The deep secrets of erotic life and the esoteric insights of poetry were meant for others, whereas I, constrained by the stupid thinness of my life, struggled to accept that life was just that, stupid and thin. At the same time, something happened when I entered my thirties, in that some semblance of confidence came to me in the way I engaged with literature, though it was difficult to pin down, most of all a feeling of being able to see that little bit further, think that little bit further, and that what previously had been closed to me suddenly seemed possible to prize open. Though not unconditionally; I could read The Death of Virgil by Broch with some return, but not The Sleepwalkers by the same author, a novel of which I still hadn't the faintest understanding. It was at that time I got a job working as a consultant on the Norwegian revision of the Old Testament, and since I had no grounding in the linguistic, cultural, or religious aspects that were involved, I had no option but to work hard and meticulously, nothing was going to come to me on a plate, and what revealed itself then, when I went through the first sentence of the creation word for word, for instance, was the way in which entire worldviews might be encapsulated in a comma, in an "and," in a "which," and, with those insights, how different the world becomes if its description is coordinate with rather than subordinate to the metaphor, for example, or the way a word not only has lexical meaning, but is also colored by the contexts in which it appears, something the writers of the Bible exploited to the full, for instance by allowing a word at the beginning to apply to the sun's relation to the earth, and then to let that same word many pages on apply to man's relation to woman. The word is merely there, in the two different places, and the connection is as good as invisible, yet decisive. People have been reading the Bible as holy Scripture for a couple of thousand years, and every word it contains has been considered meaningful, a dizzyingly tight mesh of different meanings and shades of meaning have thereby arisen, which no single human can ever possibly command. What happened when I started working on those texts was that I learned to read. I began to understand what it meant to read. Reading is seeing the words as lights shining in the dark, one after another, and to engage in the activity of reading is to follow the lights into the text. But what we see is never detached from the person we are; the mind has its limitations, they are personal, but cultural too in that there is always something we cannot see and places we cannot go. If we are patient and investigate the words and their contexts carefully enough, we may nonetheless identify those limitations, and what is revealed to us then is that which lies outside ourselves. The goal of reading is to reach these places. This is what learning is, seeing that which lies outside the confines of the self. To grow older is not to understand more but to realize that there is more to understand. Yet the secrets of the Old Testament were to begin with so remote as to be unthreatening. The secrets of erotic life and poetry were menacing, in contrast, having to do with my identity, and what kept me outside was not the alien nature of their culture but the chasm within my own, which was to do with the very remoteness of such things. I realize this probably comes across as somewhat hysterical, and I don't know how to put it in order to make it clear just how inhibiting it is to feel excluded from that which is significant. To me this was exactly the aura in which Paul Celan's poetry was shrouded. His poems canceled out what was given about the words, and thereby what was given about the world. As such, it was not so much existence that was on the line as identity. The name had to become visible in the nameless, much as the all became visible in the nothing, so I imagined on the basis of the four words, "nothing/nothing is lost," which I had read and puzzled over. And that surely was how it was with regard to the poem as a whole. It was not composed of mysteries, but of words. So all that was required was to read them. To note down all possible meanings of the first word, then the next, and then consider the connections between them.

The first word was "Driven."

Driven into the terrain
with the unmistakable track:

grass, written asunder.

Aside from its everyday, transportational sense, "drive" means to propel, to force to go into or penetrate. It suggests the existence of an outside, a place from where what is propelled comes. The German original has "verbracht," and that contains the same element of force. Another English translation has "deported," suggesting forcible removal from one place to another.

Something is driven in from outside, not tenderly and with caution, but firmly, without consideration, harshly and mechanically even; this seemed like a plausible interpretation. But driven into where? Into "the terrain with the unmistakable track." This could be the poem's own terrain, the place established by its very designation, and yet that place seems to exist already, whatever is driven in is already driven, now an element of that terrain.

The terrain is characterized by way of "the unmistakable track." Like "driven," "unmistakable" has something unaccommodating about it, something firm and incontestable. The unmistakable is hard fact, something a person can do nothing about. If "driven" and "unmistakable" are words suggestive of disregard or lack of consideration, carrying with them a more or less direct sense of power or enforcement, then "asunder" is more manifestly suggestive of this in that something is patently said to have been damaged. Yet we understand that this is not a physical force, but a force inflicted by language, the grass being "written" asunder. So it is the way the grass is considered that is damaged, rather than the grass itself.

This damaged way of considering is driven into a preexisting terrain characterized by an unmistakable track, and, one might suppose, damages the way of considering that terrain; this is what is driven.

The first three lines are not just nameless, they are also lacking in pronouns. Only actions are described, as if they occur on their own, at the same time as the element of force attaching to the words "driven" and "asunder" associates them with a will, a certain origin, something not arbitrary. Actions without agents often relate to weather. "It's raining," we say, "it's blowing" or "it's snowing," but what exactly is doing the "raining," the "blowing," the "snowing"? The rain is, the wind is, the snow is; the actions are their own agents, conflated with the subject, and to denote that we use the pronoun "it." "It" points toward a force that exists outside of us and over which we have no control. When actions in the human domain are described without pronouns, as in this case, those actions share that same meaning, it is as if they stem from some force we cannot control, the impersonal and nameless itself: "driven," "written."

> grass, written asunder. The stones, white, > with the shadows of grassblades:
> Do not read any more – look!
> Do not look any more – go!

The next entity, the white stones with the shadows of grassblades, belong either to what has been driven or to the terrain as it was before; presumably the former, since a connection exists between the two, grass and grassblades are much the same thing, and the writing and the shadows are also connected, because what would constitute a shadow of grassblades if not the word "grassblades"?

The first six lines establish an ambivalent space in that they contain elements that simultaneously establish the space and undermine that of which it consists, which is language.

Into what kind of terrain may "grass, written asunder" be driven? No truly tangible one, the way terrain is in the real world with its concrete objects and physical materiality, in such terrain the asunder-written grass would likewise be an object, characters on a page. But it can be driven into the consideration of that terrain, into that which goes before the gaze of the eye that sees it and colors its perception of it. The terrain as it is considered, into this the asunder-written grass may be driven, and into its recollection. In the poem the terrain exists as a terrain prior to the writing asunder of the grass, and as a terrain after the writing asunder of the grass. At the same time the poem is itself writing, thereby itself carrying that which inflicts the damage. Yet only the grass is written asunder. And only in this terrain, which the poem opens before us, does the written-asunder grass, the damaged way of considering, obtain. It is not driven into all terrrains, but into this one, characterized by the unmistakable track. So what kind of a terrain is it? Where is the poem?

The opening sets out a terrain and a situation, and leads into a plea. Do not read any more, it says. Why? Because what we read, writing, writes the world asunder? Look instead, we are told. But then the plea is expanded: we are not to look either. Why? Perhaps because looking and reading are so closely connected. In characters on the page and in the gaze of our eye the world may emerge to us. To the eye the world exists merely in the fleeting now of the moment. What the eye sees is unique and can never return. Language ties the moment down and turns it into something else. Language is not, and can never be, the same as what it represents, but will always comprise its own shadow world pointing toward the real one, so what we see when we read is language, not the world itself. The question is whether language colors our vision and thereby our perception of the world. The grass being written asunder does not necessarily mean that the grass is damaged only in the writing, but also when we lift our gaze from the writing to look at the world. Therefore the plea goes on. Do not read, do not look, but go. To read and to look are in a certain sense passive actions by which we perceive the world; to go, however, is to actively perform, to penetrate into the world. We must not contemplate the world, but act within it. We must not read, and we must not look; instead we must go. Go toward something, perhaps; something whose nature is as yet unknown to us.

Go, your hour has no sisters, you are – are at home. A wheel, slow, rolls out of itself, the spokes climb,
climb on a blackish field, the night needs no stars, nowhere
does anyone ask after you.

"Your hour has no sisters." What does that mean? Perhaps that every moment is unique and stands alone, or that only this hour does? This hour, which thereby is the last? It says "your" hour, rather than any hour in general, not time as such, but your time, it belongs to you and has no sisters. It stands alone and is unique. Perhaps it is the hour of death, though this could also be marked out in some other way.

"You are –," it goes on, the dash a slight hesitation or uncertainty, as if something as yet were being kept open. "Are" as in existing? Yes, but something has to follow. If the hour that has no sisters is your last, then what lies in the "are" is death, this is the conclusion: your hour has no sisters, you are dead; this is the eventuality the dash suspends in the air. And yet you are not dead, you are at home. It is as if that assertion is postponed, by means of the dash and by the repetition of "are." You are – you are at home. Is saying you are at home the same as saying you are dead? That death is a coming home to the darkness from which we once arose? Why not just say it outright, you are dead, you are home? Is the poem unable to say "dead"? If so, why? Because no one knows what death "is"? Because it "is" not, whereas the act of naming it, death, turns it into "something"? Or are you simply at home? Where, in that case, is that? In memory, its own memory, or in language, this language?

The lines that follow add depth to the terrain. In the terrain is a wheel, it "rolls out of itself," which is to say turns slowly of its own accord, its spokes climb up a blackish hill. The night needs no stars, it says; does that mean the stars are there but superfluous, since the night in question is deeper and of another nature than any through which light might penetrate, or does it mean that there are no stars at all in this night, but simply darkness?

After the wheel and the night, it says: nowhere does anyone ask after you. You are either forgotten or someone who cannot be asked after. Because you are dead? Because they who do not ask want to forget you? Or because they are dead?

Nowhere does anyone ask after you.

Who are you then, when you are absent in the minds of others? In your own eyes you are alone, in the eyes of others you are no one. But why "nowhere," why not just "nobody"? "Nowhere does anyone ask after you" – in this no person is mentioned, no name, simply the absence of any place in which someone asks after you. And what is required when someone asks after someone else? A name; there is no other way of asking after someone other than by a name. That name is not asked after. The object of the asking after is unnamed.

Until now the poem has been without human presence, apart from the "you" who "goes" – we have been given a track, grass written asunder, white stones with shadows of grassblades, a turning wheel, a blackish field, a night that needs no stars, places in which no one asks after you – yet people are there nonetheless, the agents behind the act of driving, the writing asunder, the not asking after you. Such is the home of the "you."

In such an unwordy poem, in which almost nothing of the world is named, each word and each named element is lent extraordinary weight. A wheel mentioned in Ulysses means practically nothing. A wheel mentioned in this poem insists on meaning. But how is it to be understood? The wheel is one of the oldest symbols known to us. It is the sun, it is repetition, it is the serpent that bites its tail, it is time, cyclical and repeating of ages, it is eternity. Here the wheel is mentioned immediately following the hour, yet the two are unconnected, they are next to each other, the wheel turning on its own, of itself, climbing on the blackish field. What makes this image of the wheel remarkable is that the wheel is in motion, in a particular terrain, seen in the now and in a particular space, seen here. As a symbol or an allegory, the wheel represents something else, and it is this other to which the wheel refers that then becomes primary, that which the wheel "is." The more tangible and specific the wheel, the weaker its symbolic force, since being made concrete individualizes it, until eventually the realism becomes consummate and the wheel becomes merely this wheel, the way it is here and now, without any other meaning than its own. The wheel in this poem exists between the all of symbolism and the one of realism. It is not a purely symbolic wheel because it turns on its own in the field at night, nor is it a realistic wheel because no real wheel can ever turn on its own in the field at night.

How are we to understand it?

The wheel is apparently something other than a real wheel, it carries more meaning than its own self, and perhaps the concretization of it, which gathers the meaning closer around this particular wheel in this particular poem, in a way individualizes its symbolic meaning, making it an idiosyncratic symbol, something valid only here, in this poem, whose meaning in that case arises in relation to, and is regulated by, the context in which it appears, the other words and images in the poem.

But the space opened by the ambivalence between realistic and symbolic has been opened before, often in works of literature from ages of crisis caught between two different worldviews or two different aesthetic paradigms, frequently two sides of the same coin. An immediate example here would be the Book of Ezekiel in the Old Testament, its depiction of the revelation of the divine.

Ezekiel first sees a burning cloud in the sky above; in it he sees four creatures, each with human form, each with wings, each with feet hooved like a calf's, and each with four faces: a man, a lion, an ox, and an eagle. Fire blazes among them, and lightning flashes from the flames. I beheld the living creatures, he writes, and behold, by each was a wheel upon the ground.

Until this point the creatures have been in the sky above him, but now they are next to wheels on the ground. The wheels are tall and terrifying and rimmed with eyes. They looked like they were made of golden beryl, he writes, and whenever they moved, no matter in which direction, they moved without turning. Above these mysterious wheels is a canopy, above the canopy something reminiscent of a throne that seems to be made of sapphire, and on it a figure resembling a human being, immersed in fire and with a radiant light surrounding him. The figure is God. But what are the wheels? Clearly, they are allegorical, rimmed with eyes, yet also tangible, moving this way and that on the ground as though of their own accord.

In the oldest Scriptures of the Old Testament, God's appearance to man is always in the guise of some external phenomenon. God appears as a burning bush, a whirlwind, a pillar of fire, and as a man who comes wandering across the plain outside Abraham's tent. Ezekiel's revelation too is described in terms of an external phenomenon, something in the sky above him, but what he sees is not merely a medium by which the divine reveals itself, as in the instance of the burning bush, but the divine itself; moreover, other revelations follow, clearly visions: lying on the ground with eyes closed he is transported to the temple of Jerusalem, where he sees the same four figures and the same four wheels. This is what makes Ezekiel's revelations so odd and so ambivalent: what he sees is not simply inside or outside his own being, it is at the same time the divine itself. Ezekiel found himself caught between two different modes of perception of the religious, where in the former a chasm existed between the human and the divine, while in what was to come there was a connection between them, by way of man's inner experience, which is to say the mystical. Midway between them are the wheels with all their eyes, moving this way and that on the ground beneath the throne of God.

Is there anything in Paul Celan's poem to justify employing Ezekiel's ancient vision in its reading? What, in a poem, decides whether the reader's association is relevant or tenuous?

The key word in the verse is "no." No sisters, no stars, no place. "No" denotes an absence. In that absence, that which is not, exists that which is. You, a wheel, spokes, field, the night, are characterized by this absence, and it is against the background of this absence that they are presented to us. The night is characterized by the absence of stars. The wheel turns on its own, this is emphasized, and seems not to belong together with anything else. The sky beneath which it slowly turns is empty. Read positively, as it stands, there is no connection between the wheel in the poem and the wheels in Ezekiel's vision. But read negatively, in terms of what it lacks, the wheel is a symbol without context, where the lack of context together with the emptiness of the sky expresses something extremely important, linking up with the "no" of the hour, the "no" of the night, and the "no" of the nowhere: something is no longer. And in that: something is no longer possible.

The wheel that rolls slowly, out of itself, and which is tied up with the darkness of the night and the emptiness of the sky, has to come from somewhere too, and that place, one might imagine, would be a place of cohesion, where things hung together and meaning was apparent. In the here of the poem, wherever it might be, the you is alone, the wheel on its own, the sky empty, and if all cohesion is absent, the reason is not because it has been written asunder like the grass – that terrain was centered upon what was written and the eye that saw, for the grass that is written asunder has been left behind; the you did not read in order to come here, did not look in order to come here, but went. This is not the terrain with the unmistakable track, this is home.

What is home? Home is the place you belong, the place you know, often the place you come from. This home is something to which the you comes. The you thereby returns; time has passed. There is a before, and there is a now. This home is empty, and there is no one there who knows the you. Nowhere does anyone ask after you. Where are they who might have asked after you, and who were they? The way they are mentioned, impersonally, without even a "they," connects them with whoever drove, whoever wrote the grass asunder, in the sense that they are quite as remote.

"Nowhere does anyone ask after you." In the original German this is "nirgends fragt es nach dir," in the Norwegian translation "ingen steder spørres det etter deg." What is the "es" in the German? The "det" in the Norwegian? The vague, impersonal agent: it's raining, it's snowing. The human is as remote as can be without having vanished completely. Even the act of asking after you is unperformed, visible only in its negation. No one asks after you, and as such they who do not ask are presented to us. Yet they were here once, this is implied; once they asked after you. Now all there is here is a wheel, a field, a night sky devoid of stars. The terrain being empty, the emphasis of absence, means that the one entity to be named is accorded special weight indeed. The wheel that rolls "out of itself," of its own volition.

A wheel appears in Dante's Divina Commedia too; Dante is in the Earthly Paradise and witnesses a procession, and this is also allegory. He sees twenty-four elders, representing the books of the Old Testament; he sees four animals, representing the Evangelists; he sees a griffin, representing Christ; he sees a chariot, representing the universal church; he sees two wheels, representing the two Testaments, or the active and the contemplative life, or justice and devoutness. But the allegory is no abstract vision, it is a tangible occurrence, the procession comes toward him as a physical reality, so physical even that the wheels leave ruts in the ground. The image is a poetic monstrosity in that when the allegory materializes and is accorded particular time in particular space, the griffin is not primarily Christ, but a griffin, the wheels not primarily the two Testaments, but wheels. What happens in Dante is that the timeless construct of the medieval world, the untouchable and schematic system to which all things and powers are subordinate, present for instance in the Divina Commedia in the form of all manner of devilish cycles and heavenly spheres centered upon the number three, is implanted into time and space, where the symbolic level is pervaded by the concrete in an impossible equivalation.

The terrain at the beginning of Celan's poem is, like the terrain of Dante's epic poem, bound up with death or nonexistence, though only implicitly so, by way of suggestion, in the wording "your hour has no sisters," and in the caesura between "you are –" and "you are at home." But if we take this in the sense that this starless, blackened terrain is the terrain of death, through which the "you" of the poem proceeds, the wheel is something that reveals itself. In the poetry of the death realm this is a trope: he who wanders through the kingdom of death sees something, and what he sees is shown to him so that he may tell of it when he returns to the land of the living. What the wanderer sees is meaningful. In the first fifteen lines of Celan's poem perhaps the most obvious trait is the archaic, the fact that everything that is named is in some way timeless – terrain, track, grass, stones, grassblade shadows, wheel, field, stars. No name can assign time to the space or assign to it any particular culture. We are in what is always the same. And perhaps this is why the wheel turning on its own through the empty night comes across so forbiddingly, or so forebodingly. A wheel turning by itself is not something that should be unfamiliar to us, given that we are surrounded by wheels turning by themselves, from the cogs of clockwork and machines to the wheels of cars and trains. The forbidding aspect here comes from it being a wheel on its own and that its movement is the only movement, indeed the only thing at all to exist in this terrain, and that in every respect it appears so archaic. The wheel turns of itself. This gives rise to associations of God's wheel, seen by Ezekiel, which like this wheel also existed tangibly in a tangible terrain. It gives rise to associations of the culture infusing the wheel with meaning; the wheel of life, rolling on unalterably, and the wheel that gives order to chaos and gives form to the formless. But in these cases the wheel is everything; here in the poem it is an entity surrounded by everything. And it gives rise too to associations of the mechanically driven wheel, which in such case is not only an image of time, but of our time. The wheel is archaic and religious but not to us, since to us the archaic aspect of the wheel has dissolved into the modern age in which the wheel now exists, and the two levels are made to converge here, the single wheel in the timeless terrain is the archaic wheel, while its forward motion, which is not connected to the divine, the sky above it being empty, renders the archaic strange to us, and the ambivalence renders it forbidding. And forbidding it is, certainly. No one is there to steer it, no one in control; it rolls slowly "out of itself." It is beyond the human. The grass, written asunder, and the agent of not asking after the you, are beyond the name, faceless, invisible higher powers, almost though not quite, for they still belong to the human sphere. The wheel does not.

Does it leave a rut in the terrain, like Dante's wheels?

The poem says nothing about this. But the word "track" appears only a few lines above. "The unmistakable track," it says. A track is at once something in its own right and a sign of something else. A track is language. Usually, tracks are temporary, while that of which they are a sign is more permanent. Animal tracks in the snow or sand are blown away and disappear. This track is different, it is unmistakable, the way for instance a railway track is unmistakable. The poem doesn't say railway track, and it says nothing of the wheel turning the way the wheels of a train turn. There is no mention of machinery, nothing to do with mechanics. All we have are the words "unmistakable" and "out of itself." And the fact of the grass being written asunder, which is to say that something is damaged. The line of progression goes from the damaged to what is at home, where a single wheel slowly turns, the night prevails and no one asks after whoever has come. This is the terrain of the poem, this is the home of the you, accorded more depth in the verse that follows:

Nowhere
does anyone ask after you –

The place where they lay, it has a name – it has none. They did not lie there. Something lay between them. They did not see through it.

Did not see, no,
spoke of words. None awoke,
sleep
came over them.

This is the first time someone other than "you" appears directly in the poem. They are without name, referred to simply by the pronoun; they are "they."

Who are "they"?

And what is meant by the fact that they "lay"? Were they dead, were they buried, or were they asleep? In which case, where? The place has a name, but the name is unstated, and then the very fact of it having a name is withdrawn – it has none. "They" too are unnamed. Their namelessness, their being referred to merely as "they" or "them" is disquieting, for while the "it," the agent of driving and writing asunder and not asking, is so remote as to defy association, the pronoun here draws "them," whoever they may be, closer, and their namelessness, which is the facelessness of language, becomes menacing in a different way altogether, much like the eyes of a blind person, one might imagine, the absence of the human in the human gaze. Disquieting also because they are surrounded by negation – none, not, no, none – it is almost as if they do not exist at all, as if they are on the very brink of erasure, at the same time as the neutral aspect, the remoteness of the nonpersonal, lends to their presence an aura of representation, something solemn and ritual; as if they were kings or gods. But "they" are not gods, they do not see and barely exist; we are told that "none awoke," so they were asleep even before "sleep came over them." The sleep of sleeps is death. But the poem does not say death, nor does it say sleep of sleeps, but: none awoke, sleep came over them. Why?

They are tightly bound to each other, they slept in life, they did not see and did not awake from it, for the next sleep came over them. Their not seeing stands in direct opposition to their speaking of words: they did not see the true world but the world that points toward the true world, that of words. This can be understood in existential terms, as if they were living a life that was inauthentic, unseeing of that which is genuine, but in the space between "none awoke" and "sleep came over them" lies the possibility of an unuttered "before it was too late." This, along with the failure to see, "they did not see through it," the repetition of "not see," the reinforcement of "spoke of words"; all this implies neglect, and the consequence of that neglect was that the other sleep came over them. They died, though the poem cannot state as much, since death would then become "something" and the dead "someone." Death is nothing and the dead are no one, and it is the absolute nature of this loss, the complete irreversibility of it, that the language has to deal with; this is what it has taken upon itself, at the same time as it must remain true to the unique and individual, which is to say separate it from the undifferentiated void without at the same time maintaining that identity and making it something that "is." The poem stands at the very borderline between language and the unspeakable, but this is not what it points toward, this is no language game; the poem is out there in the night of nights in order to evoke the unevokable, that which is so brittle and fleeting, so ghostly and indefinite that the slightest glimpse of an eye or a fleeting thought would cause it to recede and vanish; indeed, in a way it is that very movement it seeks to express.

The question posed is this: how to name that which is nothing without making it something? This is the very negation of religion's great puzzle: how to name what is infinite without making it finite? Even the "all" is finite. How do we name what is beyond humanity without drawing it into the human domain, given that language in itself is human? How do we refer to God?

In orthodox Judaism, God's name is unuttered, or uttered only by the high priest in the temple of Jerusalem, which no longer exists. And if the name is written down it cannot then be erased or defaced. The name appears in the Torah, the collection of holy Scriptures that for non-Jews is the Old Testament, in the form of four letters, YHWH, known as the Tetragrammaton, "the four letters." Instead of reading this name of God in prayer, the faithful read it as "Adonai," meaning "my Lord," while mention of God's name in conversation generally requires the form "HaShem," literally "the Name." Adonai and HaShem are thus names of the name. "The name has a name!" as the Jewish philosopher Emmanuel Levinas exclaims in a reflection on God's name. The name is revealed and is hidden. It is as though the name itself were God. A normal name is the name of something or someone, here the name is itself something besides. "God" in Hebrew is Elohim; YHWH is the name of the one God, God's own name. Its correct pronunciation is no longer known with any certainty; the oldest Hebrew alphabet contained no vowels, these having been added to the Scriptures at some later date, though not in the case of YHWH. Insofar as the name must not be pronouced, this would not seem to matter. But what does this name that cannot be pronounced actually say?

In the Bible, when Moses asks God his name, God replies "I am that I am" or "I am who I am," more simply "I am." The Canadian critic Northrop Frye writes that some scholars believe a more correct translation to be something along the lines of "I will be what I will be." What is important though is the fact that the name is derived from a Hebrew word meaning "to be," a verb. The name of that which cannot be named is given by God himself to Moses in the form of flames rising from a burning thornbush on Mount Horeb. The Bible says, "There the angel of the Lord appeared to him in a flame of fire out of a bush; he looked, and the bush was blazing, yet it was not consumed." Moses approaches and suddenly he sees not the angel of the Lord, but the Lord himself, calling out to him, "Moses, Moses! Come no closer," the Lord says. "Remove the sandals from your feet, for the place on which you are standing is holy ground. I am the God of your father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." Moses hides his face, afraid to look at God. And thus, barefoot and with eyes lowered, Moses is given his task, to lead the Israelites out of Egypt. Moses replies, "Who am I that I should go to Pharaoh, and bring the Israelites out of Egypt?" And God says, "I will be with you," and he tells Moses he will receive a sign that God is with him; and when he has brought the people from Egypt they are to worship God on that same mountain. But not belonging to the people he must lead, Moses needs a sign now, rather than later, for how else might he persuade them to go with him? For this reason he says to God, "If I come to the Israelites and say to them, 'The God of your ancestors has sent me to you,' and they ask me, 'What is his name?' what shall I say to them?" To which God replies, "I am who I am. Thus you shall say to the Israelites, 'I AM has sent me to you.'"

The name God gives Moses is not a name, because it defines nothing, locates nothing, yet it is a name nonetheless, but of that which defies definition, location, determination. The inexhaustibility of this name, which is not a name, contrasts strongly with the context in which it is revealed. As in so many other instances in the Old Testament there is something comical about the occurrence, the reason for this being that the highest, the divine, the extra-human comes so close to the human as to become almost snared up in it. God or the divine revealing itself in the form of some heavenly phenomenon might be sublime, but not in a burning bush, there being something almost trivial about such a thing, at which one might stand and stare in perplexity but never tremble in fear. God asking Moses to take off his sandals diminishes the revelation yet further: sandals or no sandals is a particularly human deliberation, one would think. And when Moses speaks to God, a misunderstanding arises, Moses asking for a sign to bolster his credibility in the eyes of the Israelites, God however promising him a sign once it is all over, meaning

Moses has to be more exact and explain: but if I come to the Israelites and say to them that the God of their ancestors has sent me, and they ask me what his name is, what am I supposed to say? Moses's approach is reminiscent of a trick, asking for God's name by asking for the answer to a hyopothetical question the Israelites might ask him. The answer, the name, points away from the trivial toward the nature of the divine. The two levels intermingle throughout the Old Testament, as when God sews clothes of animal hide for Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden, or when God gets himself into an argument with Sara, wife of Abraham. The same occurs in other ancient texts, for instance in Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, where gods and the divine move in and out of the human domain, not in any metaphorical sense but tangibly so, with physical bodies in the physical world.

Gershom Scholem writes of the three phases of religion, the first occurring when the world itself is divine, populated by gods humankind may encounter anywhere, who can be won over to one's cause without trepidation: the human and the divine are not separated in any fundamental way. Everything is connected: man, nature, the gods. So too in Homer, where the names of the gods are likewise anything but unmentionable, flourishing in daily conversation. The second phase occurs with the emergence of the great religions, which open a vast and absolute abyss between the divine and the human, Scholem writes, bridgeable only by the voice: God's voice, instructional and legislative, and man's voice in prayer.

Some of the texts of the Old Testament carry with them fragments of earlier periods, such as the fairly-tale nature of the incident when Jacob encounters a stranger in the twilight and wrestles him all through the night, until the stranger beseeches Jacob to release him because dawn is approaching. Jacob refuses, only if the stranger blesses him will he let him go. The stranger does so and tells Jacob that from that moment on his name shall be Israel, for he has striven with God and prevailed. Then, although the stranger has made himself known as God, Jacob asks his name. God replies, "Why is it that you ask my name?" blesses him, and is gone. That God may physically be encountered and even wrestled with – the physical nature of the meeting being made plain in the detail of Jacob's hip being put out of joint during the struggle – brings to mind the world of which Scholem writes, shared by humans and gods alike, and God's wish to end the struggle before the dawn draws the encounter into the world of the folktale and the ancient reality of myth, in which the troll turns to stone in daylight. Northrop Frye writes that the world is characterized by what he calls a metaphorical language in which words are substantial in their own right, invoking their objects, the entities or phenomena they denote, much like hieroglyphics, posessing powers used in spells and evocations, as for instance is shown by the account of the creation when God's word becomes real: Let there be light, and there was light. Names may create, and names may rule. In such a world to know the name of God would be to possess the power of the divine, one might imagine, it hardly being accidental that Jacob measures himself against God, eventually even prevailing, before asking for his name. "Tell me your name!" he demands with some presumption. "Why is it that you ask my name?" asks God, and vanishes into the shadows of the night.

According to Scholem, mysticism arises in the third phase of religion, once religion has assumed its classic expression in communities of faith, and when the new religious impulses that occur, rather than stepping outside the prevailing context to establish something new, instead remain to shape themselves within the old religion, where the abyss between the divine and the human is considered a mystery that inner experience of the divine may resolve.

Mysticism is free of the practical sides of religion, the morality, the obligations, the tasks, directed entirely inward toward the experience of the divine and its nature. The original revelations, the burning bush seen by Moses, for instance, or the winged creatures with the heads of animals that appeared to Ezekiel, are to the mystic somewhat obscure and poorly developed, Scholem suggests.

His definition of mysticism is approached firstly by way of a quote from Rufus Jones as "the type of religion which puts the emphasis on immediate awareness of relation to God, on direct and intimate consciousness of the Divine Presence," subsequently by reference to Thomas Aquinas, who defined it as "cognitio Dei experimentalis," the experiential knowledge of God. The great canonical revelations are placed side by side with the individual's own experience. As Scholem states:

> With no thought of denying Revelation as a fact of history, the mystic still conceives the source of religious knowledge and experience which bursts forth from his own heart as being of equal importance for the conception of religious truth

The heart is the very symbol of the innermost human self, our deepest emotional being, in direct contrast to the rational intellect and the outer world. And it is here, in the perception of and meditation upon the nature of the divine, present in our souls, in the ecstasy of the heart, that language becomes a problem in religion. Religious ecstasy contains all manner of vast and formidable emotions; they are wordless and cannot be represented, cannot be described, cannot be repeated, at one with themselves, and only in the very particular experience is the presence of God real. And what reveals itself, what is perceived, the divine, is outside the human sphere, drawn into it only by the very nature of language. A strong tradition in mysticism is therefore the negative; only by stating what the divine is not may it be approached without reduction. Can it be said that God is living? Scholem ponders, citing Maimonides. Would that not imply a limitation of the infinite nature of his being? The sentence "God is living" can only mean "He is not dead," which is to say that he is the opposite of the negative, the negation of negations. But what is he then? Can we say that God is anything at all? It is to this progression that the Kabbalist notion of God resting in the depths of his nothingness belongs. God is nothing. This is not to say that Celan's poem explores any sort of mystical experience, merely that the language employed in it has certain things in common with the language of mysticism, the issue being the same: how to approach that which is not, without turning it into something that is. But if the abyss of religion is that separating the divine from the human, bridgeable only by that which is without language – the heart, ecstasy, delight – and the challenge in the texts of mysticism for that reason lies in giving words to the wordless presence, then the challenge of Celan's poem lies rather in approaching wordless absence. The poem's unutterable word is not God, but death, since death is nothing, whereas the name of nothing is something. This awareness of the impossibility of representation is fundamental to the poem; it is as if the relationship between the world and its linguistic representation has broken down, and the poem exists, ruin-like, within that destruction at the same time as being about it. Its basic distrust of language reveals itself firstly in the image of the grass written asunder in the opening lines, then in the opposition between seeing and speaking about: they saw not, and spoke of words. The words exist between them and reality, and they do not see through them, but see them, and speak of them. This again has to do with being asleep.

The place where they lay, it has
a name – it has none. They did not lie there. Something
lay between them. They did not see through it.

Did not see, no,
spoke of words. None awoke,
sleep
came over them.

Yet the poem itself consists of words, the poem "speaks." This can hardly be understood in any other way than that the image of the grass written asunder and of the sleeping who speak of words are not an expression of misology, it is not the language itself which is distrusted, but the conceptions that attach to it, the fact of language not only evoking what it names, but also the idea of what belongs to "the word," which is to say the community of language, and not the "thing" or the "phenomenon." This becomes especially clear when language names that which is not, the past, which language makes present, and death, which language makes into "something." The poem turns this latter point to its own advantage, since by naming nothing, the nothing emerges as something, to exist in the text, then to be withdrawn, not existing after all, here and not here at one and the same time. The first instance of this strategy being used is in connection with the name, that which turns the open, indefinite, diverse, and heterogeneous into one, the emblem of place, the place name, which seems almost to accommodate both the terrain itself and the history of the terrain, in that way becoming an existence in the language, which is to say the culture, and not in the world. "The place where they lay, it has/ a name – it has/ none." The place does and does not have a name. The fact of it having or not having a name is no more significant than the name itself, but the name cannot be mentioned. Mention the name, and the place and those who lay there become something they are not. Then the poem too would speak of words, and sleep.

Up until now the poem has been about a "you" in a world in which other people at first are discernible only as powers unrepresented by pronouns, then, in the movement of the "you" toward "home," expressed as "they" and "them." These "they" are unpositioned within the space; to begin with they lay "there," only then to be called back, "they did not lie there." They are, however, positioned in time, for while the poem's "you" is described as being in the present, in the terrain of the now, "they" are assigned to the past. They lay, they did not wake, they slept. This makes it possible to read their presence as a memory, something on which the "you" thinks back. "They" exist in a time remote from the "you," but the place where they lay/did not lie exists in the same time, since it "has" a name.

The place where they lay, it has
a name – it has none. They did not lie there.

Then comes the poem's first turning point. Until now the poem has proceeded steadily, from the terrain with its track, via the call not to read, not to look, but to go, into a deathlike landscape in which the thought of the "they" who once were arises. In the next verse an "I" speaks for the first time, and like the "you" it speaks in the present, about the "they" of the past.

> It is I, I,
> I lay between you, I was > open, was > audible, ticked at you, your breathing > obeyed, it is
> I still, but then > you are asleep.

It is I still –

The original German has "Ich bins," a contraction of Ich bin es, a colloquial expression often used when answering the phone, Ich bins, "It is I." After the mysterious introductory stanzas from which little meaning may be extracted, the everydayness of the introduction of this "I" seeems striking, there is almost something childlike about it, the way it insists, the "I" being named three times in the course of four words. Ich bins, ich, ich, at the same time as the time shifts, ich bins, ich lag, ich war – I am, I lay, I was – then shifts back again, ich bin, I am – noch immer: still. The movement is thereby from I am to I was and back to I am again. Present, past, present.

Péter Szondi, who has provided the classic and probably most detailed analysis of this poem, now a standard reading, believes that it is time speaking here, time personified. This may be so, but there is another possibility, that the writer is the "I" and that the situation described, when I lay between "them" and was open, is a memory. Both the sudden childlike presence in the text and the wording "I lay between you" make me think of a child lying between its parents. The significance of time in this verse is plain, but so too is "I," whose presence is conspicuously emphasized in the forceful repetition I, I, I. Regardless of how this "I" is understood, the "they" the "I" lay between may be the same "they" mentioned in the previous stanza, of whom it is predicated "something lay between them." They were sleeping, and the movement of the "I" from am to was and back to am again is something from which they are excluded; they too "are" still, but sleeping, which is to say dead. That which "is" becomes "was" through the "I," who turns it into "is" by the evocation of memory – identical with the poet's evocation of reality, the two things, the past and the written, memory and literature, coincide here – but that possibility does not exist for those he was with at that time, they slept then and they sleep now, their "still" being of a different character altogether, unchangeable, uniform, of death and the timelessness of the nothing. Death is not a state or a quality, it is an absence of states and qualities, and as such it has no time, only non-time. Non-time too has no "is" of existence other than in language, which abstracts the world, and in abstraction nothing too may be accorded form. The gaze of the eye may exist only as an "is," in the now, whereas the language may strive toward "was," through memory, where the differences between tangible and intangible are wiped out: in memory the space was the same, the world and its people faded into impalpability, as Joyce defined the ghost.

If we ignore the "I" and the "they" and the question of who they are and what relation exists between them, or rather, who they are to the "I," given that the "I" is not something to them, then the most significant thing occurring in this stanza is the time that flows through the verbs and thereby through the I. You cannot step twice into the same rivers, as Heraclitus says in one of his fragments, the ninety-first, perhaps his best known quote, now a cliché. But there is another fragment of his concerning the same thing, the forty-ninth, in which he puts it rather differently and thereby makes a quite different statement:

> We step and do not step into the same rivers; we are and are not.

Time and identity are drawn together in "are," we are and yet we are not, and what is "are" then? In Celan's poem time opens up the same distance in the I, which does not say I am, I was, I am, but shades and complicates it by subtle means, impossible to reproduce in translation to Norwegian, to do with the interplay between ich and bin and es. In English Ich bins has to be rendered as "It's me" or "It is I," but another meaning becomes apparent if, leaving aside the idiomatic, one shadows the syntax of the German more closely. That gives us "I am it," then "I am it still," and finally "am it still." This latter nuance is important insofar as it deprives the everyday "It's me/It is I" of its notional subject, leaving us with "it's/it is" and thereby drawing attention to that very constituent. What is the "it" that is? "It," apparently, is "I," but then what is the "it" that the "I" is? The question projects back to the opening, no longer quite as quotidian, the "I" containing an "it." The German looks like this.

Ich bins, ich, ich lag zwischen euch, ich war offen, war
hörbar, ich tickte euch zu, euer Atem gehorchte, ich bin es noch immer, ihr schläft ja.

Bin es noch immer –

Translating the first assertion as "It is I" preserves, more so than the literal "I am it," some measure of the colloquialness of the original, the unencumbered everydayness about the wording that keeps the I firmly within the bounds of the social: It's me. But then the final line would strictly speaking have to be "It is still," theming "it," the assertion thereby extending beyond the social. I am it, it is I. This points toward something outside the

"I" that encompasses itself. "I am another," said Rimbaud, but while this is dissolving of the identity it remains within the realm of the social. "I am I" goes beyond the social, beyond the name, into the nameless, "it" being the mark of the impersonal. "It sleeps," "it laughs," "it grieves" – no person would be referred to in such a way: "it" pertains not to the human, but to the nonhuman. And yet, it is an "I" that is "it." Taken positively, the "it" might be that through which existence presents itself, that which is common to us all, bound up with the authentic, in contrast to that aspect of human existence that is joined up with the social world, which is to say all our hierarchies and laws, norms and rules, what Heidegger called das Man, the derivative and inauthentic, the very opposite of the authenticity and independence of pure existence. This pure self of Heidegger's, open toward existence, is in turn related to the self of the mystics, that which comes together with the divine in the forgetting of the self, the I-less I. It seems beyond doubt that the I of the poem has to do with this, though not in any positive sense; the I is what is left of the person when the name is gone, the I is what dies when the person dies and the name lives on. The I is not erased in ecstasy, filled with the meaning of life, but in its opposite, being erased in the shadow of death, filled with its nonmeaning.

It is I.
It is.
It.

But "it" is not what the poem invokes. What the poem invokes is "I." Three times in succession it rings out, I, I, I, almost as if it were trying to wrench free of its "it." The fact that it is, whereas they were, is another way of saying I am alive and they are dead. The constituents are the simplest possible: you, they, I, it, is, was. Being and not being. Being is a matter of existence, we are dealing with being in itself. This is Hamlet's question, to be or not to be, and it concerns the notion of being without identity. In such being, one is not someone but something. This is where the line goes between being someone and being nothing. But being is also a matter of identity. One is, in such an instance, someone, and the line goes between being someone and being no one. Something/someone, nothing/no one. The first, something/nothing, is that which stands outside the name and the social realm, the second, someone/no one, exists within the name and the social. One can be something in relation to nothing. But one cannot be someone in relation to no one: one can be someone only in relation to others. A you, a they, which together make a we. But here there is no we, only an I/you and a they. The they is absent and no one asks after the you/the I. This is what is at stake here; who is the you, since no one asks after them, since no one knows them or knows about them? In such an instance the you is not someone, but no one/something.

Who is the I? Is the I a part of "them," does it belong among them, is that what is meant by "home"? Is that the connection that has been lost? The important thing in the verse is what separates I from them, which is time: once, I and you existed together in a present, now only I remain there, while you are in a past. That time, that division, that abyss, is expounded upon in the next verse:

Years.
Years, years, a finger feels down and up, feels around:
seams, palpable, here
it is split wide open, here it grew together again – who covered it up?

*

Covered it up – who?

The insistence, the repetition of the word three times, joins "I" and "years" together. The space between is and was, present and past, has been opened, within or by the I. Into it the I now enters. Years, years, years; time here is a space, something within the same, the movement is down, up, around. The finger that feels around is connected to that which ticks in the previous stanza, Aris Fioretos suggests in his reading of the poem; German "ticken" can mean both "tick" and "touch with the fingertip." The ticking finger that joins the notion of the I as the person writing with that of the I as the voice of time. A finger feels and finds. What does it find? Seams. What are seams? Seams are made of stitches. Stitches join together wounds. The wound is grown together again and is thereby absent and yet present, unmentioned, yet apparent in the mention of that which covers. The wound does not emerge in its authentic form, hardly anything does in this poem, and yet this is somehow different, because here "someone" has covered, the covering is active and has a particular cause, and the question concerns who covered up the wounds, rather than what covered them.

To cover something up involves something coming between one thing and another, an intervention, and so far in the poem this has been expressed in terms of the grass written asunder and the speaking of words, and time separating the I from them. The attention has been on the what, the act of covering, but here it is directed not toward the what, but toward a who.

Who covered it up? And why is "who" so important that their identity has to be asked for in a question?

Thus, cautiously and without naming anything that might propel it back into the darkness from which it is lifted ghostlike, the poem approaches its center or zero point.

Came, came.
Came a word, came,
came through the night,
wanted to shine, wanted to shine.

The repetition of the word is of the same intensity as that of "I" and "years": three times a "came." And it is intensified further still, mentioned twice more. Came, came, came, came, came. The effect is much like that of an incantation, a ritual recitation. The word that came represents the opposite of the covering up, it came "through" the night, that which covers up or makes things the same, thereby canceling it out. The word is the opposite of the nothing, the word came forth as something against the darkness of the nothing, and for this reason it is recited. It is, therefore, a different kind of word those of which "they" spoke, for those words prevented them from seeing, and were the very hindrance. In that instance there was a contrast between seeing and the words, a negative relation: they who spoke, spoke of words, and they did not see. Here it is the similarity between seeing and the word, a positive relation: the word wanted to shine in the night. And light makes visible. But the word did not shine, it wanted to shine, and in this lies the idea of the light being an insubstantiated possibility. The word could shine, but it could not shine here, the poem appears to say.

Why not? What is it that prevented the word that could shine from shining?

It is the night.

What kind of night is it? At the beginning of the poem it is described as a night that needed no stars. This is a different night to that which ends at dawn: it is tempting to think of it as an image of death: the night needs no stars, needs no light, for there is nothing there to illuminate, there is nothing. This night is of a different quality, there is something in it the words lack strength to illuminate. Night is darkness, darkness is undifferentiated, the opposite of words, which by their nature are differentiating, establishing of distinctions. Whereas the first night did not need stars or light, this one does. Why? The poem has predicated a moving forward, and in that moving forward it has approached something, and in that approach this something, at first distant and remote, has gradually become clearer in shape, and in this, the gradual uncovering of something whose nature is still unknown to us, the intensity of the poem has increased and is now so acute that the words are repeated with the forceful effect of the incantation. Came, came, came, came, came. This incantation comes immediately after the ascertainment that the wound, unmentioned and unshown, present merely by virtue of the "it" that "grew together," is covered up, and immediately after the question as to who covered it up. The words repeated are repeated in a time other than that of their occurrence: came a word, it says, in the poem's present, in the time of the you and the I, whereas the will to shine, and the lack of ability to do so, is in its past: wanted to shine.

Is it so because the night is the very force that makes present past, that it is this, the darkness of what has been lost, that is meant, in that case also comprising the light of the words, and turning their want into a wanted, by virtue of their being words, immobilizing what is and transforming it, inevitably, into something that was? Or is the night connected with the covering up of the wound and the writing asunder of the grass, the language then being a part of the night, a part of what covers up – something that lies in the description of those who "spoke of words" and did not "see"? Would that be why the words cannot shine, nor, thereby, make it possible to see, because they offer only darkness themselves? The desire that lies in "wanted to shine, wanted to shine" suggests that it is not the language in itself that darkens, but a particular kind of language, spoken by "them," and that some other language exists, but even that language cannot penetrate this night. This night is associated with events, they who did not wake before sleep came over them, and they who caused a wound, and they concern the I who once lay between them, who opens up the space between the absence of the wound in the present and the presence of the wound in the past.

"Came a word, came / through the night," and yet in vain, the word wanted to shine but could not. The will is without subject, the poem says only "wanted to shine, wanted to shine," according weight to the will, which is strong, yet futile.

Wanted to shine, wanted to shine.

Why can the words not shine here? What is it that makes the night so undifferentiated that no word can make a difference in its darkness?

Ash.
Ash, ash.
Night.
Night-and-night. – Go to the eye, the moist one.

Ash, it says three times, night three times, though without a verb, nothing "came," there is no motion of any kind, no "through."

Ash, ash, ash.

Ash is the form of that which has been incinerated without it bearing any similarity to its former state, ash is nothing, yet it is what is left of an object when that object has gone, at the same time as it is something in itself, a blackish-gray dust, the same in any instance of incineration. In a poem in which nothing came from nothingness, the ash can be read as an actualization of that which is not, the physical form of absence. And it can be read as the material instantiation of the undifferentiated. Ash is nothing, yet it is something, and it is the same for everything.

After the ash, night and night follow night. In this night even the undifferentiatedness of ash becomes undifferentiated.

Ash.
Ash, ash.
Night.
Night-and-night.

Why the "and" in night? Separated by a comma it might be the same thing, night, night, night, an insistence, an incantation, but the "and" inserts a relation, which is to say a distinction, and in so doing introduces a course of events. Night-and-night. Night follows night, but so closely joined, the hyphens connecting the two nights in a single word, "night-and-night," that nothing exists between them, no light, no dawn, no day.

Then the "go" is resurrected, the plea from the beginning of the poem, at that point open, general, a simple "go" instead of "reading" and "looking."

Now "go" is directionally specified: "to the eye." And further: "to the moist one." This is at the end of the poem's fifth section, and since the poem consists of nine sections in all, it comes exactly midway, at the very center.

Came, came, came a word, came, came, wanted to shine, wanted to shine, ash, ash, ash, night, night-and-night, go to the eye, to the moist one. From the word, that which is general, and its light that is not possible, to the ash and the night and to the eye, but not to the eye that sees, it carries on, to the moist one.

Do not read, look, do not look, go, go to the eye that weeps.

"Ash" and "night" enter into the series of words that are given weight by being repeated three times and which establish particular places in the poem where meaning becomes concentrated. I (identity), years (time), came (incantation), ash (absence, destruction), night (undifferentiatedness). These words make up an axis of meaning within the poem. Another axis consists of the pronouns, you-I-they-who. A third is comprised of the imperatives, read, look, go, which to begin with lead into the deathlike and the terrain, empty of both people and stars, down into the past and up again to the here, where for the first time a direction is specified. The weeping eye is the midpoint of the poem around which the entire text revolves, for after the eye, and the long way toward it, the poem radically changes character.

Until now the human presence has been a "you," an "I," and a "they." The significant aspect of the relationship between "I" and "they" has been their separation from each other. By time, sleep, death, darkness. The gaze of the eye and the word have been likewise separated from the world. This latter separation, from the unnameable wound, which is a wound no longer, but covered up by someone, was followed by the coming of a word and its failure to shine. From the ash and the night, nothing may be extracted but ash and night. There is nothing to read, nothing to see. But there is something to feel. This eye does not separate, does not divide, it is not primarily connected with the external and with seeing, but with the internal and with feeling; indeed, it is hard to understand "to the eye, to the moist one" in any other way.

In mysticism the source of innermost truth is the heart, locus of the ecstatic coming together of all things. Celan's eye can be understood conversely as a place whose wordless concentration is not of joy and expanded awareness, but of grief and the implosion of awareness. Both places exist outside the social world, and outside the name.

The heart is full of the all, the eye of the nothing. The heart, filled with what is, is blind and sees nothing; the eye, filled with what is not, sees, and sees nothing.

Here, at the place of grief and the weeping eye, the poem turns away from its now to face a then, not what grew together and was a wound, but that which went before. The time of the "we."

Gales.
Gales, from the beginning of time, whirl of particles, the other,
you know it, though, we read it in the book, was opinion.

Was, was opinion. How did we touch
each other – each other with these hands?

Gales are specified in two different ways here. Firstly as being from the beginning of time, which is to say archaic, immutable, the same then as now. Secondly as a whirl of particles, something known by a "you," because "we" read it in "the book": it was opinion. The next stanza emphasizes the past nature of that opinion. Was, was opinion.

What is a gale? A strong wind, a force of nature, arbitrary, violent, destructive, chaotic, something of the "it" we name when we say "it's blowing outside." But also "the other," the whirl of particles, the explanation in that, the resonance of science in "particle," something broken down into its smallest elements, and thereby also the concept, though not unconditionally; the "whirl" is that which has been whirled together into something beyond concepts, something more and other than the mere whirling together. The word "particle" points toward something invisible to us, but which nonetheless we know to be there. This line of thinking stems from Democritus and the atomic theory of the ancient Greeks, as pursued by Lucretius in his poem De rerum natura, in which poetry meets science; it seeks to explain a phenomenon, to command and delimit, whereas the word "gale" points to a phenomenon. The significance of this distinction becomes clear in what comes next: the whirl of particles was in "the book," it was "opinion." Knowing something is associated with reading, which in turn is associated with opinion. But that opinion no longer exists, as suggested by the emphasis of past time in the repetition. Was, was. Opinion, opinion. The plea not to read any more might be directed toward this time, the time when what was written was opinion. In other words, that opinion is now lost. But the emphasis is not so much on the reading itself as on what "you" and "we" read. There is a community there, and the fact of opinion now being of the past, and perhaps no longer valid, is followed by a question that has to do with the connection between those who comprised the "we," and it is hard indeed not to construe this in such a way that it is the socially cohesive aspect of the opinion that is at stake, the common foundation shared by people belonging to the same culture: "we" read, "we" touched each other.

Who are "we"?

Seemingly, the "we" would refer to something in the past, a community no longer in existence and which now in some sense defies understanding. How did we touch each other, is the question, though it does not stop there, but continues with a specification: – each other with these hands? These hands exist now; what they touched, which comprised the "we," exists in the past, the verb form being "touched" rather than "touch," and this is the abyss the question spans. "You," "you," "they," "we," and "our" are all past, only the "I" is present, so what happens is that something of what has been lost is separated out. The difference between being an I looking toward other I's that existed once, and being an I looking toward the "we" the living and the dead once comprised, is huge. Not only has the community of those particular people been lost to time, but what made that community possible then, the very conditions of its existence, has been lost too. It is within the field of this loss that the poem is written. It is as if what this entails, what "we" represents, cannot be stated until after the plea to go to the eye, to the moist one; only then can the lost "we" be named; and this is the most painful thing of all.

Another of Heraclitus's fragments, the twenty-sixth, concerns the relationship between the living, the sleeping, and the dead:

> Man kindles a light for himself in the nighttime, when he has died but is alive. The sleeper, whose vision has been put out, lights up from the dead; he that is awake lights up from the sleeping.

The states described exclude each other – when sleeping, one cannot be dead, when awake one cannot be asleep – and yet are connected by the very ambivalence of those states, the borderlands between them. Man is in the nighttime, which is to say the darkness, where nothing is visible and nothing may be differentiated. He kindles a light, but the light cannot make visible, his eyes are put out and cannot see, he is himself darkness. Man is dead, but is alive, which is to say that he is sleeping. The sleeper lights up from the dead. He that is awake lights up from the sleeping, he is outside sleep, even further from death, yet the border is by no means absolute; like the text, we pass through the various states, consciousness waxing and waning within us, and when it wanes something else comes into view, unknown to those awake; the shores of the dead.

But this proceeds in one direction only, from the living to the sleeping to the dead; the dead do not look back.

There is another of Heraclitus's fragments likewise concerning death and sleep, the twenty-first:

> All the things we see when awake are death, even as all we see in slumber are sleep.

In both fragments seeing is pivotal, and both relate to sleep and waking, life and death. Both fragments are opaque, and to begin with seem to point in different directions. In the first, he who is awake lights up from the sleeping, but not the dead. In the second, death is all that he who is awake can see, while the sleeper sees only sleep, i.e., that which is his, not that of the other. But they may also be understood as expressing the same thing. When we are awake we see death, in the sense of absence and nothingness; when we sleep we do not, in sleep death is sleep, too. There may also be a point relating to a qualitative distinction in the act of seeing; to be awake is to see clearly, faithfully, we see that death is all around us, a fundamental condition of our lives, while to sleep is to not see clearly, in that we see only that which is ours, sleep, which hushes us up. The authentic life, which recognizes death, and the inauthentic life, lived as if death does not exist.

All these various levels are present in Paul Celan's poem, those that distinguish between gradations of awake, asleep, and dead, and those that distinguish between gradations of authentic and inauthentic. From the poem's beginning:

> The place where they lay, it has
> a name – it has > none. They did not lie there. Something
> lay between them. They > did not see through it.

Did not see, no,
spoke of words. None awoke,
sleep
came over them.

They do not light up, but slip away. At first it is the place where they lay that slips away, it has a name and then does not, and they lay there no longer. This is what they are to those who write, who in their woken state seek to "touch" them. Then we are told what they were in themselves, unseeing. They saw not, because they spoke of words, in a sleep. The agent of the writing is awake, and if it is to "touch" them it cannot speak of words. The name of the place is such a word, something that lies between. It existed, and it exists, but not to them, nor therefore to the poem, which by naming it would have included them within it. The world of the name is the world of opinion, it belongs to the we that was, but which is no longer. Here the world of the name has become still, deactivated, because its foundation, the we, is no longer viable or must be established anew. This stillness of the name exists on two different levels. Nowhere does anyone ask after you, it says, and as such you are something concealed, outside language. The wound is covered up by someone unknown to the I, it is kept under cover. In both instances we are dealing with agentive forces outside the terrain opened up by the poem. The first, the no one asking after you, may also be down to "you" being dead, or because all others in the terrain in which you are present are dead and cannot ask after you, no longer know that you exist. But the covering up is not ambivalent in this way, merely vague. The second level exists in the relationship between those who write and what is written, between "you" and "they," "I" and "we." "They" did not see, they spoke of words. "You" know this, we read it in the book, it was opinion. Was, was, opinion, opinion. And then:

Spoke, spoke.
Was, was.

To speak is to be within language, and the pervading mistrust of what the poem says on all levels is attached to being. Is what it deals with the language of being? Or are the two things separate?

Yes.
Gales, whirl of particles, there was time left, time to try it out with the stone – it was hospitable, it did not cut in. How lucky we were:

Grainy,
grainy and stringy. Stalky, dense;
grapy and radiant; kidneyish,
flattish and lumpy; loose, tangled –: he, it did not cut in, it
spoke,
willingly spoke to dry eyes, before closing them.

Spoke, spoke.
Was, was.

Gales, whirl of particles, these have already been established as being within the opinion-community of the book and the society; this is the time in which "we" was meaningful and was good. This is before it becomes lost, and before the grieving over it, but it is written after, and remodeled not into the now of the I, but the now of the poem. It stands on the very brink of meaning, not because it has no meaning in itself, a stone has no meaning, merely a state of being, but because it has no meaning to anyone but the I.

But try what out with the stone? How is the stone hospitable? What does it mean, that it did not cut in? Stones are among the commonest and least meaningful of entities; a stone is a stone, neutral and moreover most usually unspecific, a stone looks much like any other stone. In itself it is unchanging, or changes only unimaginably slowly, without conveying any trace of its age to anyone but a geologist, thereby in a way existing beyond culture, history, and time, or in a time other than our historical time, but the fact that whenever we see a stone we are confronted by something infinitely older than humanity, which existed here before even the beginnings of life, is something we rarely if ever think about, a stone is simply a trivial phenomenon of nature, no, not even a phenomenon, an object of simple existence, something we skim across the water's surface without thought, for the pleasure of our children, for instance, or in the case of larger ones, something on which we sit down to drink coffee on picnics in the woods.

In ancient religions stones were used as a symbol of the continuous and everlasting; raised in circles at certain places they enclosed what was deemed to be sacred and were often associated with the heavenly bodies. The laws given to Moses were inscribed on tablets of stone, rendering eternal and unalterable the otherwise transient script of God's commandments to humankind. In religious life the stone was in contrast to the tree: whereas the tree symbolized life and rejuvenation, the stone was the symbol of eternal being. Not much remains of that world in our day and age, the tree and the stone are no longer opposites by which we make sense of our lives, but here and there we find remnants of its very tangible mode of thought, not least in the funeral ritual, in which we continue to erect stones over the dead, while the coffin is of wood. Into the stone we inscribe the name of the deceased. While the body decomposes in the earth below, the name stands in stone for all time, belonging no longer to the social world alone, but also to matter.

There are no traces at all of ritual or religion in Celan's poem, on the contrary, the stone is shrouded in the quotidian, it is something we must "try it out with," it is "hospitable." "Try it out with" preserves the stone quality of the stone, an object we move or share, whereas "try it out at," as the German might also be interpreted, makes important the place of the stone and would seem to make it a question of proximity to it. "Hospitable" is a radical anthropomorphization, hospitable being a human quality, not even animals can be hospitable, yet the stone is hospitable in the poem. To be hospitable is to be accommodating toward others. In this case "we." What made it hospitable was the fact of it not cutting in, of it being accommodating of the "we." But what it did not cut into was the discourse that was conducted outside it, meaning perhaps, in the logic of the poem, that it was not seen through words. Was it then with its property of absolute duration that it exists outside the fleeting community of the human? That it did not cut into language with its radical otherness? An otherness to which "we" then also belong, since our bodies contain not only our beating hearts, but also our skeletons, that part of us which remains when we die, along with the names on our stones. The stone belongs to "it," the nonhumanity of the world, is that what did not cut in? Because it was woven into the veil of language? The puzzle deepens in repetition:

    he, it
did not cut in, it
spoke,
willingly spoke to dry eyes, before closing them.

To speak here is in other words the opposite of cutting in. And not only does "it," the stone, speak, it is also drawn into "it," which must be all things indirectly referred to after it: grain, grapes, kidneys. It is this that "speaks."

Earlier in the poem speaking was placed on an equal footing with not seeing, and with sleeping, which is another way of not seeing, though stronger since the person asleep is wholly turned away from the world in which he or she lies. But sleeping and not seeing apply to humans; not cutting in, which is to say speaking, applies in this instance to things. What the things speak to are eyes. To speak to eyes is to be seen. But not in the way those awake see, for they do not cut in. They are seen sleeping. The eyes that see are dry, in contrast to the eye at the poem's midpoint, which is moist. That was before the grief, of the poem's we. But to go to the eye, to the moist one, may of course be read less sentimentally, moist can point simply to a property of the moist, that it flows, runs, is not firm in its form, is never the same. The contrast between the dry and the moist is found in other places in the poem too, for instance between the "unmistakable track" at the beginning and the "water-level traces" at the end. A track is something that points to something else, an imprint, and that imprint must have duration in order to be meaningful. Water does not have duration, it forms itself according to the now, so a water-level trace contains at one and the same time the trace and the dissolution of the trace. The entire poem rests here, between the traces in time and the tracelessness of time. The traces are not themselves that which once was, but signs of what once was, at the same time as they are something in their own right. When the trace is water, the traces are more transitory, their mistakability drastically increased. But the trace is not merely water, it is groundwater, something that lies below the surface, pervaded by that which comes from above, all that seeps through the soil. The moist, the liquid, belongs to the eye, which sees the now, whereas that which pegs down and gives form belongs to writing. The fact of the eye never seeing the same thing, the seen always in flux, is something the poem addresses on a number of levels, not only in tracks and traces, but also for instance in the way the nouns are transformed into adjectives, from entities into properties of entities – not grain but grainy; not stalk but stalky; not grape but grapy; not kidney but kidneyish. Thereby the poem describes, rather than specifying membership of any class or category. Together these properties make up an "it," which along with that of the stone does not cut in, but speaks to dry eyes before closing them.

Why are the eyes dry? Is it because they are untouched by grief, or because they see only the immutable and invariable? Is it because the grapes and the grain and the stone do not cut in? It does not cut in, the speaking, the talk of words is compared earlier on with sleep, and their closing their dry eyes might also be sleep, or death, or a mere doze, but in any case it has to do with not seeing. "It" is active, it "closes" the dry eyes; the unseen closes the eyes of the unseeing, who then becomes "it," dead? But while the dry eyes are outside the "it," the poem is not; the poem calls it forth, in a time and in a form that is the poem's own. The poem sees. The poem sees the eyes of the sleeping, they are dry but good, in the stone, the grain, the grape; yet it sees the stone, the grain, the grape as well.

Good, but is it true?

The question the poem does not pose directly, though it may be read as a response to it, is how reality is to be represented when language by its very nature renders general all objects and phenomena, depriving them of time and thereby veiling their uniqueness, and moreover is bound up with a society and a history attaching to that society, which has charged and depleted them in slow ebbs and flows of meaning, in the sense of ways of seeing, and which, more than merely concerning the existential and the social, is what actually makes the existential social. For "blood" is not simply blood, "soil" not simply soil. One way of getting away from that would be to create a new language altogether, freed of history, wholly constrained in respect to its generality, but that would not be a language at all; the wholly particular cannot be communicated, but requires community, a you, to create a we; this is the foundation of language. The poet would understand the poem, but no one else would, and so the question would then be what the poet understands, in a solipsistic world.

Another way of getting away from it would be to change languages. But for one thing all languages generalize and are laden with culture and history, and for another this poem goes so far into the particular that it becomes hard to read as an instance of the specific language, German, or the specific culture, the German; its crisis goes deeper, to the very foundation of our understanding of what a human being is, what a language is, what reality is, what memory is, what death is, what time is. Such questions can be neither posed nor answered in the language in which the general understanding of the concepts is seated without losing their own particularity and radicality.

But at the same time it cannot step outside the language and become one with its own particularity and radicality, since then it would reveal itself to no one. It is through language that reality reveals itself to us, not as it is but, as it is revealed by language, and if that language is to be genuine it must reveal to us the singular reality of the own, in its own singular language, but without severing either the connection with reality or the connection with others who share that language. "Engführung" inhabits that borderland. And existing at the very limits of meaning means the question of what meaning actually is becomes inevitable, at the same time as each single word is accorded quite extraordinary weight. That weight comes not from meaning, but from the basis of meaning. "Stone" is such a word. It is there, almost like a stone in the poem, unconnected with its surroundings, and if we try to draw in aspects of the stone's connection to the human sphere, to give it meaning in that way, it does not "answer." It is within language, and yet outside the contexts of language.

In the unique lies the own, in the own the private; the path that evades generality passes through here. And perhaps the stone in Celan's poem is laden with something unknown to the reader, at which he or she cannot even guess. In the afterword to his Norwegian rendering, Øyvind Berg writes that Celan's parents, Friederike and Leo, German-speaking Jews resident in Romania, died in a German work camp known as the Stone Pit. "This brings to mind a poem such as 'Engführung,'" Berg writes, "though at the same time it is important to keep some measure of air between biographical background and the poems that transcend it: historicizing interpretations deprive the poetry of contemporary interest." What Berg points to here is the fundamental hermeneutic issue: where exactly is the line between what is in the poem, what is in the poet, and what is in the reader? Celan writes the word "stone." Was he thinking about his parents? Are they contained in the word "stone"? We will never know. Now I know that Celan's parents died in the Germans' quarry, or stone pit, and I can read that connection into the word "stone," but is it right to read the poem in that way, or am I forcing something upon it that it does not contain? How much is outside and how much inside the poem?

The key words of the poem, besides "no one" and "nothing," are "night," "words," and "ash." When Celan wrote "came a word through the night, wanted to shine," was he addressing the beginning of the Gospel of John? There we find the classic connection of word and light, the word there is God, God is life and life is man's light shining in the darkness. If this was indeed what Celan was thinking about, does it then "exist" in the poem, as opposed to if he was not? If he was not and it does not "exist" in the poem, but only in me, a reader, am I then understanding it "wrongly"?

> In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. He was with God in the beginning. Through him all things were made; without him nothing was made that has been made. In him was life, and that life was the light of all mankind. The light shines in the darkness, and the darkness has not overcome it.

> Came, came.
> Came a word, came,
> Came through the night,
> wanted to shine, wanted to shine.

If one hears the tone of the Gospel of John in those four lines of Celan, one will also hear the tone of God in the word they evoke, which wants to but cannot shine. But God is not only the word, he is life, and life was the light of mankind; that tone too then fills the words; just as light is a word that cannot penetrate the undifferentiatedness of night, there may be people who cannot penetrate the undifferentiatedness of death. Yet the opening verse of the Gospel of John not only associates the word with God, and God with the light of mankind, it also tells us we are "in the beginning," in the manner of the creation narrative. Thereby it becomes an echo of the Old Testament's account of the creation, which also starts with the words "In the beginning." Whereas in the Old Testament the creation is of the material world, the sky and the earth, which to begin with are empty and desolate places in the midst of an expanse of darkness, gradually gaining light, land, life, and which in keeping with all accounts of creation are brought from chaos to order, the beginning in the Gospel of John is not the dawning of a day and land rising out of eternal darkness in the material world, but the word. What begins here is the human world, and it emerges in the word, which establishes differentiation in the undifferentiated, meaning in the meaningless, order in the chaos. If a person falls out of language, he or she falls out of the world. A world without language is a world without distinction, and a world without distinction is a world without meaning. Instead it is chaos, the expansion and collapse of all things. But language is not above the world and the people in it, a ring-binder system of distinctions and differences, but something existing in every one of us, by whose means we understand ourselves, our fellow humans and the world in which we live. Language is the human. In language I exist, but only if there is also a you to which the I of the speech act can relate, because if not, how then should the I separate itself and find form? The you-less I is no one and everyone.

What does a language look like without the other? Not like Joyce's inner monologues, for although the language in them purports to come from the most particular own, it listens to it at the same time, and it is this presence in the entire, quiet flood of memories, thoughts, fragments of life, and an I that pass through a mind, as for instance in Molly Bloom's concluding monologue in Ulysses, that is the other to whom the inner human being relates, no longer enclosed within itself. Joyce's merit was precisely in knowing how tightly the innermost I was bound up with the other and to the culture through language, and in his next novel he proceeded further along the same path, where language was no longer decoded within the one, he wrote of an "all," or within an all, which is to say the language in itself, without sender or receiver, an I or a you, but a gigantic we extending in all directions, for every single word has part in another, all words are open toward one another, and all that they contain in the way of history and culture and centuries of meaning flows through them, and thereby they come to exist at the second limit of meaning: the first is where the I disappears into the own, which cannot be communicated without losing its character of ownness and becoming the other, therefore ultimately being without language. The second limit, at which Finnegans Wake is written, is that where the I disappears into the self of the language. In the instance of our crossing the first limit, the you ceases to exist, and the I becomes it; in our crossing the second limit, the you ceases to exist, and the I vanishes into an "all"; in both instances meaning departs the language, which accordingly becomes mysterious.

But what is the mysterious? It is that which cannot be understood. But then what is meant by understanding? Do we "understand" a stone? Do we "understand" a star? Do we "understand" water? The most important concept in the first verse of the Gospel of John is "logos," the word. "Logos" is Greek, and in the Greek culture, from Plato onward, language is abstract to a greater extent than in the Jewish culture, where, according to Northrop Frye, if I have understood him correctly, the word, "dabar," is taken more tangibly, as if closer in some way to what it denotes, almost as if words were entities or actions in themselves. If the Gospel of John is not a presence in Celan's poem, the Greek certainly is, and not only in the suggestion of reference to Democritus, where the physical world is divided up into its smallest component parts, but also in the abstract, relational, all-connecting language world that was the prerequisite of the we that no longer is possible: without connection, the stone lies in language. What does the stone mean? This is a question for language, for the "stone." We know what it looks like, we know how it is built up, and we know what kind of properties it has. But as for what it is, in itself, we have no conception. "It," we can say. "It is a stone." "It is a star." "It is water." "It is I." Or, perhaps, "I am it." What is "it"?

It is what has no name.

Understanding and meaning are not the same thing. The Israeli-American sociologist Aaron Antonovsky defines meaning as a feeling or experience of coherence. Religion sets up such states of coherence, drawing the stone and the tree into the human sphere, where they are what they are, tangible objects in their own right, and moreover represent aspects of the sacred or divine, which is to say that which lies outside the human. Science, which took the place of religion, also sets up such states of coherence, placing the stone and the tree within an enormous system of differences and similarities that man has established and is himself a part of. And the social world establishes connections and coherences, an intricate system of rules as to what may and may not be done, what is desirable and what is not, what can be said and what not, organized in a hierarchy in which the individual may ascend or descend according to how finely the society's various strata are divided. Meaning is not something in itself, but a feeling that may arise, and the coherence on which it is dependent is relative and may be based on misunderstanding as well as understanding, superstition as well as true belief, illusion as well as reality, immorality as well as morality. Meaning is a sense of coherence, and the greater the coherence, the greater the meaning. Affinity with the all of the universe and with the divine, as experienced in ecstasy, is the strongest feeling of coherence a person may experience. Love is a coherence-bringing emotion. And the sense of community that arises when we are together with other people in a shared experience is also coherence-bringing and fosters meaning. The great insight of whoever wrote the Gospel of John was not only that the human world arose in the word, but also that mankind itself arose in the word, and that all meaning that may exist in that world derives from the word. The word is a light that illuminates our world, beyond that world is but darkness, and this is so because the word creates differences while the dark is without difference. In Paul Celan's poem the darkness and the undifferentiated are not something belonging outside the human sphere, our perimeter, at which we stand when we encounter death or the divine, but something that has pervaded the very core of humanity itself, which in this understanding is the same as language.

If language falls, darkness invades our world, flooding in like an ocean.

But what does it mean for language to fall? How can language fall? Or, put differently: why did the word not shine when it wanted to shine? In the Gospel of John the word is God, and this can be understood as saying that God is what gives the word meaning, that in which meaning resides and from which meaning emanates, which is to say a securer of coherence. In the poem there is no such meaningful coherence. Words relating to the world destroy the world, the grass is written asunder and the wheel turns of itself, unconnected with its surroundings, a symbol detached from context, where perhaps that very detachment is the most important aspect, certainly it is emphasized, for the night sky under which it turns is without stars. Stars are lights in darkness, lights are words, the word is God. The evocation of the word as light immediately afterward must be understood as a longing for another kind of word, the wish to establish another coherence after the one that has broken down, and when that does not occur, and that light does not shine, the poem collapses into ash, ash, ash, night, night-and-night, and the call to go to the eye, not the one that sees and distinguishes, but the one that weeps.

However, coherence or meaning are not exclusively found where the word comes from, but also where the word is going, which is toward a you. To this you, absence of meaning is meaning too. Without this you the poem would have been mute. It would not have collapsed into ash and night, which are proximate to the language-less, but into the language-less itself. The you is the poem's hope, the poem's future, the poem's utopia. But the poem's you is not the same as me, reading it now, but a semantic role into which I can insert myself or not. If I do, I must do so with caution, since this is what it means to read, to give up the self and yield to the alien voice, obeying it, in this instance a voice created by a Paul Celan, a human being long since dead but who in these words and their fine shades of meaning emerges into view, an I directed toward a you, which I, more than fifty years after it was written, endeavor to identify with. If I bring too much of myself into that endeavor, I turn the you of the text into my own I, and the poem then becomes a mirror, its potentials in terms of yielding insight constrained by my own limitations, since I know what I know. That prejudice operates not only in respect to my own personal self, but also in relation to the culture as a whole, which is also a part of my reading self, and quite necessary; without it I would be blank at every word. The "you" that exists in Paul Celan's poem, to whom the poem is addressed, is denied all words that are creative of such common prejudices, precisely because the perceptual space in which it is written is concerned with the inadequacy of those prejudices in relation to the world it strives to reach, and this is why the poem is so difficult to grasp; it moves away from points of commonality, and when nevertheless it approaches them it is somehow free of the usual associations and resonances: a stone is a stone. This idiosyncracy is the method employed by the poet in order to write about something other than words that awaken words, and this forces the reader to read idiosyncratically, complicating all associations between the image of the poem and that which the image "represents," that which it "in essence" is an expression "of." The poem expresses itself. But it does so using the words of the community. That makes it difficult to interpret, but not to understand, for while the associations the words give rise to are denied space and rejected by the other words in their vicinity, no such rejection occurs of the moods and emotions awakened by the same words. Nor is it the case that the poem's true and absolute meaning lies, beyond its language, in the heart and the weeping eye. It is where the "you," which may well be a personification of the reader, is urged to go. Not read, not look, but go to the eye, the moist one. On the other hand, the eye that does not see but that weeps, is a kind of equivalent of the light that wanted to shine, an image in this darkness of futility, the fall of language. Language has fallen, since the "we" from which it both arises and issues has fallen, but it is not only to show this that the poem has been written, it is itself an attempt to find a way out and as such reestablish meaning, if only here, in this poem, and if only negatively, by way of making the loss of meaning visible. The figure for this loss is not the night that conceals, nor the word's lack of force, but the ash, into which everything has vanished. Ash is the form of absence. Religion, which in its laws and rules relates everything in the human world to God, thereby rendering it significant, has incorporated the ash too in its delineation of the borders between our social reality, our physical reality and the divine reality of God; ash is mentioned particularly in the Law of Moses, given by the Lord to the Israelites through Moses, where it is the object of certain rules. Not ash in itself, but the ashes of burned offerings. The priest must be clad in linen when he removes the ashes, and he must place the ashes beside the sacrifice. Then he must put on different garments before carrying the ashes from the camp to a clean place. The ritual of sacrifice consists of a series of transitions, an animal is slaughtered and brought into the sphere of the holy, becoming holy in itself, becoming God's own. The ashes are still within the holy and therefore holy in themselves. The priest changing clothes marks a transition, completed by the ashes being removed from the temple and taken out of the camp, returned to the world once more. But even in the differentiation of the holy, ash is a remnant that in contrast to life cannot be brought to conclusion – it being already dead – and which is carried away, thereby becoming unholy.

The question is what this dimension of ash has to do with Paul Celan's poem. Ash, ash, ash, it says, as if insisting on it being merely that, ash, and nothing else. At the same time, the burned offering of which the ashes are a remnant is called holocaust in Greek. And in a poem written by a German Jew in 1959 it is hard to read "ash" and "holocaust" in any neutral way. But is such a reading historicizing? To turn the issue on its head: what else would "ash" and the wound suggested by "seams" and "grew together" point to, relate to, if not the Holocaust? Is it reductive? In a way, for it is exactly the reduction of the name the whole poem, with its fierce negative force, tries to avoid, for the simple reason that it would close what the poem strives to keep open. But it is precisely this and nothing else that is going on in the poem. It addresses something quite specific that it cannot name, and in that it strives beyond the specific, that which applies in historical time, to reach into the fundamental existential categories where what is important is the relationship between language and reality. Without the human catastrophe of the Holocaust, the poem would very likely have been able to speculate as to the difference between words and stones, and to circle about the nothingness of death, but I can hardly imagine it would have been able to lament the absence of light from on high, the divine light, to bewail that it did not shine.

"Engführung" is clearly no exercise in language, clearly not an academic excursion into presence and absence, it is an elegy and a requiem to those who perished, but also to what was lost with their death, which is to say "we." It was in Celan's native tongue, German, that the Jews were first separated from the "we" of the language to become "they," and subsequently, in the extermination camps, "it." The Jews were deprived of their name; in the name lay not only their identity, but also their humanity; they became "it," bodies with limbs that could be counted, but not named.

They became no one. Then they became nothing. All that was left when they were gone was ash.

A short while ago I watched a documentary film about the extermination of the Jews, Claude Lanzmann's Shoah, which deals exclusively with what was left, exclusively with what exists now; no old photos, no old footage, just people in the present time, relating, one by one, what they saw and experienced during that time. Trains, forests, faces. Some spoke frivolously of what they had seen, without understanding, they didn't know what they were saying, others were mute, others broke down under the weight of a single recollection, abruptly unbearable. As a viewer I could understand what it was about, that this and that event had occurred, I could assess the accounts of the various people in the film and place them into perspective with everything else I knew, and in relation to their own psychologies and character types, but only twice during the course of the nine hours the film lasted did the reality of what had happened, in all its horror, come home to me, two glimpses of insight, by which I mean that I grasped what it was telling me emotionally rather than intellectually. In both instances this lasted two, perhaps three, seconds, and was then gone. One of these glimpses of insight I related to Paul Celan's poem.

A railway official who had been working at a station next to a German camp in Poland in 1942 spoke of something he had experienced there one afternoon. The camp had been under construction for a short time, there was talk of what it might be for, perhaps he asked some of the Germans, I can't remember, but the assumption, for whatever reason, was that it was a labor camp for Jews. That afternoon he was just about to knock off work when a train came into the station. It was made up of many wagons, all crammed with Jews, and as he cycled home the soldiers began to empty the wagons and herd the Jews into the camp. The station being so close by, everyone at work there heard the murmur and commotion of this great number of people passing through the area as evening fell: the shouts, the cries of the children, the hum of voices. But when he came back the next morning all was still. He could hardly comprehend how still it was. Where had they all gone? They had not been transported on, he knew that, so they had to be there, in the camp. But how could so many people be so quiet?

That stillness, in which every human distinction is erased, is what Paul Celan was writing about. That stillness is nothing, but in that nothing resides a something, all those who have disappeared within it. That stillness, and the darkness of that stillness, is what makes the poem's I lament the word that came and did not shine, and what compels that I to write: wanted to shine, wanted to shine, and then ash, ash, ash, night, night-and-night. All distinctions are erased, everything has become nothing, and what it once was cannot be called back, is lost forever, and not even in language can it be called back, for in the empty dominion of this undifferentiated void a word cannot make a difference. The only thing left behind is stillness, which is to say the wordless, which is to say night, and ash. The one's entire differentiated world: ash. The past, the future: ash.

Perhaps a cynical person might say that a life is a life, and that a child dying in a gas chamber is no more terrible than a child dying in a car accident; the grief of the bereaved is the same; grief is grief, it is not increased by multiplication, people are not numbers, grief is not arithmetic. This indeed is true. To lose a child is always the same. But the accumulated number represents more than just one added to another; the dead were a community in themselves, a collective entity. When a person dies in a society his or her memory lives on among the others and their physical belongings are divided up among the next of kin. A we has lost a you, which in death has become it.

The Holocaust saw whole societies wiped out in one swoop, in such a way that not only what they were became nothing, but also what they had been. All memories and stories were wiped out with them. What they were when they died, their own "is," ceased to exist, but also their "was," and that nothing, which is absolute, in which no one and nothing is left, creates a distinction between is and was which death in itself does not establish, for the we never dies, it lives on, all our institutions, all that we build and all that we do is directed toward the continuation of the we, more resilient than any of its individual parts, which all will die, remaining for a short time in the memory of the closest we, which in turn dies too, until the we, fundamentally the same, eventually comprises completely new individuals.

This is what culture is.

The culture not only bears the deaths of the you and the I, but exists to overarch and build on them. And the most important element in that endeavor is language. Language belongs to the we, it is ours, but what we express through it is our individuality. That individuality, expressed again and again in language, through the centuries, is the cacophony of the we. In language and culture we overcome death, and this is perhaps their most fundamental function. When Mallarmé wrote about his son and his son's death, his writing edged toward the brink of the nothing, staring into its darkness, but the fact that the language broke up had to do with his venturing out to language's very perimeter, and at that exact point it came apart, faced with the fact that it was powerless, but it is not intrinsically so, for if the language shifted itself from there toward the center, toward life and the social world, it would again become meaningful and whole. Mallarmé remembered his son. In the Holocaust, the child and those who remembered the child perished.

But this is not what sets Celan's death poem apart from Mallarmé's death poem, though the absence of memory makes the undifferentiatedness of the nothing that much greater. No, what sets them apart is that the dissolution of meaning in Celan's death poem does not apply to the outermost zone of the language, that which language cannot grasp, the negation of the problem of God's name, but applies to language as such, the language in itself. Not the individual words of the language, like stone or grass, but the foundation of coherent meaning established by the language's we, since it was this we that had separated you after you from the community of the we and recategorized them as a "they" and then an "it," expelling them from the language and from the domain of the human.

Can an I who has seen this then say "we"? And if it cannot, how then to write and speak at all?

Language is a social activity, all language presupposes an I and a you, together a we.

The reality of language is thereby a social reality, it is the reality of the I, the you, and the we. But language is no neutral phenomenon giving expression to the existent; the I, the you, and the we both color and are colored by the language they create and are created within. Identity is culture, culture is language, language is morality. What made the atrocities of the Third Reich possible was an extreme reinforcement of the we, and the attendant weakening of the I, which lessened the force of resistance against the gradual dehumanization and expulsion of the non-we, which is to say the Jews, bolstering the we still further. This dehumanization took place in the language, in the name of the we, where morality too is found, and within only a very few years the voice of conscience in Germany went from Thou shalt not kill to its reverse, Thou shalt kill, as Hannah Arendt points out.

In this language, where morality, ethics, and also aesthetics were perverted, Paul Celan uttered an "I." To utter the word "death" in the same language would be to say something other than the absence of life, something other than nothing, for Nazism, which had pervaded all parts of the culture, was a death cult; to say "dead" was not to say "nothing," but to say sacrifice, fatherland, greatness, fervor, pride, courage. To say "soil" was to say history, belonging, heritage. To say "blood" was to say rage, purity, victim, death. Death in the gas chambers was another death, its nothing was something else, referred to as one refers to the extermination of insects or vermin, an elimination of the undesirable, something other than human, and how was it possible to refer to that death, which was without identity, without awakening the fluttering banners or the teeming rats that lay in the very word "death"?

Seven years earlier, in 1952, Paul Celan published another poem concerning the Holocaust, perhaps his most famous, "Death Fugue." The theme is the same, but the world described is very different, not least because the poem contains names. Germany is mentioned five times, Margarete with the golden hair four times, Shulamith with the ashen hair three times. Death is personified, a master from Germany, violence is exemplified, "he grabs at the iron in his belt he waves it," "he strikes you with leaden bullets his aim is true," "he sets his pack on to us," the violence is directed toward Jews and is associated with music, "he whistles his pack out/he whistles his Jews out in earth has them dig for a grave/he commands us strike up for the dance," and above him, the master from Germany, flash the stars. "Death Fugue" is a suggestive and hypnotic poem, its beauty is wild and compares with that of Hölderlin's poetry. And it is not untrue, Nazism was wild, barbaric, and carnivalistically grotesque in the extreme, it sought the sublime in its banners and uniforms, its parades and posters, invoking history and history's depths, holding German culture, including Hölderlin, proudly before it, its I dissolving in the we of the masses, and the dissolution was good, for it was to dissolve itself in something greater than the self, to leave behind the strangulating narrowness of class and enter the proud all of us, blood, nation, Germany, and then night fell, brutal and perverted, its darkness lit by fires of violence and destruction.

This strident evil, as base as it was solemn, permeates "Death Fugue." Identity is not destroyed, but gathered in three names, Germany, and Margarete, her golden hair against Shulamith's ashen, the Aryan against the Jewish. Death is not nothing, the past not absent, not impossible to represent, the language is not broken, but gives meaning still. All this is gone in "Engführung," fallen to the ground. In "Engführung" all is silent. Not a name remains. The poem penetrates the space between the name of the world and the world itself, but what it seeks is not pureness of being, in the sense of freedom from civilization and culture, which is to say the so-called authentic, for the absence of the name is a loss in the poem, as the absence of the name's differentiating power is a loss, beseeched in vain, impossible. Even nature as it is, authentic and true, behind language, as it were, is colored by the ideology of the we, the project of striving to establish common meaning, including the Nazis' own, in which it was one of the dominant ideas, evident not least in Hitler's Mein Kampf, where the idea of nature in itself is perhaps the most important element of all, but also in the philosophy of Heidegger, in whose work Celan immersed himself, going so far as to meet him in person, an encounter not entirely without controversy, Heidegger having aligned himself to Nazism, so not even the idea of the world as it "is," outside language, was unaffected by the ideology and the worldview, it was woven into all things, and this lack of innocence, or this discovery of the loss of innocence, is, the way I read it, the very point of departure of Celan's poem.

The biggest difference between "Death Fugue" and "Engführung" derives not unnaturally from the years that separate them, though is not merely a result of Celan's writing having developed, matured, and deepened, for something else happened too during those years, concerning the way in which Nazism and the Holocaust were perceived by the culture, which is to say the we, for while in 1952 that must all still have been gaping open in its unfathomable atrocity, in a society laid waste, in 1959 it was quite differently shut, an episode that could be referred to, a period of history in which each single event, each single life, each single moment was locked tight in the emblem of the name – Auschwitz, for instance.

"Who covered it up?" the poem asks. Designation is another kind of disappearance. Therefore the poem cannot describe the deportation of the Jews, the transportation in cattle trucks through the Polish countryside, the herding into the camps, the stripping naked, the processions prodded into the gas chambers, the extermination inside the gas chambers, where in panic they scrabbled toward the doors, their corpses tumbling out when those same doors were again opened, the incineration in the ovens or on the grids over the pits, the ash. This description, which we may say is made up of facts, and which we associate with the word "Auschwitz," has nothing to do with reality, in part because its perspective indicates a consummate course of events, which is a fiction for the simple reason that no single person witnessed this sequence, but only parts of it, and that those who were there and who did witness that course of events in its entirety are either dead, without ever having related their experience, or, in the case of those who survived, experienced it from the inside, whereas the description is always as seen from the outside.

The perspective has never existed, it belongs to writing and is possible only there. Auschwitz, the way we think of it, does not exist, it belongs to the past, which is gone, and it did not even exist there either, because what we imagined happened there, in the way it was told to us, did not happen in that way, the story lies, forgetting the one, whose perspective is the only perspective possible, and this very forgetting of the one was what made the extermination possible.

When I was growing up, playing at the age of ten in the German bunkers in the woods on Tromøya, or sitting on their artillery emplacements with my legs dangling as I stared out over the sea, only some thirty years had passed since they had been in use. But the world in which I played was peaceful and orderly, and when for the first time I visited Flensburg in northern Germany, nine years old, tagging along at the heels of my father, who walked quickly and had such an odd expression on his face as we passed through a narrow street with scantily clad women sitting in small booths on each side, presumably the reason I remember the place at all, I saw that same peacefulness and orderliness there too. Whenever we drove over the fells to my grandparents in Vestland, the majority of tourists we encountered were Germans. Many of them must have been there before, during the war. The war was something we learned about at school, mostly that small part of it that had taken place in Norway, but also, gradually, what had gone on in the rest of the world as well. In the newspapers it was present in reports of war criminals being discovered in various parts of the globe and brought to trial. The weekly magazines, perhaps Vi Menn in particular, were full of colorful stories about war treasure, so-called Nazi gold, and German war criminals hiding away in Argentina or Brazil. But the biggest sources of knowledge about Nazism were the comic books I read, such as På vingene and the Vi vant series. There, the Germans, or Fritz as they were called, were evil and unscrupulous, the "yellows" or the "Japs" even worse. All this, the books, the comics, the newspaper articles and the magazine stories, as well as our history lessons at school, seemed to be situated in a radically different age, in a radically different place, more like the forest in which Hansel and Gretel got lost than the one that became smaller and narrower as it approached the pebble beach, eventually to come to an end altogether out at Hove, where the German artillery positions were still plain to see.

In the spring when we were in the seventh grade, I was thirteen years old, I saw pictures from the extermination camps for the first time. I was standing in the library, which was housed in the school's basement, and it was a complete shock, I froze inside, but it was not the numbers of the dead or their suffering I was reacting to, because I had learned about the Holocaust and knew what it was, it was the image itself, a woman so emaciated she barely resembled a human, she was naked, but there was nothing sexual about her, and then there was a picture of a pile of corpses, heaped and stacked like timber, the picture had been taken from a distance and the limbs and bodies were tangled up, but I could still see very clearly that they were humans. The coldness it filled me with, the horror that went through me and left me in a state of alienation for some hours afterward, had nothing to do with their suffering or the terrible nature of what had taken place, it had to do with the bodies, the way they were arranged and what that expressed, something I had never seen before and had no idea even existed.

At university I encountered the war and the Holocaust in a quite different form, for instance the way Horkheimer and Adorno write about it in their Dialectic of Enlightenment, where in order to grasp the collapse of civilization in that ultimate barbarity they provide an analysis of the Odyssey, as far as I understood it in order to demonstrate how light and darkness hung together and that light had always tried to free itself from the dark, in several instances almost succeeding, only in each case to be sucked back again. The way enlightenment became blind to itself, what began as a de-enchantment from reality, designed to make man free and his own master, ending up in re-enchantment, at the same time as progress, with all its advances and technologies, marched on, making man unfree and slavelike, and eventually it collapsed completely.

Adorno's solution was more enlightenment, as I understood it. "What is at issue here is . . . the necessity for enlightenment to reflect on itself if humanity is not to be betrayed," he wrote. And: "What is at stake is not conservation of the past but the fulfillment of past hopes." Where the connections were between light, darkness, enlightenment, myth, Nazism, and Bergen – the city I lived in – I had no idea, because the issue did not exist. Everything had its place then. Adorno was in one place, the Odyssey in another, my life in a third, the war in a fourth. When those categories became mixed up, as in Sørbøvåg one night when I was watching TV with Grandad and the politician Jo Benkow appeared on the screen, prompting Grandad to point at the TV and say, "What's that Jew doing there?" I did not know they had got mixed up, did not think about enlightenment, did not think about myth, did not think about Adorno, did not think about Arendt, but about Grandad, who I knew had never been a Nazi, assuming by extension that his prejudice stemmed from the age from which he came and did not in any way express anything significant about the person he was inside.

The fact that in the years that followed I read many books about Nazism had less to do with an attempt to understand than with the enormous fascination the events of that time exerted on me. The unbounded, was a much-discussed concept at the time, vague and theoretical, applied to texts, usually modernist texts, whereas the unbounded in reality, in the same way as the transgressional, another academic-intellectual buzzword, was not something anyone wanted to know about. For where did the unbounded and the transgressional exist in our culture? Drug addicts were unbounded, shunning no means of getting their hands on drugs, and pornography was transgressional, like the political direction no one approved of, the suburban pseudolibertarianism of the Progress Party, Fremskrittspartiet, like racism and the glorification of violence.

What consituted the unbounded in literature? What was transgressional there? Mostly it was genre, the traditionally lowappearing in the traditionally highbrow, or philosophy turning up in creative texts, or the poem approaching prose. For my own part, the transgressional was associated with an enormous sense of freedom on the one hand, and enormous shame on the other, played out in a rather unsophisticated fashion in a few too many beers followed by a couple of hours of undesirable yet delightfully unfettered behavior as a result. It was low and vile and wretched, even if it didn't necessarily feel like it, whereas the crimes that took place in the Third Reich were transgressional in a radically different and fundamentally incomprehensible yet no less compelling sense altogether. It was as if they exceeded the very limits of what was human. How was that possible? The allure of death, the allure of destruction, the allure of total annihilation, of what did it consist? The world burned, and they were joyful.

I read about it, I wondered about it, and never without feeling some small measure of that same allure myself as I sat there far from war and death, destruction and genocide, on a chair in Bergen, surrounded by all my books, usually with a cigarette in my hand and a cup of coffee next to me on the desk, the dwindling hum of the evening's traffic outside the window, sometimes with a warm cat asleep on my lap. I read about the final days of Hitler, the utterly demented atmosphere far beneath the ground where he lived with his attendants and those closest to him, the city above them, bombed to rubble by the Russians, a blazing inferno. At one point he ascended to inspire some boys of the Hitler Youth, I had seen the footage that was shot, he is ill, tries to stop his hand from shaking as he goes from one boy to the next, it must have been Parkinson's disease. But in his eyes there is a gleam, something unexpectedly warm.

Surely it couldn't be possible?

When Dad died, Yngve and I found a Nazi pin among his belongings, a pin with a German eagle to put in the lapel of a jacket. Where did he get it from? He was not the type to have bought something of that nature and therefore he must have been given it or come across it in some way. When Grandma died, a year and a half after Dad, and we went through the house to divide things up, we found a Norwegian edition of Mein Kampf in the chest in the living room. What was it doing there? It must have been there since the war. It was a fairly common book at the time, with thousands of copies sold, someone might have given it to them as a present, without it having any significance for them, but nevertheless it was still strange that they hadn't got rid of it after the war, for they would hardly have been unaware that it was incriminating. After the initial sensation the discovery of something so illicit gave rise to, I thought little more of it. I knew the people they were, Grandad and Grandma, and I knew they were from another age, in which other rules applied. Then came a period, perhaps a year later, when I began to read up more systematically about Nazism, it was just a subject I began to explore, the way I had previously explored other times and places in history. I read Shirer's work on Nazism, Kershaw's first book about Hitler, Gitta Sereny's book on Speer, Speer's Spandau diaries and his memoir, Inside the Third Reich. This was what I was reading when Tonje and I broke up and I moved to Stockholm. There, alone in a very feminine one-room flat I'd borrowed in the city's Söder District, I read the Swedish translation of Gitta Sereny's book about Treblinka, Into That Darkness, it made me unwell for a couple of weeks, and after that I read no more about it, it was a path on which I could proceed no more, where everything closed in on itself, everything emptied itself.

Seven years later, in the spring of last year, I bought a copy of Hitler's Mein Kampf in Norwegian. Or rather, because I had since made a name for myself as a writer, and because the interest surrounding that name was as great as it was, I took no chances ordering the book from the antiquarian bookshop myself, I was paranoid and scared it might get out, so I asked Geir to order it for me. He paid the two thousand kroner the two volumes cost and sent them on to me. Unwrapping them and standing with them in my hands filled me with distaste, to say nothing of the near-nausea that came over me when I started reading the first volume and Hitler's words and Hitler's thoughts were thereby admitted to my own mind and for a brief time became a part of it. I was due to go to Iceland for two days and had thought of reading the book on the plane, seeing as how I was intending to get started writing the first book of this novel when I got home again, and because it shares its name, My Struggle, with Hitler's book, and because Hitler's book and the Nazi pin were unexplained mysteries in that story, or perhaps not mysteries, but more exactly fields of the past that manifested themselves in the present and which I felt unable to trace back to anything I knew in that past, I had decided to write a few pages about Hitler's book.

I usually always sniff the books I buy, the new ones as well as the old, putting my nose to the pages and breathing in their smell because I associate that smell, and the smell of old books in particular, with something good, that element of childhood that was unconditionally pleasurable. The adventure, the abandoning oneself to other worlds. But I could not do that with Mein Kampf. The book was evil, in some indefinable way. I was unable too to have it on my shelf or on my desk, and instead I put it out of sight in the bottom drawer. Reading it on the flight, as I had imagined I would, was unthinkable, I realized that the moment I sat down in my seat after boarding. One of the female flight attendants congratulated me on my books, the other winked and said she knew who I was, and two passengers in the row in front of me were reading the same article about me in Aftenposten. Being that visible made reading Hitler's book out of the question, but it would have been just as impossible even if I had been anonymous, since the book in itself is stigmatizing, and if anyone had seen me reading it there in public a mood of distaste would have spread through the cabin and people would have thought there was something wrong with me. I left it in my bag for the duration of the flight and even when, having reached my destination, I stretched out to relax on the bed of my hotel room before the event I was scheduled to take part in, I left it there and turned on the TV instead, the embarrassment was simply too great. But why? I had read the Marquis de Sade, another stigmatized writer, but that was literature, hailed as pioneering and revolutionary by all the great French philosophers of the postwar period and used as a point of departure for their analyses of power, sex, language, and death. But with Hitler's book it was different. Hitler's book is no longer literature. What later happened, what he later did, the axioms of which are meticulously laid out in that book, is such that it transforms the literature into something evil. Hitler's Mein Kampf is literature's only unmentionable work. To say that this fact makes it interesting is impossible, regardless of the fact that it is interesting, since in that case one is deemed to lack respect for all those sent to their deaths by the system to which the book directly gave rise. Six million Jews, only sixty-five years ago. Almost all literature is simply text, but not Mein Kampf. Mein Kampf is more than text. It is a symbol of human evil. In it the door between text and reality is wide open, in a way quite unlike any other book. In Germany it is banned to this day. In Norway it has not been printed since the war.

Shortly after the war ended, in 1947, a book came out by a German-Jewish philologist, Victor Klemperer, entitled LTI – Lingua Tertii Imperii: Notizbuch eines Philologen, later published in English as The Language of the Third Reich. Klemperer was a professor of Romance languages at the Technical University of Dresden, an assimilated Jew, married to an Aryan woman. When the Nazis seized power in 1933 he therefore considered himself safe enough to remain in Germany. Soon, however, he lost his job, his house, his right to borrow books from the library; he was stopped from listening to the radio, refused the right to read books by non-Jewish writers, and eventually prohibited from speaking to anyone other than Jews – and, indeed, from writing. He lived under the constant threat of deportation, a fate he avoided only by virtue of his wife's lineage and because he had fought for Germany as a volunteer in World War I.

LTI is an eyewitness account of the Third Reich as seen from within – not of how life inside it harshened and became ever more brutalized throughout the 1930s and on into the 1940s, but rather of how the language changed. Klemperer kept a diary, its first entries are dated the spring of 1933, at the time he still holds his professorship and thereby a prominent position in society, and while his entries exhibit concern, such concern is mild in nature: a mere disquiet. Gradually, all that is Jewish is separated from the German, and the German bolstered everywhere. In Leipzig a commission is established for the nationalization of the university. A bulletin board in Klemperer's department carries the words: "If a Jew writes in German, he is lying." The word Volk – most simply "people" in English – is all over the place, in every context: Volksfest (public festival), Volksgenosse (ethnic comrade), Volksgemeinschaft (ethnic community), volksnah (in touch with the people), volksfremd (alien to the people), volksentstammt (descended from the people). Hitler himself is der Volkskanzler – the people's chancellor – and the elevation of the nation becomes the National Socialist revolution. A ceremony is held at the grave of "Rathenau-eliminators." By summer Klemperer senses that the people are weary of Hitler, as if they are exhausted by all the propaganda. On August 22 he writes:

> *Frau Krappmann, the deputy concierge, married to a postal inspector: "Professor Klemperer, by 1 October, the 'Hospitality' club of the postal workers of section A 19 will be brought into line [gleichgeschaltet] by the Nazis. But they will not receive any of its capital; a sausage dinner will be organized for the gentlemen, followed by coffee and cake for the ladies." Annemarie, clinically blunt as ever, relates the remark of a colleague wearing an armband with a swastika: "What is one supposed to do? It's like a lady's sanitary towel." And Kuske, the grocer, recites the new evening prayer: "Dear Lord, make me dumb, so that to Hohnstein I never come." Am I deceiving myself if I derive some hope from all this?*

Three days later Klemperer writes that his vice-chancellor has politely asked if he might hold back on publishing an article he has written; instead he approaches another publishing house, receiving a speedy rejection on the grounds that the piece is lacking the necessary national angles (völkische Gesichtspunkte). On August 28 he writes that he does not believe the people are going to go along with things much longer. He tells of going on a bus trip, a "mystery tour," some eighty people in two busloads, "the most petty-bourgeois company imaginable." During a coffee stop entertainment is laid on, a compère recites a pathos-ridden poem in praise of the Führer, the savior of Germany, and the new national community; the audience is silent and apathetic, the applause that follows entirely without enthusiasm. To top things off the man tells a funny story about something that happened at the hairdresser's, a Jewish woman wants a permanent, only to be refused, for as the hairdresser says, "The Führer solemnly promised on the occasion of the boycott of the Jews that no one is to harm a hair on a Jew's head." The story meets with laughter and enthusiastic applause. Three weeks later he relates some scenes from the party rally at Nuremberg that he has seen at the cinema. Hitler blesses new members of the Sturmabteilung by allowing them to touch the Blutfahne, the Blood Banner, from the failed coup attempt of 1923. Other Nazi banners are touched by the Blutfahne, thereby becoming consecrated, and cannon are fired in celebration. Klemperer reflects upon the name: "Blood Banner." He ponders the way that whatever has to do with the National Socialist party is elevated from the political to the religious sphere. He descibes those in attendance, how devout they appear toward the scenes that are played out before their eyes. The rallies are cult ceremonies, a ritualistic action, he writes, National Socialism is a religion. He learns of Jewish colleagues dismissed from their jobs. A colleague of Klemperer asks if Klemperer and his wife can receive a guest, "an enemy of the state" unexpectedly released from prison, the man had written about Marx and was deemed "politically unreliable" (politisch unzuverlässig). Klemperer notes that the philological journals are pervaded by Third Reich jargon: "science on a National Socialist footing," "the Jewish spirit," "the Novembrists." Deductions are made from his salary, a "voluntary winter charity" donation; he reflects on the the words "tax" and "charity," the way the latter appeals to the emotions. October 29, a sudden directive: every Tuesday afternoon the students are to gather for military sporting exercises – Wehrsport – instead of attending lectures. He notes the same word used for a brand of cigarettes: Military Sport brand (Marke Wehrsport). He hears about some communists who have been interned in a concentration camp. He reflects on the word Konzentrationslager ("concentration camp"). When he was a boy, he writes, the word had an exotic, colonial, and quite un-German ring to it, he heard mention of it in talk of the Boer War conducted by the English, after that the word disappeared from common usage, but now suddenly it had reappeared to describe a German institution, a permanent peacetime establishment directed against Germans, and he considers that the word will henceforth through all time be associated with Hitler's Germany.

He asks himself if it is heartless of him, a manifestation of some pedantic schoolmasterly streak, that he keeps returning to this philology of misery? He searches his conscience, he writes, and comes to the conclusion that it is not heartless, but a matter of self-preservation.

Disconcertingly few students find their way to his lectures. The Jewish students carry yellow cards, the stateless blue, the German brown. He lectures in French, in itself unpatriotic, and he is a Jew; attending his lectures requires courage, he writes. Besides, the students are more interested in "military sports exercises" or else are helping out with propaganda or taking part in demonstrations and rallies ahead of the upcoming referendum. He rages about Hitler's "unified list of candidates" (Einheitsliste) and maintains that it means the end of the Reichstag as a parliament. All wear little buttons with the word Ja on their lapels, he writes, and one cannot turn the button sellers away without being viewed with suspicion. He calls it such a "rape of the general public" that it must surely work against itself. But he has held this belief for some time; Goebbels addresses an intoxicated common herd, Klemperer is an intellectual and has been wrong all along. He mentions having a Jewish couple he refers to as "K" over for coffee. He finds Frau K snobbish and uncritical, a person who repeats the dominant opinion in any circumstance, but has more respect for her husband. When Herr K says that he is intending, in line with the central committee of Jewish citizens, to vote yes in the referendum, Klemperer loses his temper and thumps his fist on the table. His voice raised in anger, he demands to know if the man considers the policies of the government to be criminal or not. The man replies with composure that he has no right to ask such a question. The woman says that one must acknowledge that the Führer is a most brilliant and captivating man whose extraordinary charisma cannot be denied. Later, while intending to apologize for his behavior, he hears similar judgments from other Jews in his circles, from all walks of life, including intellectuals.

"Some kind of fog has descended which is enveloping everybody," he writes. At that time the Nazis had been in power for only a few months.

The new came not from without, but from within, and not in the guise of the unfamiliar, but as an amplification of the already known. And it came not as a negative force, and was not associated with destruction and death; reading accounts from early 1930s Germany, there is a striking optimism radiating from everywhere. Something new has begun, enterprise is strong, and the new party assuming power brings with it new career opportunities for a new people. Much is unproven, established and shaped as they go along; reading Albert Speer's memoir, Inside the Third Reich, the sense of empowerment and freedom it gives out is clear; as a young architect straight out of school he joins the NSDAP, is commissioned to renovate a party building in the provinces, does the job to everyone's satisfaction, receives further commissions, is noticed, entrusted with greater responsibilities, handpicked by the party's central offices, and one day finds himself standing before Adolf Hitler himself. The optimism of shaping one's own future blows like a wind through Speer's account of the era. The Nazis were of course continually on the lookout for young talent, there were positions to be filled, and many. The new optimism and momentum emanated too from all the parades, the marches, the rallies, and the meetings, which made the public space a stage, and what was shown on that stage came not from the outside, was not some alien element belonging to some other, it was the people themselves as they were in community, together, that found their form in these scenes.

But it was not the case that the people were deceived, that they were unaware of the propaganda, of the fact that behind what they were seeing and hearing there was a will and a particular intention, and that this was directed toward them in order to make them act or think in a certain way. That aspect was so obvious it was impossible not to be aware of it. It is similar to advertising in our day; we know full well it is trying to manipulate us and make us buy some product, but this does not prevent us from watching the ads, which can be good or funny, subtle or just plain silly, but even if we dislike them we do not necessarily dislike advertising in itself, and although we know there is no difference between this or that product and that all the glamor associated with one and not the other belongs to the image and not the product, which can be a different thing altogether, we nevertheless still buy what we associate with the glamor. We know that someone always will, and we know that the association between a product and its advertising is arbitrary, so buying the product or not buying the product is entirely up to us. No one has deceived us.

What is peculiar about advertising is that it works and does not work at the same time. The same is true of the propaganda of Hitler's Germany. They knew it was propaganda and seldom took it seriously, as is evident from Klemperer's notes, people regarded it more as a phenomenon, easy to see through, and yet they could be taken in by it, and when it came to the matter of the Jews it was an exaggeration, a hang-up Hitler had, any reasonable person knew this even if not necessarily distancing themselves from what it involved. Klemperer despised the propaganda, but was also affected by it; his emotions reacted even though his mind shunned the idea that there might genuinely be something inferior about him. Klemperer is interesting too because he was both Jewish and German, which is to say he was born into Judaism, but converted later to Protestantism, so he considers what is going on around him as both an intellectual German citizen and a Jew.

This is how he describes one palpable instance of propaganda in 1933:

> 10 November, evening. I heard the apogee of propaganda this afternoon on Dember's radio (our Jewish physicist, already dismissed, but also already negiotiating for a professorship in Turkey). On this occasion the organization by Goebbels, who also served as the compère of his own show, amounted to a masterpiece. The emphasis is on work and peace in the service of peaceful work. First the sound of sirens wailing across the whole of Germany and then a minute of silence across the whole of Germany – they have picked this up from America of course, and from the peace celebrations at the end of the Great War. This is followed by the framework around Hitler's speech, perhaps not a great deal more original either (cf. Italy), but executed to absolute perfection. A factory floor in Siemensstadt. For a few minutes the noise of all the machines at work, the hammering, rattling, rumbling, whistling, grinding. Then the sirens and singing and the gradual falling silent of the wheels as they are brought to a standstill. Then quietly, out of the silence, Goebbels's deep voice with the messenger's report. And only after all of this: Hitler himself, he speaks for three quarters of an hour. It was the first time that I had heard one of his speeches from beginning to end, and my impression was essentially the same as before. For the most part an excessively agitated, hectoring, often rasping voice. The only difference > was that on this occasion many passages were declaimed in the whining tone of an evangelizing sectarian. He advocates peace, he proclaims peace, he wants the unanimous support of Germany not out of personal ambition, but only in order to be able to defend peace against the attacks of a rootless international clique of profiteers, who for the sake of their own profit unscrupulously set populations of countless millions against each other . . .

> All of this, together with the well-rehearsed heckling ("The Jews!"), I had of course been conversant with for a long time. But in all its hackneyed overfamiliarity, its deafening mendacity – audible surely to the deafest of ears – it acquired a special and novel authority from a peculiarity of the foregoing propaganda, an aspect which I consider to be the most outstanding and ultimately decisive among its succesful individual ingredients. The advance notice and radio announcement stated: "Ceremony between 13:00 and 14:00. In the thirteenth hour Adolf Hitler will visit the workers." This is, as everyone knows, the language of the Gospel. The Lord, the Savior visits the poor and the prodigal. Ingenious, right down to the timing. Thirteen hundred hours – no, "the thirteenth hour" – sounds too late, but he will work miracles, for him there is no such thing as too late. The Blood Banner at the rally was of the same order. But this time the dividing line separating it from ecclesiastical ceremony has been broken down, the antiquated costume has been shed and the legend of Christ has been transported into the here and now: Adolf Hitler, the Redeemer, visits the workers in Siemensstadt.

The present is charged with the weight and suggestive force of the myth, the proximate, normally trivial, becomes meaningful and ultimately sacred. The quotidian becomes a magical world. It is elevated. Like Klemperer, one can see through it, but not without being touched by it at the same time. The sound of sirens is magnificent; once a month they are heard in this country too, and when they sound out it is hard not to stop what you are doing and look out the window if you are inside, or up at the sky if you are out; their sound pierces everything, ominously they pervade the air, as if it were doomsday itself. The sirens call out, call out to us, to all who hear them. Collective silence works in much the same way, within it we are never alone.
